"Well, I pass the aunts. Anyhow, you met Harry—somehow——"

"It was at the Choral Society. And then they stopped my going—because he walked home with me one wet night."

"And you have never seen each other since——"

"Of course we have."

"And communicated by some means more romantic than the post."

"It wasn't romantic. It was tennis balls."

"Tennis balls?"

"You cut a slit and squeeze it and put a note in and it shuts up, and no one notices it. It wasn't romantic at all. And I don't know why I should tell you anything about it."

"And then I suppose there were glances in church and stolen meetings in the passionate hush of the rose-scented garden."

"There's nothing in the garden but geraniums," she said, "and we always talked over the wall—he used to stand on their chicken house, and I used to turn the dog kennel up on end and stand on that. You have no right to know anything about it, but it was not in the least romantic."

"No—that sees itself—may I ask whether it was you or he who proposed this elopement?"

"Oh, how dare you!" she said, jumping up; "you have no right to insult me like this."

He caught her wrist. "Sit down, you little firebrand," he said. "I gather that he proposed it. You at any rate consented—no doubt after the regulation amount of proper scruples. It's all very charming and idyllic and—what are you crying for? Your lost hopes of a happy life with a boy you know nothing of—a boy you've never talked to about anything but love's young dream?"

"I'm not crying," she said passionately, turning her streaming eyes on him; "you know I'm not—or if I am—it's only with rage. You may be a doctor, though I don't believe you are. But you're not a gentleman."

"I suppose not," he said; "a gentleman would not make conditions. I'm going to make one. You can't go to Harry, because his mother would be seriously annoyed if you did; and so, believe me, would he—though you don't think it. You can get up and leave me and go 'away into the night,' like a heroine of fiction—but you can't keep on going away into the night for ever and ever. You must have food and clothes and lodging. And the sun rises every day. You must just quietly and dully go home again. And you can't do it without me. And I'll help you if you'll promise not to see Harry, or write to him, for a year."

"He'll see me. He'll write to me," she said with proud triumph.

"I think not. I exacted the promise from him as a condition of my coming to meet you."

"And he promised?"

"Evidently."

There was a long silence. She broke it with a voice of concentrated fury.

"If he doesn't mind, I don't," she said. "I'll promise. Now let me go back. I wish you hadn't come—I wish I were dead."

"Come," he said; "don't be so angry with me. I've done what I could for you both."

"On conditions!"

"You must see that they are good or you wouldn't have accepted them so soon. I thought it would take at least an hour to get you to consent. But no—ten minutes of earnest reflection are enough to settle the luckless Harry's little hash. You're quite right—he doesn't deserve more! I am pleased with myself, I own. I must have a very convincing manner."

"Oh," she cried passionately, "I dare say you think you've been very clever. But I wish you knew what I think of you! And I'd tell you for twopence."

"I'm a poor man, gentle Lady—won't you tell me for love?" His voice was soft and pleading beneath the laugh that stung her.

"IT WASN'T ROMANTIC. IT WAS TENNIS BALLS"

The Cadillac
The Automobile that Solves the Problem

Until the Cadillac was made, all automobile construction was more or less experimental. This machine is made on a new system developed from the experiences of all previous makers: the faults and weaknesses of the old methods have been avoided and a new ideal of motor travel developed that gives a perfect vehicle for comfort, speed, absolute safety, greatest durability, simplicity of operation, wide radius of travel, and reliability under all conditions of roads. You should not buy before examining this wonderful new machine. Price f. o. b. at factory, $750.

The new tonneau attachment, at an extra cost of $100, gives practically two motor vehicles in one, with a seating capacity of two or four, as required—a very graceful effect in either use. Write for illustrated booklet O.

"Yes, I will tell you—for nothing," she cried; "you're a brute, and a hateful, interfering, disagreeable, impertinent old thing, and I only hope you'll have some one be as horrid to you as you've been to me!"

"I think I've had that already—quite as horrid," he said grimly. "This is not the moment for compliments—but you have great powers. You are brave, and I never met any one who could be more 'horrid,' as you call it, in smaller compass, all with one little tiny adjective. My felicitations! You are clever. Come—don't be angry any more—I had to do it—you'll understand some day."

"You wouldn't like it yourself," she said, softening to something in his voice.

"I shouldn't have liked it at your age," he said. "Sixteen—fifteen—what is it?"

"I'm nineteen next birthday," she said with dignity.

"And the date?"

"The fifteenth of June—I don't know what you mean by asking me."

"And to-day's the first of July," he said, and sighed. "Well, well!—if your Highness will allow me I'll go and see whether your aunts' light is out, and, if it is, we'll attempt the reëntrance."

He went. She shivered, waiting, for what felt like hours. And the resentment against her aunts grew faint in the light of her resentment against her lover's messenger, and this in its turn was outshone by her anger against her lover. He had played cricket. He had risked his life—on the very day whose evening should have crowned that life by giving her to his arms. She set her teeth. Then yawned and shivered again. It was an English July, and very cold. And the slow minutes crept past. What a fool she had been! Why had she not made a fight for her liberty—for her right to see Harry if she chose to see him? The aunts would never have stood up against a well-planned, determined, disagreeable resistance. In the light of this doctor's talk the whole thing did seem cowardly, romantic and, worst of all, insufferably young. Well—to-morrow everything should change—she would fight for her love—not merely run away to him. But the promise? Well, Harry was Harry, and a promise was only a promise! There were footsteps in the lane. The man was coming back to her. She rose.

"It's all right," he said; "come."

In silence they walked down the lane. Suddenly he stopped.

"You'll thank me some day," he said; "why should you throw yourself away on Harry? You're worth fifty of him. And I only wish I had time to explain this to you thoroughly, but I haven't!"

She too had stopped. Now she stamped her foot.

"Look here," she said, "I'm not going to promise anything at all. You needn't help me if you don't want to—but I take back that promise. Go! Do what you like! I mean to stick to Harry—and I'll write and tell him so to-night. So there!"

He clapped his hands very softly. "Bravo!" he said; "that's the right spirit. Plucky child—any other girl would have broken the promise without a word to me. Harry's luckier even than I thought. I'll help you, little champion! Come on."

He helped her over the wall—carried the ladder to her window and steadied it while she mounted it. When she had climbed over the window-ledge she turned and leaned out of the window—to see him slowly mounting the ladder. He threw his head back with a quick gesture that meant, "I have something more to say—lean out!"

She leaned out. His face was on a level with hers.

"You've slept soundly all night—don't forget that—it's important," he whispered; "and—you needn't tell Harry—one-sided things are so trivial, but I can't help it. I have the passion for romance, too!"

With that he caught her neck in the curve of his arm and kissed her.

"Good-by!" he said. "Thank you so much for a very pleasant evening!" He dropped from the ladder and was gone. She drew her curtain with angry suddenness. Then she lighted candles and looked at herself in the looking-glass. She thought she had never looked so pretty. And she was right. Then she went to bed, and slept like a baby. Next morning the suburb was electrified by the discovery made by the nursing aunt that all the silver and jewels and valuables from the safe at the top of the stairs had vanished.

"The villains must have come through your room, child," she said to Harry's sweetheart: "the ladder proves that. Slept sound all night, did you? Well, that was a mercy! They might have murdered you in your bed if you'd happened to be awake. You ought to be humbly thankful when you think of what might have happened."

The girl did not think very much of what might have happened. What had happened gave her quite food enough for reflection. Especially when to her side of the night's adventures was added the tale of Harry's.

He had not played cricket, he had not hurt his knee; he had merely confided in his father's valet, and had given that unprincipled villain a five-pound note to be at the Cross Roads—in the orthodox style with a cab—for the flight, a post-chaise being, alas! out of date. Instead of doing this, the valet, with a confederate, had gagged and bound Harry and set him in a convenient corner against the local water-works to await events.

"I never should have believed it of him," added Harry in an agitated India-rubber ball note; "he always seemed such a superior person, you'd have thought he was a gentleman if you'd met him in any other position."

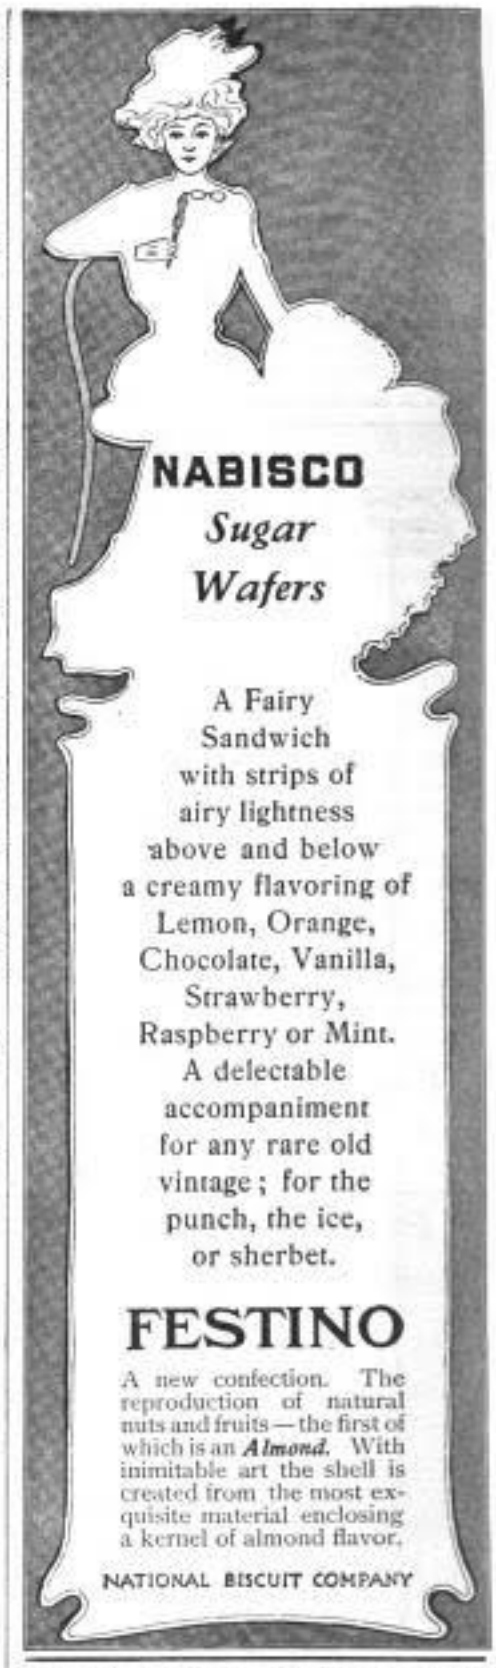
"I should. I did," she said to herself. "And oh, how frightfully clever! And the way he talked! And all the time he was only keeping me out of the way while they stole the silver and things. I wish he hadn't taken the ruby necklace; it does suit me so. And what nerve! He actually talked about the robberies in the neighborhood. He must have done them all. Oh, what a pity! But he was a dear. And how awfully wicked he was to—but I'll never tell Harry!"

She never has.

Curiously enough, her Burglar Valet Hero was never caught, though the police traced his career from his being sent down from Oxford to his last, best burglary.

She was married to Harry—with the complete consent of every one concerned—for Harry had money, and so had she, and there never had been the slightest need for an elopement, save in youth's perennial passion for romance. It was one morning at breakfast that she received a registered postal packet. It had a good many queer postmarks on it, and the stamps were those of a South American Republic. It was addressed to her by her own name—and under her new name, which was as good as new still. It came at breakfast-time and it contained the ruby necklace, several good rings and a diamond brooch. All were the property of her late aunts. Also there was an India-rubber ball, and in it a letter.

"Here is a birthday present for you," it said; "try to forgive me. Some temptations are absolutely irresistible. That one was. And it was worth it. It rounded off the whole thing so perfectly. That last indiscretion of mine nearly ruined everything. There was a policeman in the lane. I only escaped by the merest fluke. But even then it would have been worth it. At least, I should like you to believe that I think so."



"His last indiscretion," said Harry, who saw the note but not the India-rubber ball; "that means stealing your aunts' things, of course, unless it was dumping me down by the water-works, but, of course, that wasn't the last one. But worth it? Why, he'd have had seven years if they'd caught him. Worth it? He must have a passion for burglary."

She did not explain to Harry because he would never have understood. But the burglar would have found it quite easy to understand that or anything. She was so shocked to find herself thinking this that she went over to Harry and kissed him with more affection even than usual.

"Yes, dear," he said; "I don't wonder you're pleased to get something back out of all those things. I quite understand."

"Yes, dear," said she. "I know; you always do!"

Guaranteed Vehicles direct to you At Factory Prices

Just to know ourselves "what's under the paint," we own and operate one of the best equipped vehicle factories in the country. We can buy vehicles from other manufacturers cheaper than we can build them ourselves, but when we build them at our own factory we know what they are made of. It's what's under the paint that determines the quality of a vehicle. WE KNOW, but we don't charge you for the knowledge. Our prices are surprisingly low. Large profits on single sales are unnecessary, owing to our enormous volume of business. Good Buggies are our specialty. All popular styles, from our medium grade $33.90 rig to our famous "Arlington." A grade buggy at $90.00. You cannot afford to buy elsewhere until you have seen our catalogue. Note our prices:

"Diamond Special" Road Wagon

Solid panel spring back; padded seat sides; Pegamoid leather trimming, spring cushion, carpet and boot $22.90

"No. 2 Big Four" Buggy

Leather quarters and stays, nickel trimmings, spring cushions and back, trimmed in heavy green cloth. All others charge $45.00 to $60.00 for equal grades. Our Price $36.90

Our "Thousand" Buggy, $44.90; "Premium" Buggy, $48.50; our "Diamond Special" rubber tired Buggy, $55.50; our "Peerless" Buggy, $69.85.

"Sterling" Phaeton

Exclusive style body, excellent material and workmanship throughout, built for service, style and comfort. Our price is incomparably low at $55.90

Our "Peerless" 3-spring Phaeton, $69.90; our "Arlington" Phaeton, $69.00.

"Sterling" Surrey

Economically constructed of serviceable materials, a handsome and durable surrey, and complete with side and back curtains, storm apron etc. $65.80

If you are interested in honest goods at two-thirds to one-half ordinary retail prices, you cannot afford to overlook us.

Between the Lines

The World of Book Agents

THE book agent is an underrated figure. As a matter of fact, he is the outward and visible manifestation of an enormous industry which is peculiarly American. The magnitude of the subscription-book business in these days is something of which the average citizen can have no conception. Book publication, in his eyes, is probably represented for the most part merely by the trade books advertised in the daily papers. If the figures for subscription and trade sales could be obtained for a year, a comparison of the number of new publications, new editions and total sales on either side would be of peculiar interest. The agent not only symbolizes an immense business, but the agent who stands high in his calling regards himself as an envoy extraordinary rather than a simple salesman. With "de luxe canvassers," who sell sets of books offered at hundreds and even thousands of dollars, a call is a result of introductions and cleverly devised correspondence. It is the business of such an agent to know the collectors likely to purchase expensive publications and an acquaintance once formed is not allowed to lapse. These are the agents who pay their visits in carriages, accompanied by valets who carry such sample books as their masters may wish to show. The price of the work which they sell may range from $500 to $5000 and their commission will average about twenty-five per cent. It is plain, therefore, that very few sales will make up a handsome income, provided the agent has the ability to make those few sales. An agent's commissions may exceed $10,000 a year, and there may be periods when his income approaches $1000 a week, but these instances are extreme and rare. The range is a wide one, from the lordly salesman of the costliest books who holds lists of millionaire book buyers and keeps himself acquainted with their plans and movements, to the humble country book agent or college student who gleans a commission of twenty-five or fifty cents from the sale of a single volume of the Household Guide or Book of Facts Worth Knowing. But it is proper to preface a sketch of subscription-book selling with some correction of the popular ideas regarding the really successful representative of the industry.

The Psychology of Subscription Sales

Logically the first point to be explained is the nature of a business which depends upon the proneness of human nature to enjoy the present and take some chances as regards the future. Books which are sold in this way should represent a reasonably large price in order that publishers and agents may reap sufficiently large returns. There is the familiar sale of encyclopedias and certain of the more expensive reference books. There is a vast industry which consists of selling standard sets. There are several companies which run plates of many standard authors. One company has two hundred and twenty-six titles, another one hundred and seventy, and these plates may be rented by an intending publisher, who can print from them on a rental of two to five cents each, or twenty to fifty dollars a thousand impressions. New sets of various kinds, representing old wine in new bottles, are being constantly manufactured, sometimes by publishers who sell or rent their plates and do not make subscription sales themselves. England is drawn upon, and, in spite of the enormous sale of certain standard authors like Dickens, Thackeray and Scott, there is rarely a time when there is not a promise of some new edition. The subscription publisher may make his own plates or buy them or lease them, or he may buy an edition of a set in sheets to be bound under his directions. The trade agent, as he is called, who represents the smaller phase of the business, will simply take a modest edition at a discount of sixty per cent. or sixty and five, and proceed to offer them through a few agents. Before doing this he may devise various schemes of embellishment in the way of impressive title-pages, colored illustrations and elaborate binding. An artist will be employed to color the original illustrations in water-colors, and a staff of art students will be set to work to copy these color models for the edition, thus providing the "aquarelle" and "fac-simile" and "hand-colored" plates which are usually made much of in the prospectus.

The variations in binding and illustration and styles of presentation afford too large a theme for this modest purview.

Exquisite Art Furniture

About One-Half Usual Price.

This beautiful quarter-sawed oak, genuine leather couch is our own special, exclusive design. We stake our carefully guarded reputation on the quality of its materials and workmanship, style and finish. Our mammoth volume of business makes the retailer's large profit unnecessary, consequently we can sell this very desirable couch for $29

A similar couch of equal quality retails usually for $50.00, sometimes $75.00. Our absolute guarantee safeguards against inferior workmanship or quality.

The frame is made of quarter-sawed oak, golden, weathered or Antwerp, birch or mahogany finish. It is extra heavy, well braced, and has heavy hand-turned ball feet. The spring is the same as used by U. S. Government. Cushions are made of genuine curled horse hair, the top containing seven rows of diamond tufting with handsome hand-tufting on the sides. The covering is of the very best quality of genuine leather. All leather is not dependable, some being made from the under or fleshy side of the hide, which has no natural grain, and although it is genuine leather it has no wearing quality. The leather used on this couch and on all of our leather furniture is the fibrous or grain side of selected hides. It is tough and will never wear out. This leather can be scrubbed with soap and water without in any way affecting its color or texture. Furnished in any of the standard colors: dark olive, maroon, red or russet. Weight 150 lbs. Order number R9501. Price $29.

LYON & HEALY, 10 Adams St., Chicago

It will be seen that the "trade agent" who buys an edition of perhaps two hundred and fifty or five hundred sets with the control of a given territory can start a business with a very small capital. Another publisher may rent plates for from three to five years and do his own printing.

The book-making publishers represent, of course, the largest investment of capital. The preparation of one well-known "Library" required three years and the services of a very large and a very expensive editorial staff.

Some years ago there was a demand for art books, and various galleries and collections of "masterpieces" were sold freely. Then the public became sated with art for a time, and renewed attention has been given to standard sets, libraries of selections of various kinds, libraries of science and literature, libraries representing the working out of some comparatively new plan, and a variety of historical and biographical collections. Of late a vast amount of material originally used as "trade books" has been prepared for subscription sale. This is often greatly to the advantage of book-buyers who are enabled to obtain in many cases really well made and handsome uniform collections.

Whatever the idea of the subscription-book set may be, the ability to sell it is a crucial matter. There is always a demand for the best book agents, but these agents will not take up with any "proposition" which does not hold a promise of fat returns. The alluring "prospectus" and "canvass," and the various forms of advertising literature which are prepared represent only a small part of the work involved.

If all goes smoothly, the ultimate returns are most satisfactory. But the weak point is the system of long time credits. The set of books must be bought or manufactured. Due preparations for sale must be made. The agent must have his commission as soon as a sale is made, and the chances are that he will offer an eloquent plea for an advance before any sale is accomplished. The payments by the book-buyers are extended over a considerable time, and it may not be until over half these payments are made that the actual expenditures are returned. The publisher therefore locks up a considerable capital and it returns to him slowly in spite of "discounts for cash." If too much capital is tied up in this way the result is an "overextension" which has resulted in conspicuous failure. Those accounts, or "leases" as they are called, are not readily available assets in most cases, although arrangements are sometimes made for discounting them. The elements of danger are sufficiently obvious, but with care and shrewd management the business has built up many fortunes.

A Parents' Handbook in Disguise

NINE librarians out of ten who receive a copy of Lilian Bell's new book, Hope Loring [L. C. Page & Co.], will catalogue it under "Works of Fiction." A work of fiction it undoubtedly is; and yet it may with equal propriety be considered a handbook on how to rear and how not to rear one's children; or again, a manual for young persons on the treatment of parents.

Hope Loring and her brother and sister are wholesome, healthy, likable young people whose up-bringing has been along the lines the author advocates. The Stuart boys and their sister Amy are creatures, or horrible examples, of less successful methods. Cuthbert is a hypocrite, "Stony" a scamp, and Amy an incurable liar. The author doesn't overblame Cuthbert for padding his college expense account with mythical expenditures on doctors, charities and clothes; nor "Stony" for forging young Loring's name; nor Amy for outlying Sapphira. On the contrary, she intimates that all three of them—who are likable in spite of their peccadillos—would have turned out as well as the model Lorings had their elders given them but half a chance.

The Lorings believed in treating their children like rational beings; in letting them live their own lives and build up their own individualities with a trained conscience as their sole master. Above all, they cultivated a fine spirit of charity and tolerance, and made family government effective by having as little of it as possible. The Stuarts' methods, like their results, were diametrically opposite.

Miss Bell's ideas are not new; but she presents them forcefully and agreeably; and until the millennium shall overtake us the preaching of charity and toleration will never be out of season.

The World's Best Music

If there is a piano in your home, you are constantly buying sheet music—and paying high prices for it. It lies in ragged piles around the house and becomes scattered and torn. You lose money by buying music in that way, to say nothing of your loss of time and temper when searching for a particular selection. Why not buy your music in volumes filled with the best selections, and thoroughly indexed? The "Library of the World's Best Music" is designed for your needs. Its eight volumes—sheet music size, but light and easy to handle—are crowded with the best vocal and instrumental music, carefully selected by an experienced corps of music editors. If you were to buy the music it contains one piece at a time, it would cost you over $200.00. Through our Musical Library Club—for a limited time—the entire set will cost you one-tenth of that amount, and you can pay in small monthly payments.

$1.00 A MONTH

The sets are in eight large volumes, 9 x 12 inches in size, attractively bound in half-leather or cloth. By means of an ingenious device in binding, the volumes open flat at the piano and remain open. A set contains over 400 illustrations, including numerous chromatic art plates, printed in ten to twelve colors. There are 2,200 pages of sheet music in the entire library. This magnificent musical Library, if purchased through our Library Club, will cost you only three cents a day.

IF YOU ARE A PIANIST you will find this collection of music invaluable. It contains 300 instrumental selections by the best composers, including popular and operatic melodies, dances, funeral marches, and classic and romantic piano music. Such composers are represented as Paderewski, Gounod, Sullivan, Mascagni, Wagner, Mozart, Balfe, and Liszt.

IF YOU LIKE MUSIC but do not play yourself, you cannot make a better present to your wife or daughter than a set of this musical Library. It means evening after evening of pleasure, for it furnishes in the most compact and simple form all the world's greatest music. This collection is to music what the encyclopædia is to knowledge—the best of all properly proportioned.

IF YOU ARE A SINGER the "World's Best Music" will increase your repertoire. It will place in your hands 300 of the best old and new songs, duets, trios and quartets, arranged for all voices and for piano accompaniment. The collection embraces all the old songs of your childhood days, besides the new and popular melodies of the last few years.

IF YOU ARE A STUDENT of music, you will find this Library more than half a musical education. The selections have been made by Reginald De Koven, Victor Herbert, Helen Kendrick Johnson, Gerrit Smith and others equally well-known in the musical world. As a musical cyclopædia it is unexcelled, as it contains 500 biographies of musicians and 400 portraits.

The Coupon Cuts the Price in Half!

Our Musical Library Club has secured an entirely new edition of the "World's Best Music" at a price slightly above the cost of paper and printing. On this account we are able to offer these sets at about one-half the regular prices—payable $1 a month. Through the Musical Library Club—direct from the publisher to the customer—you can secure a set for $21.00 in cloth binding, and $25.00 for the half-leather. These sets were previously sold for $35.00 and $40.00. The edition is small, so, to avoid disappointment in failing to secure a set, cut off the coupon to-day, sign it, and mail it to us. We will then send you a set (express paid by us) for examination and use. After five days' examination, if you are not satisfied, return the books to us at our expense. But, if you decide to keep the set, send us $1.00 at the expiration of five days, and $1.00 a month thereafter until the full amount is paid.

BOOK-CASE FREE We have a small number of elegant oakwood book-cases that are made especially to hold a set of the "World's Best Music." Their retail price is $4.00 each, but we have decided to offer them as premiums to prompt subscribers. To obtain a book-case free with your set, it will be necessary to send us your order before March 6th. If your order is received after that date, we cannot supply a book-case with the set, unless, of course, you care to pay the retail price of $4.00 for the case. This book-case is a present from us, and does not increase the cost of the music in any manner.

SEA SLANG

By Morgan Robertson

A SAILOR'S trade is never learned." This aphorism, oft quoted at sea, is proved by another—" Different ships have different rules." And with regard to the vast number of ships, built and rigged in different ports by men who speak different tongues, it is surprising that there are any rules at all, or that sailors learn in one ship anything of value in the next. Yet they do, and not the least among their acquirements is a knowledge of the vernacular—the names of objects, methods and happenings.

There have been many nautical dictionaries printed; but not one contains a half of the seaman's vocabulary. Such a book, to be in any sense complete and of value to the sailor, should be more than a dictionary—it should be somewhat encyclopedic in its nature, and give the synonyms, the different meanings of the same word, and the various forms of phrases which make sea talk as unintelligible to a landsman as a foreign tongue.

A student might learn from a dictionary that the word "luff," as a verb, is an order to the helmsman to steer nearer to the point from which the wind is coming; but as a noun it means the forward edge of a sail, the hauling part of a tackle, or a second tackle clapped on to this hauling part. Now for the combinations, which most dictionaries ignore. "Luff," "shiver the luff" and "hold your luff" have to do with steering, and are almost synonymous; but in the first order "luff" is a verb, in the second a noun (referring to the edge of the sail), and in the third the name of a condition.

"Nipper the luff," is an order used in tackle work, and means to bind, with the hands or a piece of small stuff, the hauling part of a tackle to its next part; and "fleet up the luff" is an order which might follow, but it would refer to fleeting, or shifting along for a fresh grip, of the other, or "luff" tackle. The best-known meaning of "fleet" is, of course, familiar to landsmen.

A Tale for Talking Toms

All sea talk must be terse and expressive. There is much of it, all necessary. Not only does each sail have its name, but each rope and block (there are no pulleys at sea) can be designated either by a name or number. An officer, inspecting a lofty tarring job through binoculars from the deck, may roar out to a man aloft: "There's a holiday on the after hitch of the third starboard mizzen topgallant ratline," and, provided that the man with the tar pot has caught all the words, he may go direct to the bare spot and touch it up. But this is a long-winded order. "Mind your holidays" is just as effective and saves breath.

There is a forecastle yarn, hoary with age, and probably of English origin, which illustrates the unwisdom of verbosity aboard ship. It is of a young graduate of a naval college, who for some reason made his first voyage as second mate of a merchant ship. He was a good, theoretical sailor and knew how to make sail, and this was his task on the mizzen as the ship towed to sea. Things went well with him until the topgallant sail was dropped and the men on deck began hauling out the sheets, when something jammed aloft and the starboard clew of the sail remained midway on its passage out to the topsail yardarm. The man aloft was not aware of it, and the young officer called up to him: "Proceed to the slings of the mizzen topgallant yard and there ascertain and remove the obstruction which prevents the starboard sheet from coming home."

The man aloft scratched his head, looked around and down to the deck, then answered, "Sir?"

The long sentence was repeated, and again the bewildered man answered, "Sir?" Then the second mate called to the bosun, a rough, rude man of no refinement, and asked him to "advise that sailor as to his duty." The bosun did. Funneling his hands he bellowed upward:

"You bloomin' son of a sea cook, overhaul that clewline."

"Aye, aye, sir," cheerfully answered the man, and the obstruction—a gasket pulled into the clewline block—was ascertained and removed at once.

This is merely a yarn, but it may have some ancient foundation in fact. Certain it is, however, that no officer in a modern ship could waste so much time and get the work done.

For some reason unknown to philology a sailor loves rolling syllables and the long sound of vowels. He will slur the last two letters in "north" and "south," saving breath and effort of vocal chords by saying "nor' nor'east," or "sou' west an' by west"; and another trick of the tongue, equally shipshape, is a variation of the word "north" to "nothe"; but a man who says this will pronounce "south" correctly. "Patent" and "tackle" are pronounced with the long sound of "a," unless, in the case of the latter, it is used as a verb, when it is pronounced as the dictionaries direct. "Composite," a legitimate word of the language, is applied to a wooden ship with iron frames, but it rolls off a sailor's tongue with the first syllable accented, and the vowel of the last given the long sound. There is reason for everything, and these pronunciations have evolved, no doubt, from the ease with which they may be given and understood in a hurry.

Though there are many other legitimate words of the language used in sea talk, they have meanings quite distinct from those ashore. There are "hounds," "horses," "bridles," "trucks" and "mangers" aboard ship, but a farmer would not recognize them, nor would his wife recognize the "scuttle" and the "bolsters." There are "trees," "whiskers" and "wings," and the latter have no more connection with the sails than have the much misunderstood "sheets." There is a "sheet" to every sail, but it is of rope or chain, not canvas, and it pulls down and secures the after, lower corner; or, in the case of a boom sail, it is a tackle attached to the after end of the boom. And the stern "sheets" of a boat are neither rope, chain nor canvas, but the space in the stern.

The Passing of the Old Ways

Among seafaring men a general opinion is gaining ground that a revision of the names of masts will be found necessary aboard the six and seven mast schooners coming into vogue. At present they are named from forward, as foremast, mainmast, mizzenmast (names centuries old), jiggermast, spankermast, drivermast (these three transposed occasionally) and pushermast. It is not that sailors cannot learn the ropes, for each mast is rigged like the next, and if he learns one he learns all; but on a dark night, when he cannot see but a mast or two, he is apt to get lost on the long deck, and if ordered to haul aft the mizzen sheet may go to the spanker instead. His only method of keeping track of himself, even in daytime, is to count hurriedly, from one end or the other; and in view of this it has been suggested that a sensible nomenclature would be one of numbers—number one mast, number two mast, number three, etc. The words are euphonious and roll easily off the tongue. "Haul aft the number six sheet" is just as intelligible and as easy to pronounce in a loud voice as "haul aft the driver sheet." If the men were forward when the order came they certainly would have to count as they ran aft, and if they were saved the trouble of a mental translation into the accustomed terms they would have clearer heads and easier minds.

The "Johnny-Haul-Taut," the youthful sailor who talks shop ashore and afloat, is much in evidence in the Navy, and does what he can to keep alive the dying vernacular of the sea. But the necessity for it left the Navy with the advent of the sparless warship.

Such expressions as "Shiver my timber," "Douse my toplights," and "Avast, my hearty" are as obsolete as the Wooden Walls of England within which they had their birth and development; but the word "avast," used as a synonym of the order "stop," as "'Vast heaving," or "'Vast hauling," is still in use; and the word "belay," an order to stop hauling and make a rope fast to a belaying-pin, is often used by Johnny-Haul-Taut as an injunction on a fellow-man to cease some performance which he is engaged in. He will say, "Belay your jaw-tackle" as a nautical synonymous expression of "Shut your mouth"; and on occasions will d——n your eyes, or his own, or those of his sister's cat with a fluency equal to that of the old sea dogs he has read about but never seen.

The old sea dogs are gone, and most of their picturesque vocabulary has followed them. What is left is found in the speech of very old and very young sailors of the Navy, and in that of merchant sailors in square-rigged ships. It will soon become a dead language; for the young blue-jackets will neglect it as they acquire sounder knowledge, the old will die off, and the square-rigged ship give way to the tramp steamer and the multimast schooner, in both of which an acquaintance with donkey engines is of more value to a man than the whole curriculum of old-fashioned seamanship.

JUST WHAT TO READ

Officially adopted by the Public Schools of New York City. Officially approved by the Regents of the State of New York.

IN THIS day of many books, and with teeming presses adding daily to the supply, it is often a vexatious problem as to what is best to read.

But suppose some great critic came to your relief? Suppose he called a convention of three hundred of the foremost writers to collect for you the world's best literature? That is just what Charles Dudley Warner did in

The Famous Warner Library

In forty-six superb volumes he has included the best of every author, living or dead, and the literature of every land.

Would you not feel, with the Warner Library in your home, that the problem of what to read was solved for all time to come?

READING FOR EVERY TASTE

Whether you like Humor, or Fiction, or Poetry, or Drama, or Essays—you will find an adequate supply of all here. No private library and few public libraries can equal the immense scope of the Warner Library. It is

A Complete Library In Itself

20,000 Pages In these wonderful forty-six volumes will be found the brightest thoughts of the greatest authors—complete novels and chapters in fiction, humorous sketches, poetry, philosophy, history, travel, science, oratory, letters and essays. Translations from Persian, Hindu, Greek, Latin and all the modern languages are included. In short, the thousands of large pages fairly teem with interest and delight.

7,500 Authors This is the only work containing a complete "Dictionary of Authors," giving the correct pronunciation of the name and relative rank of each writer, his character, the names of his books, and dates of publication. This unique feature is of immense value.

Critical Essays A distinguishing feature of the Warner Library is the series of critical and interpretative essays. Every great author of every land and time is discussed by some one of the foremost living writers, who selects his masterpieces. Thus Dr. Van Dyke writes on Tennyson; W. H. Howells on Tolstoy, etc., etc.

2,500 Synopses of Books This valuable feature is unique with the Warner Library. Brief descriptions of all the world's great books are given in the space of a few hundred words each. No one has read or can read all the books which come up in the course of conversation. But these synopses will give the busy man a gist of them all; not only novels such as "Robert Elsmere," "Ben Hur," or "Quo Vadis," but poems, dramas and technical works.

Course of Reading A systematic course of reading and study, equal to a four years' university course, has been prepared. It not only gives the system of reading, but furnishes the material itself, through the pages of the Library, and by means of an admirable Index. It is both teacher and text-book.

What Purchasers Say

Dr. E. W. Kellogg (Hartford): "A wonderful conception wonderfully executed."

Rev. Charles James Wood, LL.D.: "The value of such a work as this in the education of the people is beyond computation. If it be generally circulated and read, as I suppose that it will, the Warner Library will prove the force that starts a new epoch in the intellectual life of the American people."

Geo. C. Lorimer, D.D. (New York): "If these lines shall come before the eyes of any with whom I have influence, I do most certainly urge them to enrich their own library and also their own life by giving a prominent place to this magnificent triumph of literature. Not only will the contents more than amply repay for the expenditure, but the clearness of type, the style of printing and the handsomeness of binding will all combine to render enjoyable their possession."

The Law at Heart's Desire

of his right under the Constitution to bear arms, to assemble in public, and to engage in the pursuit of happiness.

"The prosecution," he said, "has introduced reference to a certain pig, alleging that it had been slain by the act of this prisoner." Not admitting that there had been any pig, since this fact was not yet proven; not admitting that his client had fired any gun, pistol, revolver or six-shooter, since that was not yet proven before the court; he none the less would defy prosecution to show him the first specific violation of any law or ordinance whatever. This was no meeting for the purpose of mere recrimination, but a meeting whereover was thrown the dignity and solemnity of the ægis of the Law. We were not here to assess value upon a supposititious pig, injured in a supposititious manner, and not represented here by any claimant whatever. No damage had been asked, no damage had been done, no law had been violated. Why, then, his client had been thus ruthlessly dragged into court, to his great personal chagrin, his loss of time, his mental suffering, the attorney for defense could not say. It was injustice of a monstrous sort! Prosecution might well feel relieved if no retaliatory action were later taken against them for false imprisonment.

When Dan Anderson sat down there was not a man in the jury who was not bathed in perspiration; whereby it was easy to be seen that abstruse thought was hard at work. Blackman, J. P., perspiring no less than any member of the jury, drew himself up, looking over his shoulder as though half in fear. There was Something—Something there, in that room! It had come there since Dan Anderson began to speak.

"Evidence f'r the State," the Judge finally managed to stammer, turning to the attorney for the prosecution.

But it never came so far along as that. There was a sound of many footsteps; voices came murmuring, growing louder. The door was pushed open from without, and in came much of the remaining population of Heart's Desire, so far as it could gain room. The man from Leavenworth was there, his whiskers wagging unintelligibly. McKinney was there; and Doc Walters, and Jimmie Jamison, and everybody else; and, pushing through the crowd, there came the Littlest Girl from Kansas, her apron awry, her hair blown, her face flushed, her eyes moist with tears.

"Curly!" cried she as at last her eyes caught sight of him. "Come right on out of here, this minute! Come along!"

What would you have? The Law is the Law, but there are such things as supreme courts in the administering of the Law. It was useless for Blackman, J. P., to rap and call for order. It had probably been useless for any man to undertake to stop the prisoner at the bar, thus adjured. At any rate he arose and said politely to the jurors, "Fellers, I got to go"—and so went, no man raising hand to restrain him. Each member of the jury told him afterward that he would have "come clear" anyhow, so that perhaps no actual injustice was done.

As to Dan Anderson, he himself admitted his wish that the case had gone so far along as examination of the witnesses. "I wanted to cross-examine," said he. He was an adventurous soul; yet it was perhaps just as well at that stage of progress in Heart's Desire that he did not cross-examine. That night, over by the arroyo, we met Curly and the Littlest Girl walking in the moonlight. Curly was quiet. The Littlest Girl was softened, tremulous, content. It needed no assurance to tell us that they were now soon to be married. Curly, pausing as we approached, mumbled some shamefaced thanks, quieting his natural humility and chagrin for the sake of many things. He also said something of pay.

"Curly," said Dan Anderson, his voice trembling, "I didn't do it for pay. I did it—I don't know why——"

An hour later Dan Anderson and I sat in the glorious flood of the light of the moon of Heart's Desire, and we fell silent, as was the way of men in that place. At length Dan Anderson turned his face to the top of old Carizzo, the restful, the impassive, the great, the content, the just. He gazed long without speaking, as though he plainly saw something there at the mountain-top.

"Listen," he whispered to me, half sobbing, a moment later, and his eyes did not quite keep back the tears. "She's there—the Goddess. The Law has come to Heart's Desire. May God forgive me!"

Go Where Comfort Is

You can't be comfortable at home and it is useless to try.

To be comfortable you must go where comfort is—California.

In California—even in midwinter—wraps and overcoats are unnecessary. The sun shines bright and clear, and there is just enough "snap" in the air to make it invigorating; just enough warmth to tempt you to spend all day and every day out-of-doors.

In California—even in midwinter—you can hunt, bathe and play golf. You can catch the biggest fish ever snared by hook and line. You can pick flowers, climb mountains, go a-picnicking, or stroll through the prettiest valleys in America; palms and orange groves all about you and the bluest of blue skies above you.

The way to go to California is via the Golden State Limited

Newest, handsomest and most luxuriously equipped of trans-continental trains.

Leaves Chicago daily at 7.45 P. M.; Kansas City at 10.40 A. M. Less than three days to Los Angeles. Through cars to Pasadena, Los Angeles, Santa Barbara and San Francisco. Lowest altitudes and most southerly course of any line across the continent. Compartment and standard sleeping cars; dining, buffet-library and observation cars. Electric lights; electric fans; bath; barber. Route: Rock Island and El Paso-Northeastern Systems, Chicago to El Paso; Southern Pacific Company, El Paso to Los Angeles and San Francisco.

Tickets and full information at all railroad ticket offices in the United States and Canada. Beautifully illustrated literature descriptive of California sent on receipt of six cents in stamps.

IF YOU COULD MAKE $5,000 FOR $6. A MONTH

TILL YOU'D PAID $510—WOULD YOU DO IT?

WE PUT the above startling headline at the top of our advertisement for two purposes—one to induce every reader of The Saturday Evening Post to at least read the advertisement through. Second, in the hope that at least half of them will let us tell our story and endeavor to prove that we have an investment in New York real estate which we believe will actually give you $5,000 in return for your investing $10 down and $6 a month until you have paid $510. We know we have the greatest proposition in real estate ever offered in the history of cities, and our difficulty is not to convince you, but to get the chance of presenting the fact to you.

$500 invested for a child may put him through college; $500 invested for a young married couple may come close to making them independent in their old years; $500 invested by a young man or a young woman will, in our opinion, pay them five times better than any life insurance they can possibly take out, and this $500 can be invested at $6 a month.

4,000 Investors Bought $3,461,000 Worth of our New York Lots During the Past Year

Nearly three and a half million dollars! that's the forceful story of our real estate sales during the year just ended. We ask you to dwell on these figures long enough to realize—to understand what they really mean. These three and a half million dollars actually represent the confidence which the thousands who have invested in our New York City lots have in us. You, perhaps, have not yet invested—not even investigated our wonderful proposition:—

"$10 Secures a $510 Lot in Greater New York"

COPYRIGHT, 1901, UNDERHILL.

Within 35 Minutes of These Skyscrapers, by Trolley, 5c.

This is a high class and strictly honest proposition, or you may be sure The Saturday Evening Post would not permit our announcement to appear. Nor would we have the privilege of referring to twenty odd National Banks, the Commercial Agencies, and over 30,000 customers all over the United States.

Doesn't it seem fair to presume that the same reasons which convinced so many thousands of practical thinking men and women everywhere of the undoubted value of our proposition, would convince YOU? Isn't it worth the time at least to send us your name to-day—and learn how you may possibly make $5,000 by paying $10 down and $6 a month until your payments amount to $510?

This may sound extravagant—yet every statement we make is based upon a fact. It is in evidence—it can be verified—it can be SEEN. Naturally we will be accused of being biased in our opinions—of painting New York's future in too rosy colors—but listen!

HERE'S THE OPINION AND ADVICE

OF ONE OF THE

World's Greatest Investors and Financiers, RUSSELL SAGE

(From the New York World of September 28th, 1902.)

"I do not think the future of New York can be depicted in terms any too glowing. The most fanciful writers cannot exaggerate the greatness of its future.

"A man who buys real estate in any of the five boroughs—of course exercising average good judgment—has a fortune before him. Brooklyn is growing at the rate of 75,000 people a year.

"Young man, buy real estate, especially acre property, in the outlying boroughs, and then work hard at your usual avocation. Your real estate purchases will make your old age comfortable." RUSSELL SAGE.

Our property is located in Brooklyn—it is therefore a very significant fact when Mr. Sage says "Brooklyn is growing at the rate of 75,000 people a year." Think of it! That means three-fourths of all of New York's enormous yearly increase of population.

FREE TRIP TO NEW YORK

As a guarantee of good faith, we agree with all persons living East of Chicago to pay you in cash the cost of your railroad fare to New York and return, if you visit our property and find one word of this advertisement a misrepresentation; or in case you buy, we will credit cost of the fare on your purchase; to those living farther away we will pay a proportion equal to round-trip Chicago ticket.

25% GUARANTEED INCREASE

For $10 down and $6 per month until paid for, we sell you a regular New York City lot, full size, subject to the following guarantees from us: If, at the expiration of the year 1903, this $510 lot is not worth $638—or 25 per cent. increase—based on the price at which our corps of salesmen will then be selling similar lots, we will refund all the money you have paid us, with 6 per cent. interest additional. If you should die at any time before payments have been completed, we will give to your heirs a deed of the lot without further cost. If you should lose employment or be sick, you will not forfeit the land.

"There is no doubt the property offered by Wood, Harmon & Co., in the 29th and 31st Wards, represents one of the best investments a man of limited income can possibly make within the corporate limits of Greater New York. It can be said without hesitancy that Wood, Harmon & Co. are perfectly reliable, and are worthy the fullest confidence of the investor, whether he resides in Greater New York or any other section of the United States. THE NASSAU NATIONAL BANK OF BROOKLYN."

We feel that we are the trustees of the thousands who invest with us, and as such we shall see that every dollar YOU invest with us shall bring you many fold. You have absolutely nothing to lose by writing at once for full particulars, or better still—mail us $10, the first payment on a lot, with the distinct understanding that we must return it to you if we have misrepresented our proposition in the slightest particular. Write under all circumstances. You would not be fair to yourself if you failed to look into this matter. Fill out the coupon and mail it to us to-day.

Americans of To-Day and To-Morrow

By Albert J. Beveridge

THE INSPIRATION OF BELIEF IN HIS COUNTRY AND THEN IN HIMSELF ON WHICH EVERY YOUNG MAN MUST BUILD A PERSONAL SUCCESS

A FINE young fellow in a Western college, with that secret desire to do large things with his life hidden away in his breast, as it is in the heart of most young Americans, said one day, after finishing a thesis on the great days of a former time in history: "Why could I not have lived in that day? Men did great things and did them well then. What sheer joy to be one of the people who dominate human events!" He had been studying and writing of one of the ruling nations of history. Another young fellow standing by replied: "That day is dawning for America. The best and biggest things that Rome did in her time and Greece and France, and later England, the American people will do; and we shall do our work as much better than they did theirs as our period is in advance of theirs. This Republic will be the determining factor in this world for centuries, never fear; and the beginning of our primacy in human affairs will occur during our lifetime. Oh! you and I live in a golden age. Fear not for the lack of mighty circumstances—these come in regiments and battalions—and they even now approach. Get ready for them—don't mope and grow sick with regret."

The first youth expressed the longing of every young American; the second youth the belief of every vital, vigorous young American. He spoke the belief, too, of the American people. More than this, he expressed what was even then the awakening thought of the far-seeing statesmen of other countries and what is now their settled conviction. For is not American conquest of the world the supreme concern of every Cabinet of Europe? But, most of all, he spoke the truth of the universal situation.

A great historian, speaking of the contradiction of English policy under Elizabeth and seeking to explain the disavowed craft of that great monarch as historically negatived by her documentary and ostensible policy, said that when she was compelled to play the chess game of international politics on the board, she played it well to the eye of the time; but that, to the eye of history, she was in reality obeying the instinct of the British nation in the large and general current of the purposes, interests and destiny of her people. She secretly helped, for instance, the Dutch "beggars of the sea," while she maintained a proper governmental attitude toward Spain openly. That is why Elizabeth is the monarch of monarchs to all English hearts; she expressed in her real policy and deeds the instinct of the English merchant, trader, farmer—the instinct of the English people. This instinct of a people—this massed and combined intelligence of a nation is seldom wrong. It grows out of their situation, of the ripeness of their hour in human history, of a subconsciousness of their strength and preparedness. And this national instinct of a people is better evidence of what that instinct tells us, and of the essential justice and righteousness of that instinct's conclusions than any individual's mere verbal demonstration to the contrary. If the American people feel and believe that they have now come to be the dominant factor in the affairs of the human race, that belief is better proof of that fact itself and a more reliable assurance of the beneficence of that fact, than all the essays to the contrary that could be written.

And just that is the settled conclusion of the twentieth century American.

America's Belief in Her Future

Put the plummet of your inquiry into the depths of a street-car driver's intelligence and you will find that his profoundest belief is that Americans are the greatest people in the world. Make like experiment with the farmer boy, and you will find a like result. Put the test to some merchant who has created a business, great or small; there, the same answer will speak to you. Take the coldest banker in the land, and you will find his greatest pride, exceeding the pride of gold, is that he is a citizen—a living part—of the dominant nation of the world.

Take another illustration: It is a curious but common experience of public speakers that, though different arguments are needed for different audiences, one familiar appeal affects all American audiences alike—the appeal to them as citizens of the first power of the world. A political orator of facility and resource told me that while campaigning in Dakota he found restlessness until he turned to the theme of the Republic as the master Nation; and the response was the enthusiasm of men marching to war. Conversely, whoever has witnessed a banquet of New York bankers notes that they receive the wit of their speakers with cordial laughter, the arguments of sound economists with tolerant but careless assent, and everything with a lukewarm indifference, until some trumpet voice sounds the note of American supremacy; and then the observer always beholds those men, in whom the counting-house is popularly supposed to have atrophied patriotism, spring to their feet like schoolboys and cheer like soldiers on the charge.

This same phenomenon of an almost religious faith in America's permanent destiny manifested in equal fervor in the most widely different types of communities and the most utterly unlike characters, reveals a profound truth—the truth of our national instinct that we are to be supreme and that our supremacy is already beginning.

This faith is not only the largest element in its accomplishment, but it is of practical and tangible value to every young American in his daily life and personal career.

Six years ago two young men, then respectively twenty-six and twenty-seven years of age, happened to meet in a little city of the Mississippi Valley. One was a young lawyer with the fortunate endowment of poverty. The other, similarly endowed, was a traveling inspector of a great insurance company. Neither held any position of consequence nor had achieved notable results. Both, however, were fairly aflame with this faith in the certainty of America's magnificent destiny already at hand. Each was inspired by the thought that he was to be a partner in and an instrument of that destiny. Said the young insurance man: "My brain whirls when I think of this country—its perfectly matchless position on the globe, its possibilities almost undeveloped and as yet utterly unguessed, the astounding growth of the intelligence and character of its multiplying millions. The opportunities for you and me, for every young man in the country, growing out of the expanding powers of this new Republic and its strategic position on the globe, from a commercial point of view, are so great and so many that they appall me. Men say that we have big railroads now; they are nothing to what we shall have. Men say that we have big business organizations now; they are puny to what necessarily must come, and that soon. Men fear the changeableness of popular sentiment; but it is gradually and even rapidly growing steadier, saner. And nothing is surer than the development of a national common-sense which will make America's voting millions the most conservative popular intelligence in the world. Men talk of over-capitalization of certain industries now—and no doubt there are such individual bubbles—but nevertheless, generally and broadly speaking, no mind in this country to-day is sufficiently comprehensive to over-capitalize the resources or the intelligence of the American people. The men who estimate their increasing consuming power at even a fraction of its reality; the men who calculate even crudely and absurdly short of the truth America's future in foreign trade, will make fortunes compared to which the fortunes of to-day are only transient bank accounts." And much more to like effect.

"What do you think of that young man?" said an old banker next day to the insurance inspector's lawyer acquaintance.

"I think he will be the first financier of America before he is fifty," was the answer. And the old banker smiled his patient smile of pity for youthful enthusiasm.

The Young Man Who Had Faith

Now note the event. That young insurance inspector was George W. Perkins, with whose astounding career every young American has become familiar. Astounding career? No, not astounding, but most natural and inevitable. Nothing has ever been denied, nothing ever will be denied to such a prince of faith, whoever he may be or whatever his fortune. The foundation of that noble success was just a sane comprehension of the real greatness of the Republic and its people. He had faith in America and the American millions. He had the sincerity of patriotism. And he succeeded. (But whoever knew success to be built upon the foundation stones of doubts and sneers?) This article is written in the hope of preventing cynicism in any young American and giving him the assurance of the veracity of his belief in the inevitableness of our country's primacy among the nations. No young American who feels this can well be unworthy of his membership in such a company of destiny. How dare he do less than his best! How dare he fail or refuse to contribute his uttermost to the grand sum of our national effort! How dare he be unworthy of that glorious pride which makes him say, whether he will or no: "I am an American; this is the greatest thing in the world."

Let us see whether this is merely the vainglory of national enthusiasm or whether the realities justify it. Let us imagine ourselves impartial observers, from some far height, of the rolling world below. The first thing we shall note is comparative national locations. England, so superbly located for insular security and maritime dominance when the affairs of civilization were confined to Europe, we now see disadvantageously located when those affairs are broadened over all the oceans and touch the shores of all the continents. No matter how splendid her work in the past, we are now talking of location with reference to the present. Then we see France literally wedged in between Germany and Spain. It was a fine situation when the Mediterranean was still the centre of human action. And the position of Italy at a like period was superb. But with the great past of Italy and France we have nothing now to do; we are studying present conditions. And, topographically speaking, their respective locations are not important from the twentieth century point of view. Germany we observe as a curious and limited coloring of the world's map, without advantage in position, embarrassed by immediate propinquity with hostile neighbors. The amazing vitality of the people who live in this little land, their wonderful organization of activities—commercial, scientific, military, maritime—the soul of their great Emperor which seems to gather strength from every subject and radiate that strength again to his people in vivifying streams of national hope and achievement—all these are matters of present and immediate concern; but these we must take account of presently. Let us now confine ourselves to geography. Viewing merely situation, then, Germany is not formidable. For present purposes neither is Russia, although the certainties of her future expansion will, in the sweep of the centuries, make her location perhaps the most advantageous of all. Now compare the location of the American Republic.

First of all, it is imperial in size. You can put all of Great Britain down in any one of several of its States. The same is true of Germany or France or any other power in the world excepting only Russia. The first thing, then, that compels attention is the immensity of the American Republic's dimensions

The Logic of Geography

It is imperially bounded, also. On the east is one of the world's greatest oceans; on the west is the other of the world's greatest oceans; on the south is the world's greatest gulf; on its north are the world's greatest lakes. Through its centre runs the world's greatest river; in its west are the world's greatest mountains, heavy with the world's richest mines. You will say at the first glance that here is a land designed by Nature for separate development, disconnected from the rest of the human world and untroubled with external affairs. Here, you will say at the first glance, is a location which compels the nation which occupies it to be an inland people.

Yes! But at second glance you will say the reverse. For look at its coast line. And then look at the coast line of the other five greatest maritime nations. The coast line of the Republic alone exceeds the coast lines of the other five put together. And its harbors—look at them; more in number than those of any other two maritime nations and unsurpassed in excellence on all the shores of all the seas. And behold, now, how cunningly the Master Contriver has placed these American harbors. Their locations are nothing short of triumphs of commercial and military strategy. New York, Baltimore, Philadelphia, Charleston, Boston, Mobile, New Orleans and all the harbors of the Gulf, San Francisco and the harbors of the Pacific—an impressive chain of ports, is it not? Harbors looking out upon Europe and inviting Europe; harbors looking out upon the Caribbean waters and the countries of South America and inviting them; harbors looking out upon the Pacific and the countries of the Orient and inviting them. Now consider ocean channels and currents; and then observe the nicety with which the Republic's sea-doors are located with reference to these; and, to sum up the whole situation, that man's reason is palsied who denies the conclusions of this syllogism of Nature.

A land capable of supporting a people defended from the rest of the world so long as they choose, its location is calculated to lead that people out over the world whenever they will. And so we see that in point of situation the country over which float the Stars and Stripes is perfectly placed not only for self-development but for world dominance. Immeasurable as Nature has made its inland opportunities, Nature has repeated and even magnified its ocean possibilities. And the observer, looking down as the globe rolls beneath him, says: "In point of location and opportunities springing out of mere situation, this land, of all lands, is the chosen one of fortune."

And so, the young American's sublime faith in his country's future springs, first of all, out of comparative geography. "Why, look where I live!" says the young American of to-day. "My home is on the very throne of things. If my nation is not the master of the world's circumstances, it certainly is not the fault of the Republic's location. Whose fault will it be, then, should such mastery not come to us? My fault and mine only. And my fault it shall not be. I will be worthy as one citizen of our opportunity—an opportunity so vast that it is difficult to comprehend." So, I take it, speaks every young American's heart to him; and in obedience to that voice he will find an inspiration, even for his individual career, which will make that career as large in proportion as his country's situation in the world; and an inspiration which will glorify that career with an ideal more exalted than any yet given to man.

An acute young American talking with a companion on this very theme said: "Quite true, splendidly true; but yet there is in it an element of national egotism which repels." "No, not egotism," said his companion. "It passes that; it reaches the plane of exaltation; it is a phase of faith which has in it something of the divine. No one calls our belief that we are the children of a universal God—the highest conception yet developed by human thought—no one calls that egotism. And this conception of our national dominance is nearly akin to that. But whatever it is, it is a fact (and that is the chief thing)—the largest fact in contemporary human circumstance."

The Acute Criticism of a Young German

Of course location is not all. Resources are even more important. They are not to be extensively reviewed in this paper—only attention called to them. The purpose is to acquaint the young American with the tangible foundations of his faith in his country and its future; for that faith is and will be his highest inspiration to personal effort. The purpose is to make him familiar with the elements of power everywhere around him which he can and must forge into an irresistible individual career. And as our country's regal position among the nations rouses pride in the young American's breast, so each young American thus making the very most of his individual career renders certain that national greatness, the dream of which is the motive power of his effort.

"I admire your country, but I admire your people less," said a young German in Berlin one night—a young man already marked as certain to be a large figure in future German statesmanship. He spoke with that frankness which, in other papers, has been noted as a singular and common characteristic of all essentially great men. It was a statement so at variance with the stereotyped phrase of foreign laudation when speaking to an American of the American people, that it was worth following up. So it was followed up. "I mean this," he said: "Your country has a situation in the world to which our German location is insignificant; you have resources to which our German resources are just nothing at all. Between German resources and American resources there is no comparison—only glaring contrast. Yet we compete with you in the markets of the world. We are rapidly passing you as a maritime power. We are able to do this because every bit of our energy is carefully organized. None goes to waste. Every ounce of muscle, every volt of nerve and brain power is devoted to specific ends along lines of least resistance.

"On the contrary, much as you boast of your organization you do not organize at all. What success you have is due to the incomparable richness of your country and to the sheer strength of your people. You waste, waste, waste—everywhere you waste. You waste energy; you waste resources; you scatter in effort. Take a familiar illustration—the trees out there in the street suggest one. We make land otherwise absolutely worthless pay enormously by scientific forestry; you cut your forests down like vandals in order that a few men may get rich in a few years. Thus a great source of what should be perpetual wealth is lost to you; your streams are dried up and your country loses incalculable millions by an almost barbarous lack of sensible management. Your activity is not the development of resources; it is the destruction of resources. With us it is the contrary. Our resources are small, as I have said, but they are conserved, nourished, made the most of; and, though they yield hundreds and even thousands of per cent. more in proportion than yours do, instead of diminishing them we increase them."

That conversation was better than the reading of many volumes, and pointed out an undoubted weakness in our individual and national method; but it admitted—and that is the purpose of reproducing it here—the incomparable magnitude of our natural wealth.

It is useless to give the figures. The statistics of our agricultural products, of our mineral output, of our manufacturing industry more than amaze us. They simply stun the intellect; the understanding is paralyzed in its attempt to grasp them.

The point is that the young American finds himself in a country unrivaled in its world location; but also he finds himself surrounded by multitudinous resources so great that no mind has yet even grasped their immensity. These are his tools; these are his commission direct from Nature itself appointing him the master craftsman in human affairs now and for some centuries to come. And it is these which command him to be as large and as hopeful and as conqueringly vigorous in his personal life as are the elements of greatness with which fortune has endowed his country. Optimism is too poor a word for what ought to be the attitude of the young American's mind. That which in the citizen of another country would be neurotic exaltation is, to the young American, only the normal—and the only normal—state of his intellect and aspiration.

The Practical Author

WHEN the making of so-called literature is pursued as a practical calling the illusions are few. Readers who have been moved to tears or laughter are oftentimes much better off if they are not admitted behind the scenes. Naturally there are differences. The death of Colonel Newcome is no less touching because Thackeray has told us how he himself mourned the gentle hero's passing. No one thinks the less of Thackeray because he slapped his leg and exclaimed, "That is a stroke of genius!" after describing the admiration roused in Becky Sharp for her husband by the latter's defiance of the Marquis of Steyn. But Thackerays are rare. On the other hand, there is the strenuous task of producing a salable product. This has curious phases. A prolific writer of juvenile books once described the return of a boy to his mother after a long captivity among the Indians. "I have returned!" exclaimed the boy.

"Welcome, my son," said the mother; and the curtain fell. But the editor to whom the story was submitted shook his head. "Is that all they could do after the boy rose from the dead?" he asked. "No ejaculations, no heart-throbs, no tears!" Then he went on to point out the chance for a pathetic and dramatic climax. "There must be real tears," he said. "The mother must palpitate with emotion. The boy must be visibly agitated."

"All right," said the author cheerfully, "I'll shed some real tears." Off he trotted with his manuscript to return later with a most pathetic and touching climax in which the mother's love and surprise and the boy's joy and excitement were amplified at length. The closing pages have formed one of the most popular features of a successful book.

There was a novel of adventure once upon a time which closed with the usual plighting of troth. The adventure was good, but the plighting would have muffled the eagerest of wedding bells. Several efforts led to no better results and the author confessed himself better at war than love-making. Time pressed, and finally the editor modestly did the plighting himself, the author approved, and the book appeared. A young writer who had been asked to produce a first book saw fit to make the poisoning of a rival an incident of college sports. It was pointed out that though football players may do worse things to each other, they do not use poison in actual life. By dint of argument the lethal draft was done away with and the story rewritten on a practical basis. There was once a novel wherein the noble red man appeared in almost every chapter. He not only appeared but he talked in the peculiar pigeon-English which no red man has ever been known to use. Otherwise the story contained adventures with an amount of thrill which was worth preserving. And so the author and editor fell upon the savages with a blue pencil and enforced the aphorism that "there is no good Indian except a dead Indian."

In these few cases practical suggestions proved of use in the manufacture of books, but on the other hand, the author may be the more sagacious judge even from the worldly point of view. For the untried or preoccupied writer there exist many so-called "bureaus of revision," which are presumably good, bad and indifferent according to their lights. Thither come the aspiring débutantes, the experimenters, with tales and verse, and also those who have done more substantial work but without preliminary training. There is also a publishing which is done at the expense of authors. As a matter of fact, every large publishing house issues what are termed "authors' books," but the number is usually small. However, there seems no good reason for this restriction. With the growth of successful authors in prosperity and confidence perhaps this will be the business of the future.

The criticism that authors are not practical no longer holds. From "up the Hudson" comes a report that John Burroughs has marketed sixty tons of grapes from his vineyard this season. In Los Angeles Charles F. Lummis, ethnologist, explorer, author and editor, has built his adobe house with his own hands. In Indiana Mr. Booth Tarkington has not only been elected to the Legislature but he has proved his modesty by selecting a rear seat in the legislative chamber. Mr. E. C. Stedman's long career on the Stock Exchange was closed only a few years since. The author of to-day is more likely to be a man of affairs than a recluse.

Another practical phase of authorship is shown in efforts at a realism based on experience. A New York author once had occasion to describe an exciting foot-race. He was not an athlete, but in order to realize the feelings of his hero he went out at night and ran at full speed around the block. The effort was not wholly successful for he reached his goal in a state of exhaustion with a policeman a close second.

THE UNSILENCED TONGUE

A STUDY IN CRIME

By Arthur E. McFarlane

WHEN the Judge did finally come in at half-past two, not only had the others finished luncheon and every slice of bass and potato-ball that had been fried for luncheon, but Ciprien was down on the beach washing up, and the rods were again in the double skiff, twitching for an afternoon with the Long Channel 'lunge.

The old gentleman laboriously unlimbered. From his creel there curled half a dozen spreading pickerel tails. He had plainly had good sport, and his full and ruddy countenance beamed like a hoary fox-hunter's in an old English print. He had a string "to talk about," and an appetite more than capable of filling in all the pauses.

Then he waddled around to the other side of the supply-tent, and his eyes fell upon the clean-swept superficies of that pine-slab table. The curtain-change which took place upon the stout, judicial countenance was astonishing. "You—ah—you didn't wait?" he said.

"We waited an hour and a half," replied Doctor Fergusson. "And then, after yesterday and the day before——" He stepped offensively into the boat.

"Besides, you absolutely forbade us to, you know," said the Colonel, and followed the Doctor.

He had forbidden them to; but among those who are, at least by presumption, gentlemen——

"Oh, go on, now, Isaac," said Vanderdecken; "don't you pretend you're sore on us. Why, you're a cordon bleu beside Ciprien here; and you've brought back pickerel enough to feed the multitude. And really, you need this lesson, too." He gave the push off, and they pulled shamelessly away.

The Judge watched them go with all the consolidated dignity of the whole Supreme Court. If they counted upon his showing temper they were most wonderfully mistaken. He could thank Heaven, he could thank Heaven fervently, that his twenty years on the bench had given him a philosophy which could contemplate actions so picayune, so contemptible, so utterly detestable, with the calmness, nay, with all the interest of the entomologist examining a new specimen!

He went to the supply-box to hunt out the pepper and salt.

It was a little hard, though, that after thirty years Vanderdecken should act so. And gratitude of even the most ephemeral sort called for something better. For only the week before, when they had sent Ciprien back to the Landing for more stuff, had he not dried dishes for him when it was not his turn on four different occasions? And when "Vander" had persisted in leaving him the frying-pan to scour, had he said anything that was not meant chaffingly? And now he had turned against him with the others! Well, he could manage for himself and say nothing. But just this, though: he was systemically prone to apoplexy; he had felt it for years. And if, after straining himself to cut wood and stooping over the heat of the fire to cook—if, just when they were returning he should suddenly be knocked over—huh—that would be something of a joke on him, something of a joke! Perhaps, then, the lesson he needed might not seem quite so well advised!

And then he came to a full stop. His groping fingers had uncovered the last three treasured tins of potted tongue! Oho, oho! There were other ways of taking lessons. He was already using the can-opener, making those trenchant zigzags which they had always found so amusing. He could see them now, coming back smirking and snickering. "Well, Judge, what did you have for dinner?"

"Oh-h, tongue; a tin of tongue." (He would answer them quite calmly.)

"Tongue! A tin of tongue!"

"Why, yes, of course. I took it for granted you meant me to take a cold dinner. I hope I didn't err, gentlemen."

Ha, that was good, superlatively good! He spread his bread and butter and turned half the tin out upon his plate. And as he ate of it he smacked the table at intervals and went over that dramatization of their empoisoned home-coming a second, a third, a fourth time. . . .

But the fourth time—he had laid down knife and fork, let out his belt, and begun peacefully to fill his pipe—he seemed somehow to get the heart-burn of their point of view more sympathetically. They had deserved it, more than deserved it; but perhaps, after all, he would have been wiser, at any rate kinder, to spare them. He could, however, greatly soften it by pretending he had eaten the whole tin, and then suddenly producing the other half. Yes, that would be the right way out of it, to give it that humorous and jocular turn.

But then, might not even that be interpreted wrongly? Why chance hurting their feelings at all over a miserable, greasy, little tin of tongue—which would probably never be missed, anyway. The thing was infra dig. Better to blot it out and forget it altogether.

Flushing unreasonably, he picked up a stone, crammed it in on the remaining strata of meat, and carried it up shore to the "Tarpeian Rock"—the little six-foot precipice of granite from which they took their morning plunge. But as he swung back the tin to send it far out into the bay the ragged top caught on his coat-sleeve; it fooled, went hardly five yards and fell into the "Kettle." But it was gone, that was the main thing.

THERE WERE OTHER WAYS OF TAKING LESSONS

II

WHEN the others returned for dinner the Judge had not only washed up his dishes, but he had gathered wood enough to last the camp a week.

"Oh, he's certainly aimed to work the coals-of-fire roast, all right!" exclaimed Vanderdecken. "Of all the low-down, revengeful members of the judiciary——"

"Never mind," said the Colonel, "never mind. We'll make him eat the liver wing of that 'lunge to-night. If we did the right thing we'd open a tin of tongue for him."

The Judge smiled deprecatingly.

"How'd you make out, anyway?" asked the Doctor.

"Oh-h—oh, well enough."

"Your pickerel good?"

"Well, not so bad, not so bad."

During dinner the last of the Worcester sauce was used up, and the Doctor went for another bottle.

"Why," he said as he came back with it, "there are only two tins of that tongue now."

The Judge set down his cup of tea.

But Vanderdecken was in the middle of an Indian tradition of some ancient apple trees said to have once grown far north in the Thunder Bay district. And that reminded the Colonel of a story that the Indians had, three hundred years ago, carried apple seeds up the Mississippi from New Orleans to Michigan. Then the Doctor tried again for an opening, and again the Judge's internal machinery came to a sickening stop.

But the Colonel in his turn declined to cut his story in two, even for the consideration of precious tins of tongue. And when that loss was again forced into the conversation, Vanderdecken was deep in one of his favorite subjects, the reliability of traditions in general. Twice the Doctor determinedly interrupted him, the second time with an exasperated and rather irrelevant offer to give them proof that there had been three tins at the last stock-taking.

"Fergusson," said "Vander" wrathfully, "go 'way forward and sit down on yourself! Maybe there were three tins, maybe there were. I, too, understood that we'd left three. But I wouldn't undertake to prove it in court. And if this is your day to prove things, what about that fifteen-foot diving you still claim you did up at Gull Lake?"

"Yes—heh, heh!" exclaimed the Judge with a sudden burst of vindictiveness that made the others gape. "Let's hear you prove that!" Then he rose and betook himself up to the Point. His spirit was a seven-times heated furnace, and he felt that he must spend the next half-hour holding "imaginary conversations" with the Doctor. Again and again during dinner—even after the Colonel had thrown out that contemptible innuendo about opening another tin—he had really been just about to confess to that tongue; he had felt that in another moment he could do it lightly and facetiously. But now—Fergusson had driven him almost to the point of equivocation, he confessed it, almost to the point of equivocation. And "Vander," too. "Vander" seemed to think that he asked to be shielded! He had even——

It was Vanderdecken himself who broke in on him. "Isaac, old boy," he said, "forgive me if I intrude upon an hour of soul-communing. But I didn't come of myself. I was driven out here. The Doctor is more relentlessly on the trail of that sanguinary tongue than ever." The Judge's pipe turned in his mouth. "He's been over counting the empty cans on the rubbish heap. And when he could find only three of the half-dozen we brought, I believe, on my soul, that he came away firmly convinced that you'd emptied the other one this afternoon and thrown it in the lake."

"Heh, heh! Heh, heh, heh!" (The second laugh, if it still grated hollowly, was a vast improvement on the first.) "A—a queer sort of man he must think me!" Then he choked and fell into a tongue-tied silence.

When at length they walked back to camp he was loathing himself beyond all expression—but not beyond what he loathed Fergusson.

From the bivouac the voice of the Colonel called to them despairingly: "Judge, oh, Judge! if you love me, for Heaven's sake come here and tell the Doctor that you didn't eat that other tin of tongue!"

The old gentleman's eyes bulged, and his fingers worked as if he already had Fergusson by the gizzard. "No!" he roared; "no, I did not eat that other tin of tongue!" Then he gasped at himself, and with the others gasping at him he made a miserable retreat to bed.

There are depths of shame, of self-contempt and spiritual abasement which it is for no story-teller to lay bare. An hour afterward, when the others knocked out their pipes and one by one turned in, the Judge made a pretense of sleep so that he might not have to speak to them. But only fifteen minutes more and no one could have thought their slumbers a pretense. They possessed that most blessed of things, a good conscience, while he, faugh!—after years of considering himself incorruptible, he had forsworn himself on the first temptation—had done it willfully, instantly—had shouted the lie to the very heavens! He kept turning over and over as if he would get away from himself. . . .

Yet it was done now. And, after all, might he not hope to draw some good from it?—some fuller charity toward the weak and erring? In the past, perjury had been the one offense to which he had shown no mercy. Hereafter he would realize that the false swearer may escape penal conviction only to be tormented by the infinitely greater miseries of the mind. Nay, how often must the tortured wretch almost wish that he had left behind him some clew that would lead to his detection. . . . Then he suddenly halted, and felt the cold dew come out fore and aft his ears; he had just remembered that he had not wiped off the tongue-smeared can-opener!

For minute after minute he lay there in breath-stopped listening. The nasal and cacophonous chorus about him was threefold, but was it genuinely the voice of slumber? Those long-drawn respirations from Fergusson's corner, did not they sound feigned and exaggerated? Was his self-betrayal being waited for? For another five minutes he lay motionless. Then at last he nerved himself to it. He rose, slipped through the open flaps into the moonlight, and noiselessly crossed the camp to the supply-tent.

When he stole back again, scattering a wisp of wire-grass behind him, he was still on tiptoe, but inwardly he was fiercely a-leap with exultation. "So the Doctor—curse him and all his sniffing, nosing kind!—thought himself a Sherlock Holmes? Well, he had to do with some one just a little cleverer, just a little cleverer!" When he fell asleep his face bore a smile of grim, triumphant satisfaction.

III

IT WAS evident to all next morning that the Judge was in a much better temper, though he once more elected to go off alone to his pickerel holes.

But he did not again return late for luncheon. Indeed, he pulled back an hour before the others. And he was impelled by a nervous fear as besetting as it was palpably ungrounded. They had noticed nothing when they had taken their matutinal plunge. But still, there was just a chance. He slowly pushed the skiff in to the "Kettle," and peered over the gunwale. And now he could see something very plainly. From the depths of the sombre "muskeg water" a bronzy gleam blinked up at him as from a jaundiced and accusing eye!

"And they say they could tell any can I'd opened among a million," he muttered cankerously. "Well, I'll put you where you'll not be seen again, this time." He knotted another lead to his line just above the hook, and dropped it in like a grapnel.

But the barb would not catch. Even after he had paid out the heavy limestone fishing-anchor he could not seem to grapple steadily. And apparently the top and the sloping sides of the can were uppermost. He tried again and again, and had been at it for almost a half-hour when his head was sent up with a horrible jerk by the Colonel's fog-horn hail from campwards. "Oh-h! Oh-h! Unprofessional! Crooked, effeminate, and vilely unsportsmanlike! Fishing with a hand-line and watching the victim take it!"

The Judge drew up his grapnel, cackling tremulously. In the bait-box at his feet there were still some emaciated worms. He rapidly thrust one on the hook.

"Getting anything for your sinfulness?"

"No-o—not as yet." He dropped the line in again, and in ten seconds he was fighting a four-pound yellow bass!

"Hooroo! Me too! Me too!" shouted the Colonel, and in another twenty seconds he had a line in from shore. They caught bass about for the next half-hour, and the old gentleman's reflections need not be unduly specified.

A few minutes later the others arrived, and they joyously dropped the anchor of the two-oar boat beside the Judge's skiff. Here, by the living twisters! was a place where they could pretty near toss their fish from the water into the frying-pan! And but for the instincts of genius in "Foxy Grandpa" they'd probably never once have thought of trying there! The Judge turned away his head to reflect on that ancient question—the real nature of genius.

Vanderdecken continued to fish on for some time after the others had tired and come ashore. When finally he joined them at the luncheon-table he mentioned casually that there was something shining, in a rusty sort of way, on the bottom out there. (There was one at that table who felt his most vital organs shift and congeal.) "An old tin cup, I should say," added "Vander."

"Not unlikely," said the Colonel.

Nothing more was said until the Doctor had another of his afterthoughts. "I shouldn't have imagined, though, that you could see anything on bottom there, in this saffron-colored water, and in a pot-hole like that, especially."

"Oh, it takes only thirteen or fourteen feet of line. And say now, Doc, isn't this a chance for you to confirm that diving record of yours? We couldn't expect you to bring up a ten-ton glacial boulder; but if you're good for fifteen feet you ought to be able to get that cup."

"All right," said the Doctor; "I am, and I take you! I may scare the branchiostegal rays out of any unfortunate yellow bass still remaining there, but you'll be drinking to my truthfulness out of that cup to-morrow at breakfast!"

There is a point in the psychology of those who may be called "criminals of high mentality" when, in the sudden and paramount necessity of defeating discovery, every nerve stretches at once to its fullest tension, every brain cell becomes quiveringly alive, and for the time all remorse is completely swallowed up in a kind of fevered exhilaration. Throughout the remainder of that meal the Judge evinced such gayety and spirit as had not appeared in him for days. He showed no tremor. He joked, he laughed. There was a light in his eyes which might almost be called a glitter.

And the truth was that he had already formed a second and this time a saving plan. In another hour they would all be away from camp again. And then—ten minutes more and he would have that accursed "cup" smashed and obliterated in its nether gloom under half a skiff-load of 'longshore stone!

But a thunderstorm came down on them before Ciprien had finished washing up, and the after drizzle kept on hour after hour. No one left camp all afternoon!

IV

YET, even then, did the Judge give up? A thousand times no! Next morning the first cold line of pink had scarcely barred the shivering East when he was climbing swiftly and stealthily into his bathing-suit.

A minute later he was poising on the "Tarpeian." In the thick rotundity of his black-and-yellow banded suit he much resembled a huge bumblebee. But upon his face was an expression of implacable defiance and resolve such as Lucifer might have worn when about to take his leap into Chaos. So the Doctor thought he could take away his honor, nay, the honor of the whole New York bench, by one fifteen-foot dive, did he? Well, there were others who had done some diving in their time, though they did not brag eternally of it. And he launched himself downward in a header that should have fathomed the Kermadec Deep itself!

Alas, it is doubtful if he got even his own length nearer the Antipodes. He came up snorting with rage, and sent himself down again.

Equally vain! He tried it a third time, a fourth, a fifth—hopeless! Hopeless to the point of absurdity! "Gar-h-h!" he guttered. "One would think I was full of cork—a float, a buoy! Gar-h! I'm a balloon—a gasometer!"

He was still rabid in inward self-objurgations when the others came pattering out. Then the Doctor began to dive.

He touched the "cup," touched it twice. But for all his trying he failed to bring it up.

He said he would do the trick next morning, however. For the remainder of the day he stayed reflectively about the camp and caught more yellow bass from the "Kettle."

That night the Colonel was awakened by some one clattering among the "niggerheads" along the edge of that same interesting "pot-hole." He rose wonderingly. It was the Judge, and it called for no second glance to see that he was walking in his sleep. It did not take them long to hale him back to the tent and his bed again; but the incident left the Doctor considerably disturbed.

"He hasn't been his usual self for some time," he said to the others, on the first chance to speak to them alone. "I'm going to take him into consideration for the next few days. And you see that he isn't left too much to himself."

The Judge could honestly say that he was neither too imaginative nor hypersensitive; but throughout the days which followed he could have sworn that the others were watching him! From every side he felt suspicion blowing chill upon him as the grip-ridden victim ever feels a thousand icy drafts on neck and nape and spine! He could no longer, by any excuse or subterfuge, get them to leave him alone in camp again. Sometimes Vanderdecken stayed, and sometimes the Colonel, but oftenest it was the Doctor—gar-h!—it was the Doctor! A dozen times a day he could feel his maddening professional eye triumphantly upon him. When he dived the Judge's soul went sickeningly up and down with him like the indicator on an elevator shaft. And he continued to dive with a persistence simply diabolical.

There was a time when the Judge's slumbers had been of a full, Falstaffian somnolence. Now, hating Fergusson kept him awake for hours. Once only did sleep afford him any pleasure. That was when he dreamed that he had waited in the skiff for the reappearance of that accursed water-sleek head, and halved it with the kitchen cleaver!

But even the Doctor's perseverance had its limit. On the third day he had Ciprien get out his old foot-knotted trolling-line and plumb the "Kettle." It registered just twelve foot five!

And then the others shouted. O-o-oh! Twelve foot five—and he made his Alfred-David that he'd done fifteen! Oh, bevings, what mendacious mendacity!

"I said that it could hardly have been less than fifteen," expostulated the Doctor.

"Well, that was prevarication by inference! It was suggestio falsi!"

"And by letting it continue uncorrected it became suppressio veri, which is worse."

"And now it's the whoppero ipso facto! Isn't that right—isn't that right, Judge? You ought to be able to give us the statutes entire on this delicate point."

The Judge's mouth fell open, and he glared like ghosted Macbeth in the banquet scene. "What? What? I see no reason—— How dare you——"

After that the Doctor assured Vanderdecken and the Colonel that he would give his most earnest attention to the old gentleman henceforward. And to the camp in general he announced rather unnecessarily that he would do no more cup-diving.

But, most astonishing to relate, it was as if that outburst had altogether cleared the Judge's brain of its inexplicable atrabiliary fogs. By luncheon he was beginning, however avertedly, to come into the conversation again. He offered no apology for his explosion, but he was plainly aching to have them forget it. By night he was shamefacedly attempting to chaff and joke once more. And in another three days, save for a curious antipathy to bathing or fishing in the "Kettle," and a certain stiff tardiness in renewing friendly relations with the Doctor, he was himself again.

V

YET the worst was still to come! On the night of the following Monday the Doctor suddenly threw up his head after a long period of brow-knit meditation. "Why," he exclaimed, beaming, "it's just occurred to me that at Gull Lake I did my diving in the afternoon. And, Gad, you know, from all physiological standpoints a man is certainly at his best then."

If the Judge had not been sitting with his face away from the heat of the fire the monstrous effect which this harmless speech had upon him could never have escaped general notice.

"And I'm going to have one more go after that cup, anyway. To-morrow, at four-thirty, expect something to happen."

"Ha!" said Vanderdecken—"Ha! Methinks it soundeth like the voice of the warning spook in a fate tragedy!"

It was! It was! Again the Judge's inward machinery had slowly stopped, with palpitations, icy sweats and horrid qualms.

Yet he managed for all that to get away to bed without drawing any attention to himself.

Nor, shortly after dawn next morning, did the Colonel crawl from his blankets any the more expeditiously when he saw the old gentleman's bumblebee bathing-suit disappear through the flaps toward the "Kettle." In fact, it was only by the merest chance that he had risen for a sunrise plunge himself.

Therefore, he was the more completely horror-stricken and aghast when he stepped out of the tent to behold the Judge stand up in the skiff, twist the anchor-line, with its twenty-pound limestone slab, about his arm and drop overboard with it!

He stopped only to emit one camp-rousing shout of terror, and reaching the "Kettle" in three leaps, sprang in. Then throwing his shoulder over the gunwale of the boat to get a leverage, he gave one long and desperate tug upon the rope. Next moment the Judge burst up, blowing like a harpooned walrus. Yet, wholly incredible as it may appear, upon getting eyes upon his rescuer, he gave an exhibition of ferocity quite indescribable—not to say unwarranted! By the Colonel's own statement he struck at him; and, whether he mistook in that or no, it is very certain that when the others had rushed night-togged down to the "Kettle," "Foxy Grandpa" was heaving forth such language as might well have read him out of the comity of gentlemen. Nor were his words those of the would-be self-destroyer, who, when he has at last thought himself safely out of this weary world, wretchedly beholds himself called back into it again. His execrations were of that studied and protractedly fulminant order of vituperation which bespeaks sanity in the most offensive degree.

Indeed, Vanderdecken and the Doctor fell upon each other's necks and yelled at any thought of self-destruction at all. As for the Judge himself, he refused with further obloquy to offer any explanations, and went sputtering and purple of countenance to the tent.

"Very well! Very well!" said the Colonel; "I'm sure I can laugh at his insults and ingratitude! And by all means let us say that it was nothing serious again. Let's say that he was just going pearl-diving! He was certainly rigging himself after the South Sea method. But don't say I haven't given you warning!"

"Oh, well, now," said Vanderdecken, "I humbly ask pardon. And I'm going up to Long Channel to troll this morning. I'll make "Foxy" come along and pull some sense into himself. But, oh Lord, Colonel, oh Lord, you know——"

Vanderdecken did make the Judge go with him. And between them they caught three fair-sized 'lunge, to say nothing of getting half a dozen of the huskiest kind of strikes. But not for two minutes at a time did he succeed in bringing the old gentleman out of the settled and brooding taciturnity into which he had fallen. It was a great relief when, at the head of the channel, they met young George Hastings and the Electra.

George was fooling along on his way back to Pickerel Landing, and he made them come aboard and lunch with him. It was a good luncheon, and he was full of the gossip of civilization. Then for a time they trolled from the Electra and with more success. Yet through it all it was evident that the Judge's thoughts were still nervously and morosely otherwhere. . . .

In the mean time, the Doctor and the disgruntled Colonel had spent the morning in a long-projected tramp through the bush to Dead-Man's Portage. And in the afternoon they lay around and snoozed under the cedars. But by three o'clock the Doctor began to find time hanging heavily upon his hands. He put in an hour tinkering and fledging spoons. Then he remembered there was something else he had intended to do. He wandered up to the "Kettle" and gazed prospectively into the clear water. . . .

George Hastings insisted on bringing Vanderdecken and the Judge home in the launch. He had pushed in as near shore as the uncharted reefiness of the bay permitted, and "Vander" was already climbing back into the skiff, when there went up a burst of exultant whoops from camp. The lank and dripping figure of the Doctor was doing a tarantella on the "Tarpeian" and he was brandishing aloft something which shone in the afternoon sun with a hard, triumphant brazenness!

"George," said the Judge suddenly and chokingly, though he tried hard to smile, "you said you were going right on to the Landing, didn't you? Do you think you could get me there in time to catch the stage and connect with the seven-thirty Southern? I wouldn't delay you to go in for my clothes and stuff."

"Why, Great Scott, yes, but——"

Vanderdecken all but sat down over the side of the skiff. "Well—fe-ru-sa-dem, Isaac, what——"

The figure on the "Rock" threw up its legs and whooped again. The Judge's expression became that of a man who is just about to have a recurring succession of apoplectic fits.

"Won't you," begged Vanderdecken, "won't you just come in and see the Doctor for a minute before you go?"

"'Go in and see the Doctor?' The scoundrel! The—the d-d-d——d hound! If I did go in I—I—I'd break his face!" He turned his eruption of rage upon young Hastings. "And now, sir, unless you consider me either crazy or intoxicated, will you be so good as to head for the Landing?"

"George," cried Vanderdecken, "I beg of you—you see how it is—don't think of it. Don't move an inch." He lifted his voice shoreward in a yell. "Colonel!—Fergusson! Quick! Come out here! Quick!"

It was not often that the Doctor lost his professional coolness; but when he jumped into the boat after the panic-faced Colonel, his hand still unconsciously grasped the trophy he had just won from the bottom of the "Kettle." It was one of his own old Golden Leaf tobacco boxes!

And when they reached the Electra that trophy was the first thing the Judge's madly-rolling eyes settled upon. And then—astounding end and anti-climax of an astounding series of incidents!—the old gentleman's countenance again underwent a complete and utter alteration. It changed like one of those red-rubber faces advertisingly squeezed between the thumb and finger of the street-corner hawker—first a paralyzed relaxation of bilious and flaming wrinkles, then a slow, transmogrified opening of mouth and eyes, and finally a rearrangement of lines into a sunrise roundness and effulgence nothing short of caricature. "Boys," he stuttered—"heh, heh—heh, heh, heh—I've been putting up a joke on you. I, I, I—when you hear it it'll be the laugh of your lives. I just wanted to see—to see if I couldn't scare 'Vander.' And I'll tell you the rest of it later."

But he never did tell them the rest of it.

Perhaps in the life of every man there has at some time flowed what may be called an underground river of guilt. And some of these dark, subterranean currents, contrary to all the moralists, never do rise to the surface and to final, well-merited exposure. But what one of us, if he have true charity, will not say that it is often better so?

The Great Showman

P. T. BARNUM, Showman! What memories are recalled by the magic of that name! What an annual delight he was to our parents and grandparents in the long ago when they were boys and girls! How their hearts fluttered with expectancy at sight of the great, gorgeous posters that flamed upon barns, fences and billboards, followed in due time by the thrilling pageant that rolled into town and set every one wild. Schools, manufactories and shops closed their doors, and everybody went on a holiday. We knew that half the show was fraud, but we loved Barnum none the less, for there is enjoyment in being humbugged by such a peerless master of the art as was that wonderful Connecticut Yankee.

"I admit," the genial showman used to say, "that a good deal of all this is fraud, but there's much that is not, and when the price of admission is only fifty cents, you will concede that every person gets his money's worth."

"WHAT? WHAT? I SEE NO REASON—— HOW DARE YOU——"

I remember standing in the old museum at the corner of Broadway and Ann Streets and studying an ivory sphere about the size of a billiard ball. It was perfect in shape, beautifully carved, with small circular openings through which a smaller ball could be seen, and inside of that still another, the one in the very centre having about the dimensions of a marble. A bit of paper outside the case stated that these balls, steadily diminishing in size, were eight in number, and that all had been carved from a solid sphere of ivory by some marvelous Chinese genius.

"I cannot understand how human ingenuity can accomplish that," I said to myself, and I might have added that human ingenuity never did accomplish it, for had that remarkable exhibit been placed in boiling water and kept there for several hours, every ball, with the exception, perhaps, of the tiny marble in the centre, would have fallen apart, breaking into several sections. The real art of the artificer consisted in hiding the minute seams that marked the joining of the different parts so that the keenest eye could not detect them. So it was with hundreds and perhaps thousands of curiosities to which countless multitudes made pilgrimages from all parts of the country before and during the Civil War.

My first recollection of Barnum brings a special delight, for I was one of several urchins who succeeded in crawling under the tent and gaining a sight of the whole show without a penny's expense to us. Barnum's star attraction at that time was Tom Thumb. There have been many smaller midgets on exhibition since then, but none will ever create the furor that he did, for he was the pioneer, and he had the greatest of all showmen to exploit him.

Years afterward, when I was grown to manhood, a train of circumstances brought me into close acquaintance with Barnum, and I spent more than one delightful hour at his pleasant home in Bridgeport, Connecticut. He talked freely of his extraordinary experiences, and was one of the most entertaining story-tellers to whom I have ever listened. Regarding Charles Stratton, remembered as Tom Thumb, he said:

"He was by no means mentally bright. You remember that one of his favorite performances was to imitate the great Napoleon, posing in several attitudes, and in his cocked hat and pretty uniform he formed a striking picture. The story has been repeated hundreds of times that when he was doing this before Queen Victoria and had assumed a thoughtful attitude, she asked the question, 'Of what are you thinking?' To which Tom is said to have replied, 'Of the Battle of Waterloo.' He was complimented many times on the aptness of his reply, which, in its way, was peculiarly flattering to the English nation. It is true that the Queen asked the question, but it was I who made the reply, Tom never opening his lips, for he was at a loss for an answer. It was a good advertisement, and I was content to let him have whatever credit it deserved. At the time of our appearance before the Queen, etiquette required that I should never address her directly, but make my replies through a third person, her words to me being filtered in the same way. She became so interested, however, that, much to the amusement and wonder of the attendants, she and I fell unconsciously into a direct conversation, which continued for some time without either of us being conscious of the breach of court etiquette we were committing.

"Tom Thumb made a comfortable fortune under my management, but like many others in a somewhat similar situation, he gained the idea that the whole credit belonged to him, and he started out for himself, finally appearing in the cheapest forms of entertainment. He kept growing slowly but surely in stature, until, in middle life, he lost his value as a curiosity."

There may be some of my readers who remember one of Barnum's curiosities which for several years was a leading attraction at his museum. This was the "What-is-it?" a gibbering, bent-over creature with a pate as bald as a billiard ball, claimed to be the real connecting link between man and the monkey. One day a visitor published a card in a daily paper declaring that the curiosity was simply an idiotic boy. He was positive, and in reply Barnum offered to give $5000 to any public charity that should be named if it were proven that the "What-is-it?" was a boy, either under-witted or of ordinary intelligence. "I was safe there," chuckled the old showman in telling the story, "for though it was true that the 'What-is-it?' was an idiot, nevertheless it was not a boy, but a girl.

It may sound strange to say that, on the whole, Barnum acquired comparatively little out of his show business during the latter years of his life, but he made that declaration to me.

"What money I have," said he, "was mostly made in real estate speculation, which reminds me of a woeful misfortune I have lately had. Some years ago I accepted in payment for a debt owed me by a man in Denver a deed for a tract of land outside the city limits. Regularly every year I had the pleasure of paying a good round sum for taxes. I became tired of this, and one year when our show was in that city I asked my partner, Mr. Bailey, to investigate the matter. Bailey did so, and wrote me that my land was part of a swamp, and if I could find some one to whom I could make a present of it to do so at once.

"Now, I have a sister living in Denver, and I saw a chance of having a little joke at her expense. So I made out the proper legal papers and sent them to her as a token of my affection."

At this point the old showman sighed and drew a letter from his pocket.

"This is a letter from my sister," he explained, "in which she tells me I shall be happy to know that she has just effected a sale of three-fourths of that land to a Chicago syndicate, which paid her $600,000, and she is sure that by holding on to the remainder for a little while she will net a round million from my thoughtful kindness."

OUR AMERICAN SNOBS

By JAMES L. FORD

THE LAUNCHING OF A SOCIAL SUCCESS AS EXEMPLIFIED IN TOMMY TIMPSON, WHO BECAME A "DESIRABLE" PERSON AND MARRIED MONEY

IN ONE of New York's eminently respectable brownstone side streets, about midway between Washington Square and Central Park, my excellent friend, Rebecca Catnip, has long maintained a boarding-house whose cheerful dinner-table I hold to be a veritable camera oscura of contemporary life, customs and manners.

Numerous and varied are the topics discussed at the nightly gatherings about Mrs. Catnip's mahogany, and, whether the engrossing subject be literature or the drama, music or politics, the relation of capital to labor or that of Church to State, there is usually some one present capable of disposing of it with a voice that at least satisfies us as being one of final authority.

There is, however, one notable exception to this rule in the shape of a topic that has never yet been disposed of, though we seldom leave the table without having touched upon it; a topic that is of universal interest, like the Shakespearean drama, and one which no two of us can be brought to view from precisely the same standpoint; a topic on which every one of us has something to say and on which we never agree.

That topic is Society.

Silent as some of us must be, perforce, when literature or economics are up for discussion, not one of us but can wield a verbal knife when the Four Hundred is stretched out on Mrs. Catnip's dinner-table for dissection.

On Sundays we dine at half-past one, in deference to Mrs. Catnip's old-fashioned notions, and the dinner is better and longer than on week-days, and the conversation more erudite and sparkling. It was at one of these Sunday dinners that old Quillson, who went into Wall Street forty years ago as a capitalist and banker and is still there as an expert accountant, spoke with a peculiarly acrid bitterness of old Jacob Titepurse, whose daughter's marriage to young Tommy Timpson had been the most engrossing topic of discussion at our table for several days. From these discussions Quillson haughtily held aloof, as I remembered afterward, but on Sunday afternoon when Mrs. Taffeta—to whom society is as an open book—imparted an unusually rabid degree of frenzy to the conversation by reciting the list of wedding presents, furnished her by a particular friend of hers who knew the lady employed as housekeeper in the Titepurse mansion, the old accountant lifted up his voice for the first time: "So the old man's present is a check for a million dollars, is it? Well, my advice to the young ape that's going to marry his daughter is to get up at daybreak and have it certified before the old man can renig. Check for a million dollars! There weren't many million-dollar checks floating out of his office in '84 when he laid down on his puts and calls; I can tell you that. There isn't a more thorough-going thief in the whole town than old Jake Titepurse, and he hasn't even got the redeeming qualities that some thieves have. I've known him thirty years and I never knew him to give away a cent in charity or do anything for any one but himself. I wouldn't trust him around the corner."

"His credit's A1 at our place," remarked Mr. Grosgrain, whose long, silky whiskers are the color of a mayonnaise salad dressing, and who holds an office of no small authority in one of the principal marts of retail trade. "I waited on Kitty Titepurse only last week. She came in with her mother and got a lot of things for this very wedding. Everything they buy from us is always charged."

"Indeed?" said Quillson sarcastically. "Well, if the Four Hundred's made up of such people as that I'm glad there are no more of them."

"They're not in the Four Hundred," said Mrs. Taffeta decisively, "but Kitty will be all right when she marries young Timpson. 'Twas him got her the invite for the Assembly ball this year, though they wouldn't have her at no price last year. You watch the papers, and you'll see the minute she's married she'll blossom right out in the smart set."

"I suppose that Mr. Timpson can get anybody into society he likes," put in silly little Mrs. Grinders, who had been listening, open-mouthed, with her food untasted on her plate before her.

"There hain't nobody can do more'n him," rejoined Mrs. Taffeta, speaking as one who knew; "and when you think that it wa'n't more'n three years ago last summer that he got in himself, you can see he's done some pretty spry climbin' to get to the top in that time; and if he can get Kitty Titepurse in he'll do more'n her father could, with all his millions. Them Titepurses has just been a-strugglin' an' a-wigglin' an' a-skatin' round the outside edge of society ever since they wuz first heard on, five years ago. Now Kitty'll get in all right and she'll probably make things easy for the younger daughter, Maudie, that'll be comin' along in three or four years."

"I didn't know there was a younger daughter," said Mrs. Grinders.

"Fourteen years old last spring. They've got her to school up to Miss Birdfood's Nickel-Plush Academy in Madison Avenue, so she'll get in with the right set from the start."

"Why, that's where my little girl is! I do hope she'll come to know her!" exclaimed pretty, sad little Mrs. Foxglove, a very sweet, well-born and well-bred little Southern woman whom Fate—as exemplified by a worthless husband and failing fortunes—has dealt rather hardly with.

Now the Nickel-Plush is one of the most famous institutions of learning that our metropolis can boast of. Its fame is due, not so much to the system of instruction that goes on behind its doors as to the number of automobiles, victorias and lady's-maids that gather in front of them at two o'clock every afternoon. It enjoys a high reputation among women who desire that their children shall cultivate a circle of desirable acquaintances while acquiring an education. Mrs. Foxglove lives in a little hall-room at the top of the house and ekes out the small income allowed her by her husband's family by writing anæmic love stories and silly fashion articles for Sunday newspapers and second-rate magazines; and, knowing, as I did, how hard it was for her to make both ends meet and pay for the schooling of the little girl who had found a home with some kind-hearted relatives uptown, I was surprised to learn that she was sending the child to such an expensive and fashionable place as Miss Birdfood's Nickel-Plush Academy, and positively shocked to hear her express the hope that she would become intimate with the young daughter of the thieving and rascally old house of Titepurse. As for Tommy Timpson, whose marriage into that delectable family had kept the conversational pot boiling at Mrs. Catnip's table for the past fortnight, it happened, strangely enough, that in all that bright company, I alone—regarded by Mrs. Taffeta and Mrs. Grinders with unutterable scorn as a man without either social standing or society knowledge—knew the true story of how he made his way into the Four Hundred.

As Mrs. Taffeta truthfully said—that woman is certainly a marvel of accuracy in such matters—he first broke, or rather fell, through the golden portals of society three years ago last summer. I remember the circumstances perfectly, for at that time I happened to stand rather high in the councils of David Barshfield, grandson of the original Barshfield who founded the Morning Planet and present owner of that yellowest and most widely circulated of newspapers. Charley Bland, an old henchman of mine, was our Newport correspondent that summer, and, as he had obtained the place through my good offices, the managing editor, the editor in chief and the night city editor had formed themselves into a league to get him out and put one of their own creations in his place. So skillfully had they laid their plans and so successfully were they carrying them out, that it was not until my revered employer, Mr. Barshfield, spoke of making a change that I realized the strength of the cabal against him. Then I sent him a private letter telling him that his place was in jeopardy unless he could delight our chief's heart with some great and overpowering social sensation, something that would offset the series of Saturday afternoon vaudeville entertainments for the insane paupers on Blackwell's Island that our rival, the Megaphone, was carrying on with such distinguished success.

Now, in nine cases out of ten when the Newport correspondent of a yellow newspaper is threatened with discharge some freak is tumbled pell-mell into society; and, luckily enough, young Tommy Timpson made his first appearance on Bellevue Avenue on the very morning that Charley Bland, with his naturally bright faculties quickened to the highest degree by my letter, was strolling along that thoroughfare of fashion on the alert for the social sensation that should make his job a permanent one. Suddenly out of the thick fog that happened to hang over the ancient city that day there loomed the figure of Tommy Timpson, and, as Charley Bland told me afterward, the very minute he set eyes on him he beheld him as in a vision, the centre of a great, full-page picture with women of fashion kneeling at his feet and surrounded by smaller pictures representing him riding to hounds, playing golf, at the bridge-whist table—in a score of phases of a triumphant social career, and over all, his great red ears flapping like sheltering wings.

"There's the man that's going to save my job for me," said Charley to himself, and without a moment's hesitation he went up to the stranger, introduced himself as the correspondent of the Planet, and in an easy, pleasant way proceeded to point out the objects of interest. Timpson, who seemed to be a simple-minded sort of a chap, told him that he had been saving his money for three years for the purpose of "cutting a dash in society," had arrived in Newport that very morning and expected to make a preliminary dash the next afternoon. He seemed surprised when Bland asked him if he had brought any letters of introduction, and replied that he had never needed any in the Western town from which he came and had thought that it would be an easy matter to scrape an acquaintance with a few "nobs," adding, "you see how quick you and I got acquainted; well, I can get in the same way with anybody I meet."

"I'm afraid that plan won't work," said Charley, shaking his head. "If society was as easy as that everybody'd be in it. If you don't believe me, just stand here on this corner and try to get acquainted with some of the people that pass by. Why, they'd turn you over to the police as a suspicious character."

The poor fellow looked dreadfully disappointed and said he'd come all the way from the West with three or four thousand dollars he'd saved up, and if he went back home without doing anything he'd be the laughing-stock of all his friends, and they'd made fun enough of him before he came away. While he was talking Charley was looking at him and wondering what rôle he was best fitted to play in the Four Hundred. His extraordinary ears, which seemed to almost meet over the top of his head, fitted him to shine in the fashionable, intellectual and artistic set, which invariably demands some striking peculiarity of visage on the part of its prophets. With such ears as Timpson's, Charley thought that there was no reason why, after a fortnight or so of study, he should not give a series of drawing-room talks on the revival of the poetic drama or the Tolstoi cult in its relation to higher criticism, or almost anything that rings pleasantly in the ears of the people who think they think. On the other hand, if he would consent to be photographed in a dozen different ways he might gain access to society through the columns of the Planet, where he would figure as what is known in Park Row as a "freak feature," and one well calculated at least to divide public interest with the vaudeville entertainments for the Blackwell's Island lunatics.

Timpson was not lacking in nerve and was perfectly willing to get up a lecture on Maeterlinck or a talk on Ibsen, provided Charley would induce somebody to let him deliver it. But, after careful consideration, the "freak feature" seemed the more feasible plan, and the very next Sunday the Planet blossomed out with a full page that more than realized the one that Charley had seen in a vision the first time he ran across Timpson on Bellevue Avenue. Accompanying the full page was a description of the young society man from the West who had taken Newport by storm, and made himself within a few weeks a personage of vast importance in the councils of the Four Hundred.

Barshfield was delighted with the new freak feature and telegraphed Bland to run a page about him with photographs every Sunday until further notice.

Now, it is a curious fact and one that I shall not even attempt to explain, that, even when backed by the most brilliant intellectual qualities, a man must work incessantly for years, and perhaps during an entire lifetime, to win fame in statecraft, art or one of the learned professions, whereas he can become known from one end of the country to the other as a social celebrity in about six weeks, and that, too, without the aid of brains, industry or any of the qualities which usually make a man popular. So it happened that with no social capital whatever but his ears the name of Tommy Timpson became a household word before the summer was over in even the most remote villages of the country, and scores of second-rate persons were striving to make his acquaintance.

At first, the splendor and novelty of his position as a man of fame frightened him, but under the experienced guidance of Charley Bland—who has shoved more than one fool into society in his time—he played his cards with so much skill that almost before he knew it he was actually taken up by some of the self-advertising set who realized that by keeping close to him they stood a fair chance of getting their names and pictures in the society columns of the Sunday papers in company with his.

After dinner I related to Mrs. Foxglove the story of Mr. Tommy Timpson and what the Catnip school of thought defines as his "social position," but she did not take the story quite as I had expected she would.

"He may have long ears," she said quite seriously, "but just think how many desirable people he knows." And at that moment there was borne in upon me the sudden and awful conviction that this quiet little woman with the sweet, sad face and gentle manners, well born, well bred and reasonably intelligent, was a worshiper at the shrine of the brazen calf and cherishing in her heart of hearts the strange fetish of the "desirable people."

"Poor little Alice! No one knows what that child has to suffer now that she's making desirable acquaintances at the Nickel-Plush school," said the widow sadly. "It's only yesterday that she sobbed and cried and begged me to take her away and send her somewhere else, and it was so hard to have to tell her that if she went to another school she'd never get into the Four Hundred. However, my mother's conscience is satisfied and I don't grudge the sacrifices I'm making for her, because the time will come when she'll thank me for starting her in life with desirable little girls as associates."

Her blue eyes filled with tears as she said this, and to tell the truth, I almost cried, too, over her artless recital of what poor little Alice had to endure at the hands of the young Nickel-Plush nobility. At the noon recess on the very day of her entrance, according to little Alice's piteous tale, a swarm of these desirable brats fell upon this poor child, fresh from the infinitely purer and better atmosphere of an old-fashioned Southern town, and literally staggered her with a flood of impertinent questions. They lifted up the edge of her skirt to see if it was silk-lined; they looked sneeringly at the maker's name on her hat and coat, and made merry over the fact that her shoes were not in the extreme of the prevailing fashion. Then they asked her where she came from and what her father's business was, and were about to delve deeper into the history and financial condition of her family when the child's outraged feelings came to her aid and she turned upon her desirable tormentors in an outbreak of indignation from which they recoiled in abject terror.

And it was this very Mrs. Foxglove, offering up her daughter as a living sacrifice on the altar of the brazen calf and not ashamed to tell the story of the child's sufferings—it was this woman who burst into tears of anger just because I said to her at the close of her recital:

"It's a wonder to me that God sends children to such women as you."

Ward as a Cherokee

By Robert Barr

HERE is a story of Artemus Ward which has never been in print before. It was told to me by one of the victims, who years afterward was sent as Ambassador from the United States to a prominent country in Europe. Artemus was lecturing in a Western city, and two prominent society young men invited him to a little supper after the discourse was over. It was nearly two o'clock in the morning when his hosts turned out into the silent and deserted streets to escort Artemus to the hotel where he was staying. The humorist was feeling pretty brisk and he stopped suddenly on the pavement and gravely said:

"Did you ever hear me give the Cherokee war-whoop?"

His companions admitted they had not had that pleasure.

"Well," said Artemus, "I think I can waken the whole town, although I am not sure of arousing the more distant suburbs," and with that he sent forth an ear-piercing yell that made the sleeping city in his immediate neighborhood think the Day of Judgment had come. As the echoes of the appalling war-whoop died away, shrill policemen's whistles were heard in various directions, whereupon Artemus turned, deserted his two comrades and ran like the warrior he had imitated. Before the two young men could gather their wits a policeman appeared out of the darkness and arrested them.

"Drunk and disorderly and disturbing the peace," said the officer; "make no resistance or it will be the worse for you."

And then he blew his whistle again to summon help in case the two should turn upon him, which they had not the slightest intention of doing, but they were thunderstruck at the prospect of spending the night in the cells and having their respectable names in the papers next morning. They swore to the policeman that they had not uttered the shriek or murdered anybody as he seemed to suspect, and the bobby sarcastically advised them to try that story on the magistrate in the morning. As they parleyed there, a tall, dignified gentleman in evening dress strolled along.

"What is the trouble, officer?" asked the newcomer in a most urbane tone of voice.

"Drunk and disorderly," repeated the policeman.

"Oh, I beg your pardon," said the stranger, "but I know these gentlemen and can vouch for their sobriety and respectability."

"And who the deuce are you?" asked the officer, not too well pleased at the interruption, yet somewhat mollified by the politeness of his interlocutor.

"I am Mr. Artemus Ward," replied the other; "I lectured last night before some two thousand of your best citizens at the Opera House, and among my audience I understand was your own Chief of Police, so if you wish me to accompany you to the station I shall be most happy to do so."

The policeman dropped his hand from the shoulder of the future Ambassador, for he had seen the name of Artemus Ward on the boardings in letters three feet long, and he had a deep respect for any man who could have his name printed in such gigantic form.

"Oh, if you know the men, sir, it will be all right, and I won't run them in, but who in thunder let out that blood-curdling screech? Did you hear it, sir?"

"I did," admitted Artemus suavely, "and, furthermore, not five minutes since a man ran down in the direction from which I came as hard as he could go. I believe that he was the disturber of the peace."

"Ah, well," said the officer with a sigh of relief, "that'll be the man, bad luck to him, and he'll run right into the arms of Mulligan, for that's on Mulligan's beat. Good-morning to you, gentlemen, and my best apologies to the three of you."

"The mistake was quite pardonable," said Artemus with his most distinguished bow, and he led his still bewildered friends away.

The Autobiography of a Beggar

By I. K. FRIEDMAN

Author of "By Bread Alone," Etc.

The Tale of the Persian Cat

NOW, talkin' about bulldorgs an' kind ladies an' beggars' signs reminds meh ef what happened ter meh wid a Persean cat. I was a-travelin' thru de alley one day when I seen de sign ef a kind lady on de back-yard door. Den I peeped over de fence an' I seen dat de back yard was full ef cats, dem cats bein' in a wire cage what had tracks fer 'em ter walk up an' down, jist like a elervated railroad. I axes somebody what it means, an' he says:

"It's a old maid lady what keeps a catery er a cateract—dat is ter say, a home fer cats." An' he pints out one cat, a big white feller wid a long fuzzy tail, an' he says dat dis one was a Persean cat an' wuth five hundred dollars!

"What fer is he wuth dat much?" axes I. "Is it a'count ef his skin?"

"Oh, no," laffs he; "it's nice fer ter see an' ter have aroun' de house!"

"Kin he do tricks?" axes I.

"No," grins he, "but some people fancies cats an' some dorgs an' some birds; old maid ladies preferrin' cats!"

"Why fer?" axes I.

"Cats bein' considered good luck," explains he; "now dem Malteaser cats keeps de consumptshun away, an' de Persean cats keeps orff rheumatisum. A cat is full ef 'lectricity," he says, "some cats havin' one kind an' some anudder."

"Rich folkses is queer wid der money," says I.

"Not so funny when yer comes ter consider," he says; "fer dem cats in de long run don't cost no more en doctors. An' ef yer has all kinds ef cats yer don't need no doctors."

Editor's Note—This is the third story in the series. The next will appear in a fortnight.

An' I goes orff a-scratchin' meh head an' wonderin' how I could coax dat five-hundred-dollar Persean cat inter meh pocket, when I runs up agin Hungry Henry. An' we considers fer a while an' den we puts all de coin what we could scrape up inter buyin' a big baskut wid a cover. An' we goes along by de front ef de house where de old maid lady an' her cats lives. I notices a pile ef coal dere, an' I has an ideer, an' so I sends Henry wid de baskut aroun' de corner fer ter wait till I calls him. An' I rings de bell an' axes de gurl what comes to de door ef she wants de coal put in.

"I'll call missus," says she, "an' see." An' den de old maid lady, what has long side curls an' glasses an' sharp eyes, an' is tall an' thin, comes down an' axes:

"How much a ton?"

"Jist give meh a bite ter eat," says I, "an' a hot cup ef coffee an' I'll put in de coal what's dere fer a dollar."

"All right," says she; an' de gurl takes meh inter de kitchun an' trots out de grub, an' while I was a-thinkin' an a-watchin' fer de Persean cat de missus comes down an' says:

"Dere's a board er two gone from de coal bin in de back yard. Kin yer fix it?"

"It's agin union laws," I says, "fer de coal-heavers an' coal-carriers ter do carpinter work."

"Dose unions is gittin' awful," says she.

"I'm sorry," I says, "yer bein' so kind an' a old maid lady asides, an'——"

"What has dat got ter do wid it?" says she, a-gittin' red ez a hot coal.

"Nothin' perticular," I says, seein' as I must have made a mistake an' not knowin' jist where, "but it do seem no more en right fer a singul lady ter pay only half as much ez —— "

"Jane," she says to de gurl, cuttin' meh short, "git a carpinter."

"Hold on," I says; "I knows a feller out ef a job what'll be glad fer ter put dem boards back fer a dime. I kin get him here in less en a minute."

"All right," says she; "hurry along."

"No hurry, mum," says I, "no hurry; he'll be dere all day. An' I meant no offenses, mum, when I says ez singul ladies an' double ladies—— "

"Hurry along," snaps she.

An' I runs out an' brings Henry back. An' de gurl leaves us in agin, an' I says loud, so she kin hear:

"Got all de tools in de baskut, Mr. Henry?"

"Sure," says he; "hammer an' saw an' all."

An' de old maid lady comes down an' says, "I'd like fer ter have de price fixed in adwance."

So Henry an' meh starts fer de yard where de cats is, an' him, like a fool, goes right ter de cateract an' peeps atween de wires.

"Don't mind dem cats," scolds de old maid lady; "dey will take care ef demselves. What'll yer charge ter fix dose boards?"

"Well, I'll tell yer," says he, lookin' at de bin, "I'll fix it an' take a cat fer meh little gurl ter home."

AN' SAM HE PUTS DE CAT-NIP AN' DE FRIED FISH NEAR DE HOLE

"I guess not," says she, laffin'; "why, dat Persean cat alone is wuth more en a hundred coal bins."

"I tole yer so, Henry!" I yells, a'count ef him not bein' willin' ter believe meh when I tells him de price ef a Persean cat.

"Tole him what?" axes she, lookin' sharp at meh.

"Dat Persean cats, keepin' rheumatisum away, is wuth more en a coal bin, an' him not willin' ter believe it."

An' she laffs agin an' says: "Oh, dear; youse is two funny men." An' she an' Henry agrees on de price ef two bits fer ter fix de coal bin; an' she says:

"De gurl'll pay yer when yer is done, fer I must be a-goin' downtown."

"An' who'll pay meh?" axes I.

"I'll be back in time," says she, an' she goes an' leaves meh in de yard wid Henry.

An' Henry says ter meh: "You go an' git a barrul full ef coal in an' I'll look aroun'." An when I comes back wid de coal he says:

"Dere's a big Newfoundlander dorg next door; yer kin hear him a-barkin' at dose cats."

"Well?" axes I.

"I'm a-goin' ter fiddle aroun' a while," says he, "an' knock a hole in de fence an' leave de dorg in."

"Why fer?" axes I.

"Ter skeer dose cats," says he.

"What good 'ill dat do?" I axes.

"Well," says he, "I'll knock de lock offen de cateract, open de door an' let dose cats out, an' de gurl 'ill come an' chase de cats an' de dorg, an' I grabs de Persean cat an' puts him in de baskut. See?"

"I see," says I.

So he goes ter de gurl an' says he fergot his hammer an' his saw, an' she gets 'em from de house; an' he comes back into de yard an' says ter meh:

"Mollbuzzer, go an' talk to de gurl while I saws out a hole in de fence an' takes de lock orff de cateract."

So I goes into de house an' de gurl says, "What's de mattur now?"

"I broke a hole in de barrul," I says, "an' I'll have ter have anudder one."

"You'll find one in de cellar, downstairs," says she.

"I won't go down in no cellar," I says, "a'count ef ghostes which lives in cellars and downstairs places."

An' de gurl laffs, an' she goes down inter de cellar an' I looks out ef de kitchun winder an' seed Henry a-cuttin' a hole fer de Newfoundlander dorg.

"Der ain't time ter cut de whole fence down!" I yells; "dat dorg ain't no elerphunt!"

"Mind yer own bizness," says he, a-sawin' an' a-hammerin' away, "an' keep de gurl busy."

An' when de gurl comes back wid de barrul I says, "Dat barrul won't do."

"Why not?" she axes. "It's de same as de other one was."

"Dat shows all yer knows about barruls," I says. "It looks de same but it ain't de same," I says; "ef yer ever carried coal yer'd know a barrul wid three hoops don't hold ez much ez one wid two hoops, 'cause it don't stretch so much."

"I never heard de like," says she. "Yer kin take one hoop orff."

"All right," I says; "git meh a pair ef scissors."

"Scissors!" says she.

"Yes, scissors," I says, a-tryin' ter gain time. "I ain't a-goin' ter take de hoop orff de barrul wid meh teeth."

"Sunday an' Monday!" yells she, a-peepin' out ef de winder ef a suddint, "what is dat carpinter a-doin' ter de fence? An' dat big Newfoundlander dorg next door! Missus said ter fix de coal bin, not ter tear de fence down!"

"He's gittin' boards out ef de fence ter put in de bin," I explains.

"I'll board him," says she, a-takin' a broom an' a-runnin' fer de door.

"Hold on," I says, a-standin' in her way; "yer wouldn't hit a lonely carpinter man?" I says.

"Let go!" she hollers.

"Oh, Mollbuzzer, come quick!" yells Henry in de yard. An' I pushes her back an' shuts de door an' springs fer de yard jist when Henry throwed de door ef de cateract wide open, an' de Newfoundlander dorg springs in de yard, a-barkin' an' a-howlin' an' a-makin' fer de cateract. An' dose cats meows an' meows an' spits fire ez ef all de rheumatisum an' consumptshun in de world was let loose at 'em. An' dey goes a-flyin' an' a-spinnin' fer de top track in de cateract.

An' Henry makes fer de back fence, de baskut on his arm, an' his hands a-bleedin' awful, so I knows de Persean cat was ourn.

But de Newfoundlander dorg loses his head an' seein' he couldn't get one ef de cats he makes fer Henry, an' he almost has him by de leg, but Henry has had more practice in fences, I reckon, den dorgs, fer he gives dat Newfoundlander de double quick wid his boot across de nose an' jumps inter de alley like a skeered rooster.

An' de gurl, a-screamin' an' a-yellin' more en de blame cats an' de Newfoundlander, slams de cateract door shut. I makes fer de fence, but de dorg shows his teeth an' looks bizness out ef his eyes, an' dere I was atween de gurl an' de Newfoundlander.

"Dis is a outrage!" screams she. "I'm goin' ter get de law on you!"

"Get de law on!" I screams back, "but call de dorg orff. Ef yer does I kin git dat five-hundred-dollar Persean cat back, which I seen jump over de fence."

"Oh, Heavens! it's so!" she says; "missus 'ill be crazy. Sunday an' Monday! dat cat wuz de pride ef her heart, it was," an' she leans her head agin de cateract like ez ef she was a-goin' crazy, too.

"Call de dorg orff!" I yells agin; "dat five-hundred-dollar cat ain't a-goin' ter come back 'cause yer keeps yer eyes shut!"

An' de Newfoundlander, seein' dat dose cats was come ter de ground floor ef de cateract agin, he makes fer 'em, an' I springs fer de fence, an' de dorg turns fer meh agin an' de gurl hits meh a whack wid de broom, a-hollerin':

"I'll hoop yer! I'll barrul yer! I'll scissors yer!"

An' de Newfoundlander samples a yard ef meh pants, which I was erbliged ter leave wid him; an' I kites ater Henry.

An' I hears a meowin' an' a-barkin' agin, an' I turns an' sees dose cats a-runnin' right an' left fer de fences an' everywhere, which frightens de life out ef meh, fer I didn't know de habits ef Malteasers an' Persean cats, an' I thought maybe dey was ater meh. So I runs as I never hopes ter run agin; an' none too quick, neither, fer peepul was a-comin' down dat alley like ter a fire, an' a cop er two wid 'em.

Henry an' meh figured it out an' we thought it would be better ter rent a room fer de night at de Star Ef Hope an' ter lay low instead ef goin' back home. We stayed dere a long time, too skeered fer ter speak, but in de night Henry he wakes up ter hisself an' he says:

"Mollbuzzer, now dat de five-hundred Persean cat is ourn, what will we do wid it?"

"Yer don't expict ter put it in a bank," I answers, "de same ez ef it was money? De fust thing ter do is ter read de papers in de mornin' an' look fer a riward!"

"But I'm gettin' nervous 'bout de whole blame bizness," says he.

"Well, den," says I, "maybe it 'ill be better ter go back home an' see Sam."

"Yes," he says, "an' Sam 'ill want de cat, tail an' all, fer readin' jist a line!"

So we talked it up an' down, an' come to de point dat we thought it would be best ter go back home wid de blamed cat an' tell Sam what happened an' take his adwice. An' Sam was mighty mad at first an' called us traitors; but seein' it might be a good bizness fer us three, he cooled orff an' says he would help all he could. An' sure enuff, we reads a piece in de paper de next mornin' sayin' fifty dollars riward an' no questions axed fer de return ef de cat ter de old maid lady.

"No questions 'ill be axed," I says; "dey'll jist grab us an' put us in jail, an' dat will be all! Who'll take de cat back?"

"I'll take de cat back jist ter akomerdate yer," says Sam.

"An' grab de riward ter akomerdate us, too," says Henry.

"Well," says Sam, "we'll diwide; youse fellers kin each keep ten an' meh thirty."

"That's jist plain robbery an' no diwision at all," I says.

"But I'm takin' de chances ef bein' sent ter jail," says Sam.

"All three ef us 'ill go an' share an' share alike," I says.

"Dat's right enuff," Henry says, "but I can't see how yer kin diwide fifty dollars equal atween three peepul!"

An' jist den dat Persean cat gets out ef de baskut somehow, an' afore we could grab him by his long fuzzy tail he runs thru a hole in de wall an' is gone!

"Yer see what yer done by yer argufyin' an' yer disputin'," swears Sam. "Now none ef us gits nothin'! Mollbuzzer," he says, "kin climb on de roof an' watch wid a stick so ez de cat can't git away thru de chimbley; an' you, Henry, kin watch de hole in de wall here."

"Git some one wid de rheumatisum," I says, "ter coax de cat back."

"Rheumatisum, yer grandma," says Sam, him not knowin' ez much about Persean cats ez meh; "I'm goin' ter see a horse doctor what I knows, Doc Dan not bein' ter home."

"What fer a horse doctor?" axes I.

"I knows what I'm about," says Sam, an' he goes away, an' Henry shins on top ef de roof, an' I watches de hole in de wall ef de room.

An' Sam comes back soon an' says, "It cost meh twinty cents fer catnip an' fried fish what de horse doctor told meh fer ter buy ter coax de cat back."

"Dat's more en I'd pay fer a meal fer mehself," says I.

"All right," says Sam, "but yer ain't wuth no five hundred an' fifty dollars, neither."

"It's strange," puts in Henry, "dat a cat should be wuth more en a man, ain't it? How does yer explain it, Sam?"

"Git de cat back an' I'll explain it aterwards," says Sam.

An' Sam he puts de catnip an' de fried fish near de hole, an' ater a while de cat puts his head out thru de wall, an' he grabs it.

"Don't kill him," I says.

"Yer kin hold him," says he, a-hollerin' blue blazes, "ef yer knows so much!"

So we puts de cat back in de baskut, an' along night we goes ter de home ef de old maid lady an' de cateract.

"De cat comes back," I says ter de gurl at de door.

AN' DOSE CATS SPITS FIRE EZ EF ALL DE RHEUMATISUM AN' CONSUMPTSHUN IN DE WORLD WAS LET LOOSE AT 'EM

Digitized by Google

"Ain't youse de biggest rasculs in de whole world?" she axes, gittin' red in de face.

"No questions axed," I says, "accordin' to de riward."

"Thank the Lord anyways dat it's back," she says, "fer missus is sick in bed an' almost dead wid——"

"Wid de rheumatisum?" I axes.

"You an' yer rheumatisum," says Sam; "don't talk so much."

"Give meh Lady Grimalakins," says de gurl.

"We didn't bring no lady; we brung de cat back," I says.

"Dat's de name ef de cat," says she.

"Is Persean cats named de same ez peepul?" I axes.

"Keep still, yer fool," says Sam; "let de gurl git de coin."

"Git de fifty," I says ter de gurl, "an' Lady Persean is yourn fer life; an' yer kin tell de old maid lady ter put in an extree five fer a new pair ef pants dat de Newfoundlander dorg tore——"

An' Sam he gives meh a punch in de ribs, an' de gurl comes back wid de old maid lady, her glasses an' her side curls an' all, a-lookin' whiter en de Persean cat. An' she starts in ter say, what we knowed already, dat we wus de greatest rasculs in de whole world, jist like ez ef we come ter steal de cat instead ef takin' it back, which is jist like wimens.

"AN' IT WON'T COST YER NOTHIN' EXTREE," PIPES I, "FER TAKIN' A PEEP"

An' Henry says ter her, "Lady Grimalakins, we——"

"Dat ain't her name, but de Persean cat's," I says ter him, pokin' his head.

"Well, den, mam," he says, "we didn't come ter learn yer 'pinion on polertics, but fer ter get de riward."

"I ain't sure it's de Persean cat yit," says she; "I'll take de baskut inside an' ef it's Lady Grimalakins I'll send de fifty out."

"No yer don't," says Sam.

"I'll cut a big hole in de baskut, mam," says I, takin' out meh knife, "an' yer kin look in."

"Fer de love ef Heaven," says she, "put dat awful knife away; you'll kill dat cat yit, youse will!"

"Yer bring a candul," says Sam, "an' we'll open de kiver ef de baskut an' yer kin peep in!"

"An' it won't cost yer nothin' extree," pipes I, "fer takin' a peep," fer sayin' which Sam kicks meh shin.

So dey gits a candul an' seen it was de Persean cat an' all, an' dey gives us de fifty, which makes meh think a good deal more ef cats en dorgs.

An' we was gone a bit when Sam he turns an' he says, "Youse might tackle dat Newfoundlander dorg next, an'——"

"I guess not," says meh an' Hungry Henry ter oncet.

POPE, as Mrs. Ballantyne explained to Frothingham, was an Eastern Senator—a multi-millionaire, sent to the Senate because he practically supported—that is, "financed"—the machine of his party in his State, besides making large contributions to its national machine. "So the 'Boss,' as they call the leader of the party in that State," she said, "sold Mr. Pope one of the Senatorships, keeping the other for himself. Mr. Ballantyne is the leader, the master, of his party in his State and, while he's too modest to tell it, is one of the masters of the party in the nation. He could be President if it weren't for the disgusting prejudice among the people against all who happen to have a little something"—"a little something" being Mrs. Ballantyne's modest way of speaking of their millions. "But," she went on, "old Mr. Pope is a nonentity. He sits in his seat and votes the way they tell him to and is nice to everybody. Mr. Ballantyne suspects that he's getting ready to buy the Vice-Presidency."

"How much does that cost?" asked Frothingham.

"It'll cost him half a million if the chances of our party's carrying the election are good; if they're not so good, perhaps he can get it for a quarter of a million. But they may not dare nominate him. They may have to take some popular poor man. The 'many-headed monster,' as Shakespeare calls it, has been grumbling of late. We have a hard task in our country, Lord Frothingham, to keep the people with property in control."

"It's the same all over the world nowadays, I fancy," said Frothingham. "One has to apologize for being well born or rich or for living in decent style. The trouble with the lower classes at home is that they don't have to work hard enough. They used to be too busy to make themselves and everybody uncomfortable by doing what they call thinking."

"That's the trouble with our lower classes, too," answered Mrs. Ballantyne. "We educate too much."

The carriage rushed into the brilliantly lighted entrance of Senator Pope's house. Frothingham saw Ysobel's face, saw that she was having a violent attack of silent laughter. And he understood why. "The young 'un has a sense of humor," he said to himself. "It's ridiculous for these beggars to pose and strut before they've had time to brush the dirt off their knees and hands."

As they entered the drawing-room Frothingham's attention riveted upon two gilt armchairs ensconced in a semicircle of palms and ferns. "For the President and his wife," said Ysobel. "They're dining here to-night, you know. This is the first President in a long time who has accepted invitations below the Cabinet circle. He comes to Senator Pope's because they're old friends. It's quite an innovation and has caused a deal of talk. But I don't blame him. Where's the use in being President if you can't do as you please?"

Mrs. Pope, stout and red and obviously "flustered," came bustling up. After she had greeted them she said: "Lord Frothingham, you're to take my daughter Elsie in to dinner." Then to Mrs. Ballantyne: "Oh, my dear, why didn't you warn me of the quarrel between the Cabinet women and the Speaker's family. Whatever shall I do? Mrs. Secretary Mandon's here, and so are the Speaker and his wife."

"I'd send Grace Mandon in ahead of the Speaker's wife, if I were you," replied Mrs. Ballantyne. "I've no patience with the pretensions of the House. It's distinctly the commonest branch of the Government, while the Cabinet is next to the President."

"But," objected Mrs. Pope plaintively, "the Speaker is so influential and really fierce about precedence, and his wife has such a tongue and such a temper, and neither he nor she ever forgives."

"Do as you like, of course," said Mrs. Ballantyne stiffly. Being of the Senate it exasperated her that the House should be placed ahead of it.

Just then a murmur ran round the room—"The President! The President!" Those who were seated rose, conversation stopped and the orchestra began to play. "Bless my soul," muttered Frothingham, "they're playing God Save the King!" And then he remembered that the Americans had, as he put it, "stolen our tune and set a lot of rot about themselves to it." The President and his wife entered, he frowning and red and intent upon the two gilt chairs. Mrs. Pope curtesied, her husband contracted his stiff old figure in a comical half-salaam. All bent their heads and a few of the young people, among them Ysobel, curtesied.

"See him looking at those chairs?" said she to Frothingham.

Frothingham nodded.

"He's awfully sour at the etiquette here," she went on. "I suppose he's afraid the country'll find out about it and cut up rough. He's smashing right and left, and every one's wondering when he'll throw out the gilt chairs."

But his courage apparently failed him, for he and his wife advanced to the "thrones" and seated themselves. No one else sat, all moving about to get the partners indicated on the little gilt and crested cards they had found in envelopes addressed to them and laid upon the tables in the dressing-rooms. Frothingham examined Elsie Pope and saw that she was small and slight, square in the shoulders, thin in the neck, her hair of an uncertain shade of brown, her eyes commonplace, her features irregular. "She looks a good-tempered soul," he said to himself, searching resolutely for merits. And then he noted that her hands were red, and that she had flat, rather wide wrists. "A good, plain soul," he added. He sat silent, waiting for her to begin to entertain him—he hadn't got used to the American custom of the men entertaining the women; and the New York and Boston women, acquainted with the British way, had humored him. But he waited in vain. At last he stole a glance at her, and noted the flutter of a humor-curve at the corner of her mouth. "A shrewd little thing, I suspect," he thought. And he said to her, "No—really I don't bite."

Her eyes twinkled. "I was beginning to be afraid you didn't bark, either," she said.

His expression retired behind his eyeglass. "Nor do I, unless I'm bid."

"I like to be talked to—I'd so much rather criticise than be criticised."

"What do you like to hear about?" he asked.

"About the man who's talking. It's the only subject he'll really put his heart into, isn't it?"

Frothingham smiled faintly, as if greeting an old and not especially admired acquaintance.

"I'm so disappointed," she said presently. "All winter I've had the same man take me in everywhere—you know, we follow precedence very closely here in Washington. And, when I found I was to have a new man, I had such hopes! The other man and I had got bored to death with each other. And now—you're threatening to be a failure!"

Frothingham did not like this—it was pert for a woman to speak thus to him; he resented it as a man and he resented it as Lord Frothingham. "That's a jest, ain't it?" he drawled. "We English, you know, have a horribly defective sense of American humor."

"No, it wasn't a jest," she replied. "It was a rudeness, and I beg your pardon. I thought to say something smart, and—I missed. Let's change the subject. Do you see that intellectual-looking man with the beard on the other side of the table—next to Ysobel Ballantyne?"

"The surly chap?"

"Yes—and he's surly because mamma has made a dreadful mistake. She's put him two below the place his rank entitles him to. He'll act like a savage all evening."

"Fancy! What a small matter to fly into a rage over."

"A small matter for a large man, but a large matter for a small man. Sometimes I think all men are small."

"Why do you say that?"

"Because of what I've seen in Washington. They say the women started this craze for precedence. I don't know whether that's so or not. But I do know that in the three years I've been out I've found the men worse than the women. And those things look so much pettier in a man, too."

"But I thought there wasn't any rank in this country."

"So I thought—I was educated in France. I believe in rank and all that—it seems to me absurd to talk about equality. But I despise this silly squabble over little places that last only a few years at most. As Mr. Boughton was saying—you know Mr. Boughton?"

"You mean the Second Secretary at our Embassy?"

"Yes. He said to me only last night: 'America has an aristocracy just as we have, but gets from it all the evils and none of the good; all the pettiness, none of the dignity and sense of responsibility.'"

"But they tell me it's different—out West."

"I don't know. I can only speak of the East—especially of Washington. There isn't a capital in Europe or Asia, the diplomats say, with so elaborate a system of rank and precedence as we have. Why, do you know, it's so bad that the fifteen-hundred-dollar-a-year clerks and their families have a society of their own between the circles of those who get eighteen hundred and those who get twelve hundred. And they'd rather die than mix with those who get less than they do."

"Really! Really, now!"

"And anything like a good time is almost impossible. It's precedence, precedence everywhere, always. You can't entertain informally."

"It must be as if one were laced in a strait-jacket."

"I'm going abroad next year, and am never coming back, if I can help it. I'm going where at least there's real rank to get excited about. I'll go with Ysobel and her mother—unless Ysobel decides to marry on this side."

Frothingham was internally agitated, but gave no sign of it.

"She's marrying either Mr. Boughton or that handsome Italian sitting next to Mrs. Ballantyne—the Prince di Rontivogli."

"Ah," said Frothingham. And to himself, "Just my rotten luck!"

"She makes no secret of it," continued Miss Pope, "so I'm not violating her confidence. She says she's determined to marry higher than her sister did. She likes Mr. Boughton better, though I should think she'd prefer the Prince—his face is ideal, and such manners! But, while Mr. Boughton is his granduncle's heir, and his granduncle is old and a widower—still—well, the dukedom might slip away from him. For instance, he might die before his granduncle."

"That would be ghastly for her, wouldn't it, now?" said Frothingham.

"It would kill poor Ysobel. She's so proud and ambitious! And that's why she has an eye for the Prince—he's of a frightfully old family, you know. One of his ancestors tried to poison Cesare Borgia and did succeed in getting himself poisoned or smothered or something thrilling. And they were an old, old family then. Oh, Ysobel is flying high. If her father would give her mother and her a free hand, I think she'd land a prince of some royal family."

Behind his mask Frothingham was hastily reforming his line of battle. The Ballantyne fortune was apparently inaccessible to an attack from a mere Earl; but he could keep it under surveillance while employing his main force against the Pope citadel, which seemed to be inviting attack. He did not fancy Miss Pope—she was too patently conscious of her cleverness and it was of a kind that did not attract him, was not what he regarded as feminine; nor was she physically up to his standard for his Countess-to-be. But—she had the essential; and he had been in America nearly five months and had had two, practically three, failures.

For the rest of his two weeks at the Ballantynes' he spent as much time as he courteously could with Miss Pope. And when he joined Joe Wallingford at the New Willard, sharing his suite—and paying less than a third of the expenses—he was with her a large part of each day, driving with her, riding with her, lunching where she lunched, dining where she dined, dancing with her, walking with her, sending her flowers. In Boston and New York he had been somewhat hindered by the chaperon system, careless though it was. Here chaperoning was the flimsiest of farces, and he and Elsie were together almost as freely as if she were a man.

In his fourth week in Washington he called one afternoon to keep an engagement to walk with her at half-past four. She had not returned from a girls' luncheon to which she had gone. At ten minutes past five she came, full of apology for her delay—"I really couldn't leave. The lunch was over before three o'clock, but the Secretary of State's daughter was enjoying herself and, though we were all furious with her, as we had other engagements, she wouldn't leave; and, of course, none of us could leave until she left. When she did finally take herself away, the Secretary of the Treasury's daughter had given up her engagement and had settled herself for the afternoon. She didn't leave until ten minutes ago. So there we were, penned in and forced to stay."

"Precedence again?" said Frothingham.

"Precedence. It's outrageous that those two girls should show so little consideration."

"I've known the same sort of thing to happen at home," Frothingham assured her. "Once when I'd gone to a house only for dinner I had to stay until half-past four in the morning. The Prince of Wales was there, and he was just then mad about 'bridge.' He insisted on playing and playing. Several of us were asleep in the next room—the hostess was nodding over her cards."

"But he must have seen," said Elsie. "Why didn't he take the hint?"

PRINCE DI RONTIVOGLI

"Well, you see, the poor chap led such a deadly dull life in those days. When he found himself having a bit of fun he didn't care a rap what it cost any one else. It's a mistake to bother with other people's feelings, don't you think?"

"It only makes them supersensitive and hard to get on with," replied Elsie. "I used to be considerate. Now I'm considerate only when it's positively rude not to be. Besides, I must expect to buy my way through the world. I never had any friends—though I used to think I had, when I was a fool and didn't know that just the sight of wealth makes human beings tie up their good instincts and turn loose the worst there is in them. Even when rich people are friendly with each other it's usually in the hope of getting some sordid advantage."

"Do you apply that to yourself or only to others?"

"It applies to me—it has applied to me ever since I found what sort of a world I was living in."

"I don't believe it, my dear girl," drawled Frothingham, the more convincingly for the lack of energy in his tone. And he gave her a quick, queer look through his eyeglass and was stolid again.

She colored just a little. "Oh, I suppose I'd be as big a goose as ever if I should fall in love again."

"Again?"

She laughed. "I've been in love four times in the last four years, and almost in love three times more. That's a poor record for a Washington girl—there are so many temptations, with all these fascinating foreigners streaming through. But I'm not counting the times I've been made love to in half a dozen modern languages—I and my father's money."

"Possibly you're unjust to some of the men who've said they admired you. They may not have attached so much importance to your father's money as—you do."

The thrust tickled her vanity—nature had given her an over-measure of vanity to compensate for her under-measure of charm. She looked pleased, though she said: "I don't deceive myself as to myself."

"A man might have been attracted to you because you had money," continued Frothingham dispassionately, "and might have stayed on for your own sake."

Elsie lifted her eyebrows. "Perhaps," she said. "I'll admit it's possible."

"And, honestly now, do you pretend that you'd marry a man who had nothing to offer you but love? What has attracted you in the men you've thought well of? You say there have been four—or, rather, four and three halves. Has any one of 'em been a poor devil of a nobody?"

Elsie hesitated; in the twilight he saw from the corner of his eye that her upper lip was trembling. They were walking near the tall, white, glistening monument, in the quiet street that skirts the grounds of the White House. "One," she said at last, in a low voice, "I didn't care especially for him. But sometimes I think he really did care for me—he was a wild, sensitive creature." She looked at Frothingham and smiled. "And when I get in my black moods I'm half sorry I sent him away."

"But you did send him away, didn't you?" Frothingham's expression and tone were satirical, yet sympathetic, too. "And you complain of men for being precisely as you are!"

"I hadn't thought of that," she admitted.

"I take it for granted the girl who consents to marry me will consent because she wishes to be a Countess." He drew closer to her—she looked her best in twilight hours, and he succeeded in putting as much tenderness into his voice as was necessary to enable so drawling and indifferent a person to create an impression of sentiment. "If I were walking here with the girl I wished to win, I'd say nothing of sentiment. I'd simply trust to the only thing I have that could possibly induce her to listen to me."

She glanced shyly up at him—he thought her almost pretty.

"Do you think that would win her?" he asked in a low tone.

"I—don't—know," she replied slowly. Her commonplace voice had also been touched with the magic that had transformed her face.

"Won't you think of it?"

"If you wish," she murmured.

They went on in silence a few minutes, then she spoke in an attempt at her usual voice: "But we must turn back. I'll have just time to dress for dinner."

And he decided that he would say no more on the principal subject for several days. He thought he understood how to deal with American girls rather better now. "I'll give her a chance to walk round the trap," he thought. And then he reminded himself that it was hardly a trap—wasn't she getting the better of the bargain? "She's indulging in a luxury, while I'm after a desperate necessary. And, by Jove, it won't be easy not to make a face, if I get it—with her."

XIII

SO CONFIDENT was he—and so out of conceit with his impending success—that he took a three days' vacation, going up to New York with Wallingford to attend a ball for which Longview had hired half of Sherry's, and otherwise to amuse himself. The revisiting of the scene of his early failure depressed him; he lost nearly a thousand dollars at roulette; he borrowed a thousand from Wallingford; he returned to Washington in the depths of the blues. And he found the posture of his affairs completely changed.

On the very day he gave Elsie the chance to become a Countess Prince Rontivogli discovered that Ysobel Ballantyne was in love with Boughton and would risk his succeeding to the title. Rontivogli was not the man to waste time on impossibilities—indeed, he had no time to waste. He turned away from the beautiful Miss Ballantyne instantly, and with all the ardor of his fiery Southern nature laid siege to Elsie Pope. And, while Elsie was somewhat reserved in her welcome, he found an ally in her father who thought it would sound extremely well to be able to say, "My daughter, the Princess."

Rontivogli was tall, had a clear, pallid skin, eloquent black eyes, the brow and nose and chin of an Italian patrician, the manners and speech of chivalrous courtesy to women which disguise profound contempt for their intelligence. He spoke English indifferently, French fluently.

When Frothingham, just returned from New York and still enshrouded in surly gloom, drove up to Pope's door, he saw Rontivogli's little victoria standing a few yards down the drive. Rontivogli was conducting himself in Washington as if he were rich, so plausibly that only the foreign element was without doubts as to the object of his visit to America. At sight of this trap Frothingham scowled. "What's that Italian doing here?" he said to himself, and his fear answered the question. When they came face to face in the parlor Elsie greatly enjoyed it. The Italian was smooth and urbane; Frothingham, careless of the feelings of a man he despised and thoroughly English in his indifference to the demands of courtesy to Elsie, was almost uncivil. He and Elsie talked for a few minutes, then she drew Rontivogli into the conversation. The Prince answered in French, and French became the language. Frothingham spoke it far worse than Rontivogli spoke English, so he was practically excluded. He sat dumb and stolid, wondering why "the brute hasn't the decency to take himself off when I came last."

But "the brute" drew Elsie into a lively discussion on a book he had sent her and, because there was no break in the argument, was seemingly not impolite in lingering. It was almost an hour before he rose, kissed her hand, gave her an adoring look, said "A bientôt," and departed. But, although he was physically gone, he was actually still there—if anything, Frothingham was more acutely conscious of him.

"I don't believe Miss Ballantyne could stand that fellow," he said, conscious of tactlessness, but too angry to care. "I think all those Latins unendurable. They're a snaky lot, and their manners suggest waiters and valets."

Elsie flushed and slightly drew in the corners of her mouth, a sure sign that her temper had been roused in the worst way—through wounded vanity. "Oh, you British are so insular," she replied, "and so self-satisfied. Here in Washington we learn to appreciate all kinds of foreigners and to make allowances even for Englishmen"—that last with a mere veneer of good nature. "I think Rontivogli charming. He's so intelligent, and has so much temperament."

Frothingham recovered his self-control in presence of obvious danger. He looked calmly at her through his eyeglass. "No doubt you're right," he drawled. "Rontivogli's a decent enough chap, so far as I know, and for an Italian devilish clean looking, I must say."

Elsie had no intention of driving him off; in spite of the Italian's superiority in title and "temperament," she preferred the Englishman—she knew him better and in a more candid way. She became conciliatory and they were soon amicable again. But Frothingham saw that his vacation had been perilously costly, that he must work to reinstate himself, that it was not a wise moment for reopening the matter of the engagement which only four days ago seemed all but settled. He found that Elsie was dining at the Italian Embassy, to go afterward to a ball at the Vice-President's to which he was invited. He spoke for several dances and left.

Boughton and he dined together at the Metropolitan Club. While they were having a preliminary cocktail Boughton told him, in confidence, that he was engaged to Ysobel Ballantyne. "So that's why I find Rontivogli poaching," thought Frothingham. And he said presently: "What do you know about that chap Rontivogli? He looks a queer 'un to me."

"Not a thing," replied Boughton. "I had all our fellows writing over to the other side, following him up. The answers thus far show nothing downright shady. He's down to a box of a house and a few acres just north of Milan. And that's swamped in mortgages. No one knows how he raised the wind for this trip. He seems to have a good bit of cash, doesn't he?"

"I'm particularly interested in knowing about him," continued Frothingham. "He's developed an astonishing interest in a girl friend of mine. I'd hate to see her taken in by a scamp. And I'm sure he's that."

"Oh," said Boughton. "Miss Pope?"

"Yes," replied Frothingham. "And she thinks well of him."

"I'll be glad to help you, old man. I sha'n't drop my inquiry as I'd intended."

"Thanks," said Frothingham. And they talked of other matters.

When he looked Elsie up at the Vice-President's that night for the first of the dances she had promised him, he found her on a rustic bench in the garden, almost screened from observation, Rontivogli beside her. The Italian's classic face was aglow and Frothingham saw that he had checked a torrent of enamored eloquence. He saw, also, that Elsie was not pleased by the interruption. However, she left Rontivogli and went with him. As they entered the ballroom he said: "I don't care for this music, do you? Let's sit it out. Only"—he gave her a look of quiet raillery—"you must engage not to go back to your volcano until my dance is over."

"Volcano?" A smile of pleased vanity strayed into her eyes and out again.

"Yes—your Vesuvius, whose eruption I was brute enough to interrupt. Beastly of me, wasn't it?"

"Rontivogli seems to annoy you a great deal."

"He? Not in the least." And his tranquil eyeglass affirmed his falsehood. "But I assure you he'll spout all the fiercer for the interruption. I know those Southern chaps. I don't wonder we stand no show against 'em. I tossed the sponge as soon as I saw what he was about."

They were sitting on the stairs now and could talk without being overheard. "Possibly you may remember," he went on, "I said something that was rather important to me—last Thursday, down near the monument—at half-past six precisely, to be exact—I heard a clock strike as I finished. Do you recall it?"

Elsie was puzzled by his light, satirical tone. "Yes," she said. "I do vaguely recall that you said something vague."

"I didn't mean to be vague. But that doesn't matter now. I see there's no chance for me—at present. And I wished to say to you that at least I sha'n't give up our delightful friendship. No matter what you do with your Italian, you'll feel that I'm your friend, won't you?" Frothingham said it as if he meant it; and to a considerable extent he did mean it—chagrined though he was, he fancied her so little in the rôle he had invited her to play that his prospective defeat found him not utterly despondent. He had reasoned out his course carefully and had come to the conclusion that his chance lay in posing as her disinterested friend. Perhaps she would confide in him, would give him the opportunity to advise and criticise—an admirable position from which to undermine and destroy his rival.

As Elsie had not fully made up her mind to Rontivogli and as she saw nothing but advantage to her in keeping Frothingham "on the string," she responded to his frank and manly appeal. And she believed what he said, as she believed pretty much everything men told her; and she liked him better than ever. "If he were only a prince," she said to herself regretfully, "and had temperament."

That same night she accepted Rontivogli; and when Frothingham came to lunch the next day she told him.

"Well," he drawled, "I can't say I'm shouting glad. But I can honestly congratulate him. And—I hope you won't regret."

"We're not announcing the engagement for several days," she said.

"That's good. You don't mind my saying—you know we've agreed to be friends—but I think you—your father ought to make careful inquiry about him. I'm sure everything's all right, but—it's prudent."

Elsie smiled. "Oh, we have made inquiries," she said. "Besides, any one can see what sort of man he is—any one but a prejudiced Englishman."

"I don't deny I'm prejudiced. Is it surprising?" And he gave her a long look that might have meant anything or nothing. "But—one can't be too careful about foreigners."

"Foreigners!" Elsie laughed with good-humored mockery. "And what are you?"

"Why, an Englishman. We don't count as foreigners here."

"No—but as stepbrothers, which is much more suspicious."

Frothingham found encouragement in her willingness to discuss her fiancé with him—it showed plainly how foreign she felt to Rontivogli, how friendly to him. A few afternoons later—it was the day after the dinner at which her engagement was formally announced—she went with Frothingham to call on "Madame Almansa" in her surroundings of Spartan simplicity. They found Ysobel and Boughton there also, and when Ysobel took Frothingham and Boughton into the small library adjoining the smaller drawing-room to look at some old prints "Sue" had brought with her from Spain, Elsie talked with "Sue" of the engagement.

"ONE OF THE FINEST I EVER SAW. THE FLAW IS SLIGHT"

Madame Almansa was chary of congratulations, full of cautionings and doubts. "I don't wish to cast a shadow on your happiness, dear—for you are happy, aren't you?"

"Indeed I am," replied Elsie convincingly—Rontivogli was an ideal lover; he could even sing his mad passion in a voice that was well trained and thrilling.

"But—you know my sad experience." Madame Almansa sighed like Medea thinking on the treachery of Jason. Her glance fell upon the engagement ring. She took Elsie's hand. "How beautiful!" she exclaimed. "I love emeralds, and that is a magnificent one. And only a tiny flaw."

Elsie colored with annoyance. "I think you are mistaken," she said. "It's a perfect jewel."

"Certainly it is perfect, dear," replied Madame Almansa in her superior, informative tone. "Perfect for an emerald. But, you know, there are no emeralds of size anywhere in the world that haven't flaws. At least, I never heard of one. Emeralds are valuable in spite of their flaws."

Elsie colored again, this time with annoyance at having exposed her ignorance.

"A superb setting," continued Madame Almansa. "It must be very, very old. I love that kind of setting—beautifully engraved, dull gold. The only objection is that it's the best kind for deceiving one as to genuineness, isn't it? One could not tell whether that stone was genuine or imitation. You know, they make such wonderful imitations. When I was going out in the world I had all my best jewels reproduced in imitation stuff, and usually I wore the imitation. One felt so much safer."

Elsie drew her hand away, smiling sweetly. She was inwardly raging—"The cat!" she said to herself. "Clawing me viciously, and purring all the time."

She left in a few minutes, Rontivogli calling for her. To relieve her feelings and also because she was in the habit of saying nearly everything that came into her head, she told him what Madame Almansa had said about the ring.

Rontivogli, half-turned toward her as they sat side by side in her victoria, regarded her with his luminous smile. "That is the way of the world, ma belle et bonne," he said in his gentlest manner. "It is difficult to harden one's self to such wickedness. But there is also much that is beautiful and fine. And we—you and I—will shut everything else out of our lives, will we not?"

He made her feel unworthy, almost "common," when he talked in that fashion—she realized painfully that she was sadly lacking in "temperament," and she dreaded that he might find her out.

"The ring," he went on, "has been in the family for eight hundred years—perhaps longer. It is unchanged. No question of its genuineness has ever been raised, so far as I know. We are not so suspicious as some of you Americans."

"She didn't question its genuineness," replied Elsie. "She simply wished to make me uncomfortable with a malicious insinuation. Or, may be, she was just talking. It was silly of me to tell you."

He protested that he was not disturbed. But he seemed unable long to keep off the subject, returning to it as the cleverest habitual liar will fatuously return to his unquestioned lie to weaken it by trying further to bolster it up. So persistent was he that he at last made her uneasy—not that she suspected him or was conscious of having been disturbed by his unnecessary reassurances. The next morning she went down to a jeweler's in Pennsylvania Avenue—she had other business there and thought it was her sole object in going, forgetting that she had intended to send her mother. She discussed several proposed purchases with the manager, whom she knew well. As she talked she had her elbows on a show case and her ungloved hands clasped so that the ring was in full view—curiously it was not on the engagement finger. He noted it, and thought she wished him to speak of it, because as she exhibited it she often glanced at it.

"Would you mind letting me look at that beautiful ring?" he asked.

"Certainly." She drew it off with a certain nervousness, gave it to him, and, as he looked, watched him and it alternately with vague anxiety.

"A very old and a very quaint setting," he said, "and a fine——"

He paused; her mouth was dry and her skin hot.

"A fine stone—a beautiful stone," he continued. "One of the finest I ever saw. The flaw is slight."

Elsie drew a long breath—she felt an unaccountable sense of relief. The manager took his glass, went to the window and studied the stone and the setting. "I'm glad to hear you say the stone's genuine," said she, now admitting to herself that Madame Almansa's poison had been lurking far down in her mind. "Some one doubted it, and as it was important to me to know, I intended to ask you."

"In that case," said the manager, "I feel it's my duty to tell you the stone's an imitation."

Elsie grew rigid and cold from amazement and rising horror.

"A good imitation," continued the manager, intent upon the stone, "but unquestionably not genuine. The setting makes it additionally deceptive."

"How much is the ring worth?" she asked, gathering herself together heroically.

HAZING—By Jesse Lynch Williams

IN WHICH AN "OLD GRAD" RISES TO MAKE A FEW REMARKS ON AN ANCIENT COLLEGE INSTITUTION

SO THE sophomores have been making it interesting for you, have they? I'm glad of it; that's one of the things you came to college for. You will agree with me after you get out, if not sooner. What's that? Well, let me illustrate.

Once upon a time during the old days of free, untrammeled hazing—real hazing, I mean, not mere persiflage and pamphlets containing formal freshman-year restrictions—there was a certain professor's son. And he thought his father was a greater man than the president—the president of the college, I mean, for the president of the country was a mere Philistine and did not count. The son should not be blamed for this, because the father would have been inclined to agree with him. I should add that not all professors take themselves so hard. There is a system of hazing that goes on with them, too, even to-day. When a young instructor comes back from Germany weighted down with the dignity of his Ph. D. and feeling sorry for the United States and its deplorable lack of real scholarship—— But about this boy:

"They'd better not try to haze me," he remarked the day he matriculated. "My father is a professor."

It was hard to secure him because he lived at his father's home, and the sophomores did not dare go there after him, even in those days.

"They don't dare haze me," he announced to his classmates as he crossed the campus; "I am the son of Professor Blank." (He always pronounced the capital P in Professor.)

After painstaking efforts Fate delivered him into the sophomores' hands by night. He smiled a kindly warning at them. "Evidently you do not realize who I am," he said, as if to break it gently.

"Um," said his captors gloatingly, "it is hard to realize that we've got you at last." And they hurried him along over the dark road toward the canal.

"You'd better not," he announced; "my father is Professor Blank."

"We know that," was the answer; "that's the reason. Now then," they added, "here's for your father," as they ducked him in a businesslike manner under the cool, moonlit ripples of the canal. "And here," they repeated as he came up spluttering, "is one for you. Now will you be good?"

"You will suffer for this," he roared when he got breath enough; "my father——"

"Ah? then here's for our suffering. Now will you be good?" In the course of time he said he would, and he was. He has been a better man for it ever since. They saw to it that he had exercise enough on the way home to keep from dying of pneumonia, and he has lived to return thanks for it—as father used to tell us we should do, you may remember, when he led the way into his study and closed the door.

The canal cure reminds me of the celebrated case of young Pollington, and I tell you this to show you that even I acknowledge that too much medicine is worse than none.

You may have heard the public version of this story; the papers were full of it.

I don't know what was the matter with Pollington; perhaps it was because he came to college with a reputation as an expert swimmer and they did not want him to get out of practice. Some say they gave him more encouragement to swim than he deserved—at any rate, it was more than he wanted, for one dark night, as they loosed their hold of him while he took off his clothes, he slipped out of their reach and plunged head first into the water and—that was all. He did not reappear above the surface. The sophomores waited seconds which seemed like hours, looking up and down the stream. They saw nothing. He was gone.

And they were responsible. That was what came upon them now like a thunderbolt as they ran up to the village for help. But even grappling hooks brought nothing to the surface. Only his clothes were on the bank where they had made him take them off, a pathetic little pile of clothes it seemed now. When carried back to his room a letter was found in the coat pocket. It was addressed to his classmates and said, "I cannot stand it longer. Good-by." The authorities were aroused. The college became excited. The newspapers got hold of it. It was telegraphed all over the country—big headlines, many editorials. Detectives were put on the case. Finally all but one or two of the sophomores were rounded up. First they were brought in for a hearing before the President and expelled from college. The culprits were about to be turned over to the civil authorities, waiting outside the faculty-room. Pollington himself walked in.

He had swum under water across the canal and had come up noiselessly—a trick known to many swimmers—in the shadow of some bushes on the opposite bank. Then waiting there with only his nose above water until the sophomores left in a panic, he quietly put on a change of clothing which he had hidden in the bushes during the afternoon, and spent the night at a farmhouse, then took an early morning train for a little holiday at home. The hazers had been badly enough hazed already and got off rather easily.

I know of a different case which did not get into the papers. It has never been told before.

Usually the hazing was deserved, and in almost all cases the hazers were reasonable, decent enough chaps who did their harmless tricks—the canal cure was seldom employed—if not as a duty to their younger brothers, at least as a harmless pleasure for themselves. Occasionally, however, there was a bully, like Bum Batter. He was a big, thick-headed brute, as strong as an ox and quite as slow. His special delight was goading nice, innocent, hardworking freshmen, nervous, sensitive little fellows, whose superior sense and sensibilities probably riled up all the bully in big, stupid Batter. Little Harrison Sinclair stood it patiently for a while because he wanted to get everything that was coming to him as a college man. But finally this is what happened:

Did you ever hear of Ike Weir, the "Belfast Spider"? There used to be much about him in the sporting columns of the newspapers, in the old days when he was champion featherweight of the world. By this time he had reached the boxing-lessons stage of his career and was called "The Professor" at the Athletic Club of which Sinclair was a junior member. Sinclair wrote a long letter that brought the Belfast Spider down to visit his former pupil. That night Bum Batter and a noisy little nuisance named Channing came around to have their usual sport with their victims. "Another skinny little poler, eh?" drawled Channing, sticking his finger under Ike Weir's face. "You must have been looking for trouble to come into this room." The pugilist had a lean, intelligent face and had borrowed Sinclair's glasses and a cap for the occasion. "Take off your hat, freshman," bawled Batter.

The Belfast Spider kept staring at a Greek book which he held upside down, though he didn't know that.

"Take it off for him, Channing," growled Batter, implying that this was really too easy for the great Batter to bother with.

"With pleasure," said Channing, and tried to.

Ike in his palmy days had a very pretty way of doing these things. It was so quick that all they saw was the pseudo-freshman springing up from his chair, the flash of a fist, and then Channing thoughtfully picking himself up on the far side of the room, with a red welt forming on his jaw. The pugilist had sat down again and assumed his rôle of the studious student.

"Well! this won't do at all. I'll have to take a hand in this myself," said Batter, rather pleased at the excuse. "Now then, freshman," in a mighty voice, "let's see you take off that hat and apologize to Mr. Channing." No reply; only a quiet, catlike glance. "Here, here! Take it off, I tell you!" Batter now shook his fists.

"Aw! g'wan!" said the Spider. He had been coached not to talk, but forgot in the enthusiasm of his art.

Batter thought the "lanky little poler" was guying his own rather uncouth enunciation, and it made him furious. The real freshmen were chuckling expectantly by this time—which also was contrary to rehearsal—and that made Batter still more furious. "You miserable little pup," he bawled, drawing back his left, "I'll teach you once for all to be impudent to me. Take that!"

The Spider quickly moved his head six inches to one side without changing his expression. "Slower'n I sized you up to be," he grinned. And then the inevitable happened. Down and up. Down and up. Then down and out, and hazing was all over in North Entry.

Usually when a boy was hazed much his need was great. These last two cases were merely exceptions to prove the rule, and I have yet to hear of a graduate regretting that he was hazed. But I have recalled these bits of history chiefly to show you how much more conscientious sophomores used to be in the rough-and-ready days of old and to make you feel a little more pleased with the present methods.

Oh, I know you haven't kicked. If you had I shouldn't respect you enough to take the trouble to talk to you. But I can tell from the tenor of your letters, enthusiastic though they be, that you think it rather hard luck, now that you are free from the irksome restraint of schooldays, that a big boy like you, in college at last and called a man by courtesy, cannot do exactly as he pleases and stick out his chest like the college men he used to see at football games.

You have sense enough to smile about it, I see, but you can't quite understand why you should be made to feel so insignificant. When you stop to think of it, you are pretty insignificant, to be sure, but you don't see why you shouldn't be allowed on the street after nine o'clock, and you no doubt think you'd feel a lot more like a real college man if they let you smoke a pipe. You don't fancy making way, and even stepping off the walk at times, for every one on the campus except other freshmen. You think it rather absurd that in a college which has grown up into a university and is supposed to have put away childish things that you can wear no other style of head covering than a mild form of black cap.

But it only lasts a year, this rather pleasant purgatory; and you'll appreciate your blatant blessedness all the more when you, in turn, are a sophomore, covered with the college colors, and are yawping terribly at next year's frightened freshmen. Then I fancy you won't think all this so absurd.

Even the sophomores, you'll find, have to give way to the juniors, and the juniors to the seniors, and the seniors, who seem to you to own the campus, if not the earth, touch their hats respectfully to the instructors, and the instructors to the assistant professors, and so on up the scale of academic dignity. It seems rather absurd sometimes to people outside, and so it is, but there is bound to be some kind of ranking here as there is all over the world, even in America where we are supposed to be free and equal, but never were nor shall be, and certainly the best class distinction for a college is the distinction of classes—academic seniority. With human nature as it is there is bound to be some kind, and if not this kind there might be distinctions that harked back to money or social position.

And if such were the case, Dick, you might never learn certain valuable life lessons which every man ought clearly to understand.

THEY WERE BROUGHT IN FOR A HEARING BEFORE THE PRESIDENT

The Man of the Hour in Venezuela

By John Callan O'Laughlin

AN ANECDOTAL CHARACTER STUDY OF THE MANY-SIDED CASTRO

PRESIDENT CASTRO

GREAT BRITAIN, Germany and Italy in attempting to teach Venezuela a lesson have learned a more serious one themselves. They have impressed the fact of their strength upon President Castro and have compelled him to take action for the settlement of claims filed against his Government. They have aroused in Venezuela a feeling of hostility which has been held in check but which nevertheless is powerful, and as it cannot find expression in acts of war will be asserted in the channels of trade. They have convinced Venezuela that the United States is the sole obstacle between the allies and her territory. But of greater consequence to them and to the United States is that the whole of Central and South America, from the Rio Grande to the Straits of Magellan, has taken alarm at the buccaneering methods of the European Governments, and forgetting its old-time fear of the Monroe Doctrine is now a unit in its support.

America's Gain, Europe's Loss

From the point of view of the United States, therefore, dangerous though the possibilities of complications arising out of the Venezuelan question may be, the action of the Powers has produced most advantageous results. When I first visited Venezuela last November there existed throughout the political class a feeling of dissatisfaction toward the North American Republic. The good effect of the intervention of President Cleveland in the boundary question between Venezuela and Great Britain had been largely dissipated by the attitude of Washington in the asphalt controversy. President Castro was credited with entertaining hostile views toward foreigners, including Americans. It was stated by reliable and well-informed persons that if Castro could have his way he would expel all not citizens of the Republics and close the Legations in Caracas. These may have been his sentiments at the time, but certainly they were not those of the people, and when I talked with the President he was convincing in his plea for more friendly relations with the United States and urged me to dwell upon the rich resources of Venezuela and the great opportunities for American capital. Following the seizure of the Venezuelan navy by British and German men-of war, and the establishment of the blockade of the ports of the Republic, there were many manifestations of confidence in the United States and unanimous condemnation of the allied Powers. The newspapers published cartoons in which Uncle Sam figured as the watchdog of the Western Hemisphere and the guardian in particular of Venezuela. They daily printed notices, prepared by the Government, urging that no Venezuelan purchase goods manufactured or imported by the blockading nations.

It is a tribute to the self-control of the Venezuelans that they have consistently refrained from firing upon the allies save at Maracaibo, where the Germans were the aggressors; and this is the more remarkable when it is considered that it was the practice of the foreign men-of-war to capture small fishing schooners and anchor them, with prize crews, near the shore, where they served as a reminder of the tyranny and injustice of three great Powers.

The man who is responsible for this display of self-control is Castro. His enemies charge that he is the destroyer of his country. He believes he holds its destiny in his hands. His enemies insist that he is weak. Castro's answer is his deeds. He has maintained himself in Caracas in spite of revolution and war with three of the great Powers of the world. The people who were loyal to him before the blockade was instituted are to-day his adherents. In spite of the moral support the action of the Powers has given to Matos, and the inability to import ammunition, an inability which his rival does not suffer, Castro has held the advantage he gained by the decisive battle of La Victoria, and only recently administered a crushing defeat to a strong detachment of the rebels. There will be many who will ask: What manner of man is Matos that he continues revolution when his country is the subject of acts of war by European Powers? The same question is asked in Venezuela. When I saw Matos at Curaçao, to which island he fled after his defeat at La Victoria, he told me that Castro was the root of all of Venezuela's ills. "He is a ruffian," he declared.

"I owe you ten dollars, which I promised to return to-day. But I cannot pay to-day. I tell you so and ask for a month. I am an honest man and you grant me the delay. If I am a scoundrel, you say: 'No, I cannot give you a moment. You must pay the debt now.' That is the attitude of the Powers. They will not trust Castro, but if I were in Caracas the difficulty would be adjusted immediately."

At one time Matos was one of Castro's ardent adherents. An attempt on the part of the President to squeeze his pocketbook is said to be responsible for his expenditure of half a million dollars to expel Castro from Caracas. Yet Matos has the reputation of being a stingy man. The President vouches for it. "Those who know Matos," he said to me, "understand that he will spend but little from his own pocket." He evidently had in mind his own experience with Matos. Shortly before the latter began his revolt Castro applied for a "loan." It was refused. Threats failed to induce compliance. Then Matos was arrested and put into prison. Prudence counseled him to oblige the President and the moment the transaction occurred Matos was free. A few days after his release he made a speech in which he lauded Castro, and the echo of his remarks had not ceased when he began his revolution. It has been in progress since December, 1901.

Castro's Rise from a Clerkship

Castro's administration has been a stormy one, but in this respect it is simply a repetition of every other period of his career. Before his entrance into public life he was a clerk in a small store in Los Andes, one of the western states of Venezuela. He developed a taste for politics and obtained election to the lower house of the Venezuelan Congress. There he attracted attention by his ability and readiness in debate. "Take note of that man," said General Pulido, at the time a high officer of the Congress, to his nephew, now Venezuelan Chargé d'Affaires in Washington, "because if he live the country will know him." Eight years later General Pulido was Secretary of War in Castro's Cabinet.

Castro's attainment of the Presidency savors of audacity. In Venezuela they tell of him that when he was unknown he called at the Government palace and asked to be admitted to the President. "He cannot see you," he was informed.

"Some day," he said to the astonished official, "I will be President, and no one will dare then to deny me admission to this office."

From that time on the leaven of Presidential ambition fermented. Taking advantage of Andrade's unpopularity, Castro, with a little band of fifty men, proclaimed a revolution. His headquarters were in his native state, and the people flocked to him. He had a succession of victories. They attracted more adherents. He captured a seaport, through which ammunition reached him, and then he marched on and occupied Caracas. It was quite the usual method of attaining the Presidency and he was hailed as a hero. Unfortunate appointments to his Cabinet changed public sentiment, and General Hernandez, known better as "El Mocho" because of the loss of one of his hands, initiated a revolution. Castro pursued him relentlessly and after a three months' campaign captured and put him into prison. When at Port of Spain, Trinidad, which has served as a base of supplies for the revolutionists, I chanced to meet a number of revolutionists. Like Matos they could see nothing good in the character of the President. "He is a coward," they insisted.

"That is not his reputation in Venezuela," I suggested.

A BATTALION LEAVING CARACAS FOR LA GUAYRA TO AID IN THE DEFENSE

"What would you say of a man who, frightened by an earthquake, jumped out of a window, basely forgetting his wife? That is what Castro did. He broke his leg. Madame Castro quietly walked down the stairs and out of the front door."

"But a man might be terrified by a thing of that kind," I urged, "and not know what he was doing. Under fire, isn't he brave?"

"Oh, yes," was the response, "but everybody is courageous on the fighting line."

"And isn't he energetic?" I asked.

There was a sudden loss of interest in the conversation. "Hum, ye-es," was the reply. "But now there is Matos ——" And there was an immediate reawakening of attention.

Castro is energetic. The walk of the man betrays it. His whole demeanor shows it. His troops do not forget that at La Victoria he jumped into a freight car and threw boxes upon the platform which were conveyed with dispatch to them. Had not this ammunition arrived, La Victoria would have been Castro's Waterloo. The President does not lack pride in his achievements. "Three thousand men attacked me on October 13 last," he said, "and I repulsed them with three hundred. The position was the key to the battle." His subordinate officers speak highly of his generalship. "He is a splendid leader," said General Velutini, who captured Barcelona. "In the revolutionary ranks they have many, many generals; in ours but one—Castro."

The President's Shrewd Diplomacy

That the President does not lack shrewdness, recent events have demonstrated. When he saw the speck on the international horizon, betokening a storm, he endeavored to solidify Venezuela. He released all the political prisoners, including Hernandez, who, in a manifesto, urged support of the Government. Angered by the seizure of his navy, he ordered the arrest of all British and German subjects in Venezuela. Upon the advice of the United States Minister, Mr. Herbert W. Bowen, he immediately released them. Castro appreciated the force of Mr. Bowen's suggestion that the action of the allies was offensive to civilization and that he should not affect his excellent position by any act of retaliation upon helpless persons. When the question of sending a peace representative to Washington arose, two hundred and fifty men of all parties asked for the appointment of Minister Bowen. Though he knew there were Venezuelans who believed one of their nationality should be given the duty, the President communicated at once with Mr. Bowen and requested him to serve.

By this move he obtained representation by a man who, aside from his ability, was Minister of the United States and had behind him the moral support of his Government, who had taken care of the interests of the allies from the time of the departure of their envoys from Caracas, and who had a thorough knowledge of Venezuela's financial condition and the rotten character of many of the claims held against her.

Yet Castro is not an educated man. "He has the keenness of the mountaineer," said one of his admirers, "and the cleverness of the plains." It has been said of him that he has no idea of geography. To him Venezuela is the great state of the world. It is her welfare he desires and it is her welfare he says he is seeking.

Why People Talk About Us

IT IS not strange that we Americans are pleased and flattered by the amount and the kind of attention we have been attracting in Europe during the past five years. But it is somewhat astonishing that we should permit a very small part of the American people to appropriate all the credit for the outburst of admiring envy.

Europe became acutely aware of us in 1898—a year of two events for us:

First: We ousted an ancient and impotent cripple whose presence in our neighborhood had become most offensive, and incidentally we relieved him of an Asiatic insular burden that had almost exhausted the last drops of his vitality.

Second: We entered the full tide of that material prosperity which began in the spring of 1896, and we were floated by it into a dominating position in the markets of Europe.

If we had fought the Spanish war and had remained commercially insignificant in the European markets, does any one who gives the matter thought fancy that Europe would be talking about us now? International gossips, professional fighting men and schoolboy statesmen excepted, both America and Europe know that the only European nation with which we could carry on a real war is England. And England has shown that she would endure much at our hands rather than provoke us to that extremity. With the only Power which could possibly war with us thus friendly, why attach importance to the shrieks of German and Austrian irresponsibles who chatter only because there isn't a discernible human probability of a serious attempt at a war? Why heed silly talk of the little German Navy—or a big one, should Germany build it—steaming four thousand miles from a coal supply to attack us? The German Emperor may be eccentric, but he isn't crazy; and, if he were, there are statesmen in Germany.

No, but for the second great and overshadowingly important fact of 1898, Europe would have continued to have small interest in us. Here are two conclusions from statistics which show the tremendous significance of the inauguration of our commercial supremacy:

First: In these four years of our growing European fame the excess of our exports, chiefly to Europe, over our imports was nearly three thousand million dollars. This excess was greater than for the entire twenty previous years combined.

Second: While our exports of foodstuffs are about twice what they were twenty years ago, our exports of manufactured goods are more than seven times as great as they were twenty years ago. And like our foodstuffs, these manufactures go for the most part to Europe.

There we see why there is hardly a home in Europe where we are not talked about nearly every day. The farmers are talking about the competition of American foodstuffs. The manufacturers and their workmen are talking about the competition of American manufactures. And the shopkeepers are selling and the people are buying American-made goods—and talking about the country from which these new and cheaper and better articles come. They have forgotten Dewey at Manila, Roosevelt at San Juan; they know nothing of the vast outpourings of Congressional eloquence for the saving and prosperity of the country which daily find their swift way into the lost river of the Congressional Record. But they are incessantly reminded of the energy of American merchants and the skill of American workmen.

Machinery—using the word in its broadest sense—has made business the chief concern of the whole world. It has transformed politics into business, has made statesmen and politicians and kings and ambassadors and ministers the agents and servants of business. And we are attracting world-attention because we have been acting upon, and are now teaching other nations to act upon, the maxim that universal prosperity is the first and vital step toward universal progress.

Nor need we fear "trade wars" that menace the imagination of our whangdoodle "conservative statesmen." Those to whom we sell good goods at low prices aren't going to fight us. Those whom we teach to make better goods at low prices are going to be too busy to quarrel. Those who won't learn are going the way of all failures. Machinery is multiplying the capacity of the earth for population. It is multiplying markets as fast as it is multiplying products. Those who talk of world-markets as if they were narrow and growing narrower talk without thinking. On the contrary, in the world-markets there is room for all, there will be room for all—and there will always be an unlimited number of vacant stalls waiting for newcomers with the brains and the goods.

And when the people reduce political and military and journalistic busybodies to their proper station, the peaceful and progressive interchange of material and mental commodities will be less often impeded and interrupted. To the rear with the man who talks and threatens! To the fore with the man who thinks and works!

What the World is Crying For

THE common but very erroneous impression prevails that the great want of the day is the man with ideas; that the world is crying for such a man, and is ready to fall at his feet. Nothing could be further from the truth. Ideas are as plentiful as the flowers that bloom in the spring; the men who are afflicted with them are as the leaves that fall in autumn.

The great want is the man who can put ideas into practice; who can crystallize theories. For one man who can ring the bell thousands can hit the target. For one who can do a thing, thousands can tell how it can be done.

Another common error is the supposition that an idea strikes just one fortunate individual, who is sure to profit by it. For instance, one might almost think, judging from the common belief, that the idea of the rotundity of the earth was an inspiration of Columbus. It was nothing of the kind. The Chinese, the Arabians, the Egyptians—all had an idea that the earth was round. The idea was in the air, and was handed down from the more ancient peoples to the inhabitants of Europe. Columbus set to work to prove it.

When Edison had succeeded in making the incandescent lamp, and the report of his success was published, dozens of men who were working on the same problem wrote explanations of the impossibility of Edison having done what he claimed to have done. The protestors had been working at the matter for years, but had not succeeded in finding the value of the elusive x.

A suggestion of the wire-wound gun—which is often erroneously regarded as something entirely new—was in the cannon fired at Creçy. At the time of the Civil War a number of men were working quietly on this very "discovery."

The atmosphere is charged with ideas. The successful man is he who can supply the link which will chain them down to the real.

Too Much of a Good Thing

NOT a day passes without some more or less impressive instance of the uncertain state of our administration of justice. Now it is a criminal freed, though guilt is in every knot of the web of evidence which envelops him; again it is Judge Lynch executing the mandates of savage passion. Now it is men of power leering at the law from behind an impregnable corporate bulwark; again these men are executing upon their victims a law of sinister procurement. Of course, if the scales of justice were not in the main held even, if there were not mitigations of and compensations for the very worst miscarriages, the time for quiet discussion and warning would have passed. Fortunately for us all, that time is still ours.

It is no answer to the indictment to say that the evil will cure itself when it becomes a real menace. Nor is it an answer to say that justice is better administered than formerly or is more evenly administered in this Republic than anywhere else on earth. Both these statements are true; and it is also true that the grossest injustices of our time come from the fact that the law has not yet caught up with the astounding social and industrial development of the past half century, has not yet learned how to reach the new and most ingenious variations upon chicane and crime. But justice, as Webster well said, is man's chief earthly concern. So long as it does not prevail men cannot afford to relax their vigilance or their anxiety.

Curiously enough, the chief reason for the persistence of injustice, in face of the careful precautions of our fundamental law against it, is the industry and enthusiasm of our lawyers. Far more than the ministers, more even than the doctors, the lawyers have had a free hand in their profession. They have been left by the American people in completer custody of justice than by any other people or governmental power on earth. And with what may be conceded to be in the main the best intentions in the world, they have made of the plain highways of justice a maze so intricate, so confusing, so beset with bogs and pitfalls of technicality, that they alone can thread it—no, not all of them, but only the shrewdest and most highly paid. It is not surprising that some hasty and unthinking citizens are moved to applaud Peter the Great's famous remark in England: "I have only two lawyers in my whole Empire, and I shall hang one of them as soon as I get home."

They cannot be justly blamed for this. It is human instinct to aggrandize and enshroud in mystery and difficulty one's own labor that one's achievement shall seem the more amazing to onlookers.

But, much and vigorous assertion to the contrary notwithstanding, not conscious corruption but the passion for nicety and technicality, for hair-splitting and word-twisting, is responsible for most of our injustice and imperfect justice.

Justice is the only begotten of the law—provided the law be begotten of common-sense and the common instinct of humanity as to right and wrong. By multiplying laws, judges are not constrained to do justice, but are tempted to forget justice in indulging the human passion for complexity and mystery. Multiplied and particularized laws hamper judges in establishing justice, create avenues of escape for offenders, place the poor man with his cheap lawyer at the mercy of the rich man with his expensive lawyer. Also they confuse or blunt the sense of justice of the whole community by bridging the abyss between right and wrong with an imposing structure of technicality.

Also, no matter what our ingenious lawyers may say, the law deals with real persons only—with human beings endowed with moral sensibilities, and by no means able to shift their responsibilities to a fictitious, unmoral, corporate personality of the lawyers' creating.

Not since the age of Tribonian and Justinian has the lawyers' ideal kind of law flourished as to-day in America. And while the lawyers call upon us to admire the work of Tribonian and Justinian, they forget that those twinned luminaries of law were twinned luminaries of a Roman world where justice lay prostrate and injustice jeered openly at a despairing and decaying civilization.

Wanted: A Master

A COMPREHENSIVE need of modern society is leadership. This need has increased with its advancing forces. Although socialism as a method of the social order is remote, yet society is becoming socialistic. Relations of men to men are becoming more intimate. All men's good is a rule and principle of conduct far more common to-day than two generations ago. The relation between all undertakings has become better articulated and more forceful. The industrial process from the individual to the partnership, from the partnership to the corporation, from the corporation to the combination, from the combination to the trust is essentially a socialistic process. Likemindedness, which as Professor Giddings intimates, is the essence of sociology, is in many relations increasing. This social condition indicates the need of a leadership wise and strong. Society is, on the whole, better in heart than it is in mind. Its intentions are worthier than are its abilities. Good people who are not wise are more common than wise people who are bad. The wise people who are more or less good are constantly obliged to exert themselves to wipe out the harm which good people who are more or less unwise do. In this vast socializing of the community the forces that are wise are greatly needed. Society made compact is easily mobilized for higher or for lower purposes. The opportunity, therefore, is ripe and the need is great for a leadership which shall be at once wise and capable.

It would seem that the forces that make up society had become mightier than the leadership of society. Life has gone ahead of our interpretation of life. The men who can properly lead society are not sufficient in number or efficient in service to fill all needs. In commerce and industry the urgent and constant call is for men. The president of the greatest national bank in this country said not long ago that the process of consolidation of great financial interests would continue in case men could be found to conduct the resulting combinations. Already it has been proved that certain men who were summoned two or three years ago to be the controlling spirits of great combinations of capital and service have proved themselves insufficient. The demand of the modern world is for masters.

In this condition the university has offered to it a magnificent opportunity. The opportunity consists in training large men for greatest service. Such training it has given. Such training it is to give in large relations and greater intensity in the next generation.

The Spirit of the Place

IN WHOM THE SPIRIT OF ROMANCE, FED BY SCOTT AND FENIMORE COOPER, WAS BEGINNING TO STIR

"IT WAS my good fortune," said the Barrister when his turn came to tell a story, "to spend my summer holidays in the days of youth at a Perthshire farmhouse which stood among hills where the plain of Strathmore begins to rise into the Grampians. There was a little river to fish, and half a dozen burns where a boy could catch trout with his hand, and moors across which he could ride on his pony, and an endless change of scene, from helping with the harvest to going out to the shooters on the twelfth, from gathering together a herd of Highland cattle on the hill, which had to be very delicately handled, to visiting a tinkers' encampment among the broom, where the men repaired pots and pans and the women told fortunes. But the glory and inexhaustible attraction of the place was an old castle which by that time had fallen into ruins, and for which no one cared, and therefore it was at all times at the disposal of a lad in whom the spirit of romance, fed by Scott and Fenimore Cooper, was beginning to stir.

"Some fighting Laird on the border-line between the Highlands and the Lowlands, who never knew when the Caterans would come over the moor from the glens above and raid the cattle he had fed for the Southern markets, had chosen the site with care. Upon two sides there was a deep little glen, with a burn running at the foot and some fine old trees on the slopes, and here the cattle of the district could be sheltered in time of danger. On the top of the steep side of the glen the castle stood, and the land sloped away from it down to a river, and beyond the river it rose again into a little plain, which in the olden times was covered with wood. When I could not fish any more, and nothing was doing on the moor, then I spent my afternoons in the castle or wandering about the den, and, as boys will do about the age of sixteen, I reconstructed the history of the past, and that, I suppose, explains what happened; or rather it explains how I lay open to the impression which I suggest was in the atmosphere of the place.

"It was not difficult to rebuild the castle, which had been a fortified house of four floors with no windows on the lower floor, only portholes, with projecting turrets at two of the four corners, and most likely a range of low houses for horses and servants with an arched gateway completing a square. If one climbed carefully to the second floor he could trace a dining-hall with its huge fireplace and row of windows, and looking up he could see the remains of a little bedroom which opened into a turret; and once, when no one was by to damp my daring, I managed to reach this bedroom, and looking through the turret window could see across the plain on the other side of the river, and imagined how one might signal to a house in the distance. That afternoon I not only rebuilt the castle but I also tenanted it with a Laird who had been out in the Fifteenth, and was going out in the Forty-five—having for the time come to terms with the Caterans on the basis of a common love for the Stuarts and a common hatred of all governments. I gave him a handsome wife, who was the daughter of a Highland chief, and being in a generous mood I enriched him with a beautiful daughter whose love story I intended to work out after I had settled the history of the family and thoroughly furnished the house. About sons I was not certain, but was inclined to allow them one, who would distinguish himself greatly at the battle of Preston Pans—but his career was also reserved. There were traces of fish ponds on the southern slope and the remains of a garden, and, after filling the ponds and laying out the garden on a generous scale, I gave my attention to a special corner under the castle wall where there still lingered the relics of a pleasaunce. There could be no doubt this was the lady's own particular garden, for there were wild rose-bushes and plants of thyme, and a yew tree, which had, no doubt, once been carefully trimmed, and also a fine old birch, beneath whose shade I placed a seat. Sitting there in imagination one could look down into the den and hear the water running over the stones and see cattle among the trees, just as if they had been herded there for fear of raiders; the flowers were blooming, and outside this sanctuary the pigeons were cooing at their dovecote. Through an opening in the yew hedge one could see the afternoon sun shining on the fish ponds. From the open window of the hall above I heard the clash of swords and knew that the Laird and his son were fencing, and from the high turret of my young lady's room streamed out a Jacobite song. I was so pleased with my creation that I determined to complete the work when I was at it, and as it is tiresome to invent when you are standing I went round the corner of the old birch tree and lay down on the grass. I shut my eyes, that I might better see what was within, and so it came to pass with me what happens to other people when they close their eyes in order to hear the sermon better, and be relieved from the distractions of the outer world: I fell asleep.

"When I awoke—although, of course, this is an ambiguity of language—the sun had long been westering, and it was dusk round the old castle. How it came to pass I did not think then and need not speculate now, but the scene had, as it were, grown and filled up so that I was saved any more need for romancing. The trees in the den were smaller than when I fell asleep, but there were more of them, and the cattle were not so large nor so well bred as my good farmer's cows, but of them also there were more. As I looked round the corner of the birch I saw the sweetest of little gardens, completely shut in by a high hedge, well stocked with flowers, chiefly white roses. In the garden there was a little summer house hidden under the castle wall, and covered with ivy, so cunningly concealed that two people at least might meet there and no one in the castle be any the wiser. There was a stir of life about the place, although everything was rougher and more common than I had imagined my ancient keep to be, except the garden, which with its flowers and well-kept border proved that one of the family had feeling and good taste. The voices that came from the courtyard were loud and rough, and through the hedge, although I did see the fish pond, I also, through another opening, caught a glimpse of a huge manure heap which could not be far from the front door of the castle. The windows of the room above my head were certainly glazed, but several of the panes were broken and some were repaired with wood. There were no dainty hangings, and some one had hung his coat outside to dry in the sunshine which was now rapidly dying away. Only men's voices came from the room with a strong, coarse accent, and I was certain that my idea of cavaliers, daintily dressed, sitting in an oak-paneled room drinking a health to the King over the water, would be rudely dispelled if I climbed up the ivy and looked in upon the Laird of Kinnochtry. As a matter of fact, I not only did not climb but I was not able to move from my hiding-place beneath the birch tree. I was held there as by a spell, seeing everything and entering into everything, but unable to say a word or lift a hand. From the beginning I knew that something was going to happen, and that it would be terrible to behold, but that I should have no part nor lot in the matter. I was now present with one consciousness at some date in the eighteenth century looking upon life in my old castle as it used to be, but with my other consciousness I was in the nineteenth century, a lad who fished in the burn beneath and had made his own romances about the castle. And in passing, though of course in those days I did not work the idea out, is it not possible to be with one consciousness in one century and one place and with the other consciousness in another century and in another place? And may it not be possible—and I will not trouble you further with any other speculation—for the atmosphere round one to be so charged with tragic events that they may become visible to a person in a susceptible state as secret writing contained on paper can be flung out when exposed to heat? Even as I stood I felt like two people, and the one of the nineteenth century was disappointed and disgusted with the sight of the courtyard and a slatternly woman crossing the manure heap, and that most unromantic garment hanging on the wall and the remains of food flung out from the window upon the grass near my tree. But if romance be love and war I should have enough before all was done.

"The voices ceased in the dining-room, and a minute later I heard them in the courtyard ordering the horses to be brought and announcing a journey to Blair, where the Lairds of Balbousie and Craighall, together with other drinking worthies of the district, were to hold a carouse for the night. An old man, short in stature but strongly built, clad in hodden-gray and riding-boots, and armed with a sword at his waist, I took to be Kinnochtry himself, and the young man, taller and slighter, but also powerful, who was armed with a lighter sword and was rather more fashionably dressed, I concluded was the young Laird. They told some one whom I could not see, but took to be a serving-man, that he need not expect them home that night, and riding away they left a charge that the keep be securely locked before night fell and a good watch be kept lest any Highland limmer should creep into the den and steal the cattle. I listened till the sound of their horses' feet died away in the distance and I marked that young Kinnochtry was singing The Bonnie Earl of Murray.

"There seemed to me such a ring of satisfaction and of triumph in the singing that I was haunted with fear of some tragedy, and wondered whether the Highland Caterans were watching on the moor above and would seize the chance to spoil the castle while the Laird and his son were drinking in Blair to the health of the King across the water.

"Another voice began to sing, and this time it was a woman's, but the song was one I did not know and was full of sadness. I looked up to discover whence it came, and I saw a young woman lean out from a turret window and look down on the courtyard and the garden and the den, either to see whether some one was there whom she wished to meet or to be sure that no one was looking. She withdrew her head and the next time she appeared she held in her hand something like a small white sheet. Once more she reconnoitred and now I understood that she did not wish to be observed, and when everything seemed safe—for I did not count beneath the birch, indeed I did not count at all in the incident—she lifted the sheet in her two hands and waved it as one waves a flag. Once, and then at intervals twice and thrice, and then she withdrew, and for a little I heard the wail, for it was that rather than a song. A few minutes afterward her voice died into silence, and all was quiet except for the lowing of the cattle in the dens and the cooing of the pigeons as they went to rest. And the sun was now westering fast. The water sang a pleasant song beneath, and all Nature spoke of peace; yet I knew something was going to happen. For whom had the young woman signaled? What did it mean if she had waited till her father and brother were gone? Would he come, and was he her lover, and if he came would he be discovered by the serving-folk? And was it certain that Kinnochtry and his son had really gone to Blair? I did not like their loud announcements and I thought that an ill-omened song which young Kinnochtry had chosen.

"As I was speculating and putting things together the young woman came round the corner of the castle into her garden, and after glancing up at the windows she entered into the summer-house and sat down with a sigh which I could hear where I stood. She was simply dressed in some dark-colored cloth, and had a white silk kerchief on her neck and bosom, and her only ornament was the Jacobite badge of the white brier rose which she wore at her breast and also in her hair, for she was bareheaded. She was like her brother, tall and slight, with fair hair touched by gold and coming down low on the forehead, but handsomer than either father or brother and more refined. Her eyes were gray and faithful, her lips full and rich, and her whole expression bore witness to an affectionate, trustful, kindly disposition, but she seemed pained and fearful as of one whose joy in life had been dashed and over whom hung the shadow of some calamity. And I, boy though I was, was so taken with her gentleness and her contrast to every one else about the place, that I should have liked to have asked what ailed her and to have told her that in me she had at least one faithful knight. Within the summer-house she began to sing, and though I did not then know the ballad I have identified it since, and among all the songs of Scotland there is none so sad.

O Waly! Waly! up yon bank,
And Waly! Waly! down yon brae;
And Waly! by yon river's side
Where my love and I was wont to gae.

Waly! Waly! gin Love be bonny
A little while when it is new;
But when it's auld it waxes cauld,
And wears away like morning dew.

I leant my Back unto an Aik,
I thought it was a trusty Tree;
But first it bowed and sine it brake,
And so did my fause love to me.

O Martinmas wind, when wilt thou blaw,
And shake the green leaves off the Tree?
O gentle death, when wilt thou come
And take a life that wearies me?

"Still singing, or rather crooning, she came out of the summer house and went to the edge of the den and looked down to see if any one was coming, and then she suddenly started and looked back with an expression of keen alarm upon her face. Some one was coming from the courtyard. She hesitated for a moment, once more searched the den to see if he were there, and then turned round and walked across the little garden to the opening in the yew tree hedge and stood face to face with the Laird, her father. As I suspected, the crafty pair had not ridden far, and now the father had come stealthily back to catch his daughter as she met her lover. And the son? He could not be far off. Had he gone to take the lover in hand?

"'Weel, lassie,' and Kinnochtry's voice was charged with cold scorn, 'ye seem surprised to see me back and no mightily pleased. I expected a warmer welcome when your brother and me gave up a nicht at Blair wi' some of the richt side to keep ye company. Were ye no feered to be left alone wi' nothin' but a deaf auld wife in the castle and a man that ye've sent away on an errand to the Muir? Ye have a brave heart, lassie, to keep hoose by yersel' when there's so many queer folk aboot.' And he fixed his daughter with a merciless eye, while she grew red and then white before him and visibly trembling reached out her hand to the hedge for support.

"'No doubt ye're wondering, Marjorie, what changed our minds and made your brother and me so anxious about your safety. It was a bit of news we got and I'll no deny it has touched us close. A wee bird came and whispered in our ears that a neighbor from across the river wha has hated us as his forebears did afore him—and I'm no saying that we love him aither; no, I'll no say that your brother and me love the Laird of Auchterhouse—was coming to pay a call this evening to Kinnochtry. It's no the first time that the folk of Auchterhouse have visited Kinnochtry, for if ye'll tak' the trouble to come round the corner of the keep I'll show ye the vera spot where old Auchterhouse fell, shot dead by my father, thirty-five year ago. That was the last call he made here. And this man's elder brother stabbed your uncle in Blair Market in open daylicht. It was three months after that he was buried himsel', and I didna attend the funeral, but had it no been for me and this guid sword by my side there would hae been no funeral to attend.' Marjorie clung to the hedge but said never a word, fascinated by her father's grim face and cold-blooded irony.

"'We're Christians, lassie, baptized in the kirk and regular attenders when there's no other job on hand, but releegion has limitations, and your brother and me have no been hankering to see the Laird o' Auchterhouse at Kinnochtry. At ony rate if he was to call we judged it better for our hoose, besides being more polite, lassie—and your brother and me are no without our manners—that we should be present to receive him, and to gie him the welcome he deserves.' Kinnochtry's last words cut the air like a sword.

"'We've been telt, but ye'll correct me, Marjorie, if I'm wrang, for ye're a truthful daughter in word and deed, that this is no the first time Auchterhouse has paid his respects, and I'm judgin' he was astonished there was no man to receive him. It's been an oversicht, but we'll mak' up for that the nicht. It was a pity that he didna come in the daytime instead of the gloaming, and didna come round by the front gate as his father did. I dinna say he would have likit the company better, but there would have been more to meet him, and I'm thinkin' he would have stayed longer. But we'll do oor best, Marjorie, me and your brother, to make up for the past.'

"His daughter, who had been withering under her father's terrible face, recovered herself at the last suggestion and looked fearfully down the garden, when she saw her brother standing at the foot, where there was a piece of sward, and peering down the den through some bushes which hid him from the sight of any one approaching. She threw herself down at her father's feet and caught him by the knees.

"'Have mercy, father,' she cried, 'have mercy, and I'll confess all, but dinna let mair blood be shed, for surely there's been enough black trouble between Kinnochtry and Auchterhouse. It's no his blame; it's mine. I was lonely in this auld place with neither mother nor sister and you and James aye awa'. I wearied and I met him fishing on the river and he spoke to me; and, father, they were the first kind words I ever had from a man of oor ain rank. He was gentle and pleasant wi' me, and I know that I shouldna have let him come in secret to Kinnochtry, but I loved him and I kent ye would never look upon his face in peace. I confess it, but for my mother's sake spare him and me.' But when she looked up at her father's face she saw no sign of relenting.

"'Auchterhouse is coming here the nicht, I dinna deny it, though wha telt ye I'll no ask. Call back James, father, and let me meet Auchterhouse and he'll never come here again in secret, I'll give ye my word. Have pity on James if ye have none on the other, for one o' them'll fall, and have pity on me for I'll be the cause o' the death. Will ye let me go, father?' And she sprang to her feet and laid her hands upon Kinnochtry's arm.

"'Na, na, lassie; ye have gone ainee too often, if a' tales be true, to meet Auchterhouse, and ye'll never go again. I wouldna say but there micht be some words atween Auchterhouse and yir brother, but it's no for me to interfere, and by my soul, Marjorie,' said Kinnochtry fiercely, 'it's no you that'll come atween them.'

"As he spoke Kinnochtry took his daughter in his arms and carried her across to the summer house and placed her there, and then standing at the door with her shut in behind him, he asked his son if their visitor was coming, and James signaled with his hand to be quiet.

"There was no sound in the garden, save a low sobbing from the summer house, and then a minute later the bushes parted from the edge of the den and Auchterhouse came through and stood face to face with young Kinnochtry. The light was fading fast, but there was enough wherein to see the men and enough for Kinnochtry's purpose. One could understand at a glance the fascination which young Auchterhouse had in the eyes of Marjorie, for he had been abroad and was more a gallant than the men of her family. So far as the face of him and his dress went, he was a lover of which no girl need be ashamed, yet from my birch tree I liked not the expression of his eye nor the sneer upon his lips. I judged with the instinct of a lad that there was no pity in him either for man or woman, and while my heart bled for Marjorie I could not wish success to Auchterhouse.

"It was young Kinnochtry that spoke first, and it was plain he had not the control of his father. 'Ye didna expect to meet me, or ony other man here, my lad, when ye cam wi' yir false face like a fox in the gloaming to steal yir game. Ye thought to meet a foolish lassie whose heart ye wiled by yir lyin' tongue, and it's a kiss ye were expectin', but by the God that made us it's the end o' a sword ye get.' Auchterhouse glanced once at Kinnochtry, and in that instant he caught the sound of the crying, and then he looked the brother up and down with mockery on his face. 'My certes,' he said with an accent half Scots and half Southern, 'I was not looking for the pleasure of meeting the whole family of Kinnochtry in one little garden, for I heard that the Laird and you were trysted at Blair this very night. Our houses have had some coming and going in past days not altogether friendly, I believe, and I might not have had the courage to come across the river to pay my respects at Kinnochtry had I not been invited.'

"'You black liar!' cried young Kinnochtry, drawing his sword, and when I saw what an unredeemed scoundrel Auchterhouse was, though all the time I pitied Marjorie, I hoped that he would be killed.

"'Hardly that, my blunt, straightforward neighbor,' and Auchterhouse had now his hand upon his sword. 'When a fair lady invites a gentleman to visit her, and the letter is writ so large it can be seen a mile off, I ask yourself whether he is not bound to come, and all the more when she has——'

"Before he could say another word his sword was out and they were busy at work, while the Laird stood in the summer-house door and the girl lay behind. Young Kinnochtry was the stronger man and a good swordsman, but he was furious in his rage and had therefore the less command of his weapon. The other was as cold as ice and as venomous as a serpent and evidently a cunning fencer. For a while he stood in his defense, parrying the fierce attack, and then he began on his part to respond. Kinnochtry stepped forward from the doorway and was plainly anxious, although he gave no sign of interference. There was a clash of swords with rapid motions which I could not follow, and young Kinnochtry's sword flew out of his hand, and he stood at the mercy of Auchterhouse, who seemed to hesitate for a second before he should pass his sword through him. During that second Marjorie, who, unheeded by all, had escaped from the summer house, flung herself between the combatants, and ere any one could hinder it her lover's sword found its home in her breast. She fell in face of her father, between her brother and lover, without a word except a cry for mercy. The sound had not died away and Auchterhouse's sword had not been withdrawn from the heart he had twice pierced before Kinnochtry had run him through and he fell dead beside Marjorie. Her brother stood paralyzed, but her father passed his sword time after time, three times in all, through the body of this worst enemy of his house.

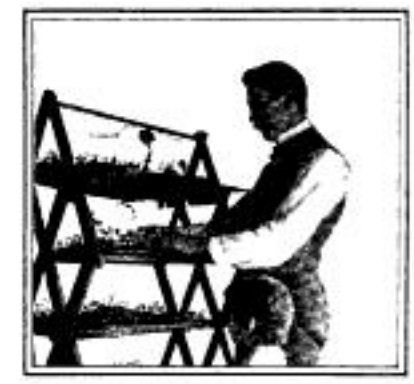
"'God's curse on you in this world and in that which is to come. Lift his carcass, James, and throw it into the den, and send word to Auchterhouse that they can come and fetch their Laird.' He lifted up his daughter and I saw him carry her through the opening in the hedge and he did not weep, but I heard him say 'it was better this way for herself and for our name.' As she passed through, her hair, which had loosened, caught in the hedge, he gently disentangled it and I caught him repeating her name twice, 'Marjorie, Marjorie.' I tried to follow him and in the trying I awoke. It was almost dark, and the garden was again deserted and in ruins, but nothing will ever convince me, after all the years, that it had not seen that tragedy."

SILK CULTURE AT HOME

By René Bache

THOSE best informed on the subject are of the opinion that there is no good reason why the rearing of silkworms should not become an important and profitable industry in this country. We are at the present time importing over $30,000,000 worth of raw silk annually, our entire supply of the commodity being obtained from Europe and Asia, whereas we might just as well be producing a large part, if not the whole, of it on this side of the water.

Here, in a word, is a possible industry of immense profitableness that has been wholly neglected in the United States, although we have at hand all the facilities for carrying it on, including inexhaustible supplies of the food—always the chief essential—on which the silkworms subsist. Nearly everywhere in this country are to be found the white mulberry trees, which are the traditional and favorite food plant of the silkworm, and, failing them, there is no lack of the osage orange, especially in the South, the leaves of which afford a highly satisfactory substitute. Silk culture is conspicuously an industry of the household. In France more than 100,000 families are engaged in it, each domestic establishment producing a small quantity of cocoons yearly, which fetch about thirty-five cents a pound at the factory, though the price varies somewhat. This is the way in which the whole of the great French crop of cocoons is obtained, the little yellow bundles of fine-spun fibre being collected from the homes of the people and taken to the "filatures," where the silk is reeled off them, to be woven afterward into exquisite and costly fabrics.



The revenue derived from silk production is in the aggregate enormous, and there are quite as good opportunities for the industry in this country as in France or Italy, which latter nation is another large contributor to the world's supply of silk. Cheapness of labor is not to be regarded as a factor in the problem, inasmuch as American families in moderate circumstances nearly always contain one or more members who, by reason of sex, age or youth, have leisure time which they would be glad to devote to an occupation promising small but sure returns.

Even a few dollars yearly, obtained by incidental and pleasant labor, are welcome.

An Ideal Way to Earn Pin-Money

Silk culture is an occupation in which children can make themselves useful. To them naturally falls the business of collecting the leaves, and they can help in other ways. It is a sort of work that requires very little skill and a minimum of experience, while demanding the expenditure of not more than a few dollars at the outset. From then on the grower hatches his own eggs, raises his own worms, and has no apparatus to buy, while all the food needed for the insects is procurable for the slight trouble of gathering it. In view of these facts, it will be seen why the production of cocoons is an ideal industry for the household—an industry furnishing light employment for the women and children, and giving no little amusement incident to its pursuit.

The first thing necessary, when one wishes to make a beginning in silk culture, is to obtain a few thousand eggs—a matter of no difficulty, inasmuch as there are many people in various parts of the country who follow the business in a small way. Spring is the time to begin, when the mulberry or osage leaves are just beginning to bud out, because the baby worms require for their sustenance the most delicate of young foliage. As purchased, the eggs, which are very small, about the size of turnip-seeds, are attached to rectangular pieces of muslin and sprinkled over the latter as if thrown out of a pepper-pot. They are easily transported in this condition, and no ordinary accident is likely to injure them.

SPREADING THE LEAVES ON LATTICE-WORK SHELVES FOR THE WORMS TO FEED UPON

Having got his eggs, the beginner proceeds to hatch them by simply placing them on a table in a warm room, the temperature being kept at seventy-two degrees Fahrenheit at first, but increased two degrees each day. In France silkworm eggs are commonly hatched in little incubators, or laid between blankets to hurry them up, but such contrivances are unnecessary. Under ordinary circumstances the baby worms will make their appearance in four or five days, and the first thing done with them is to lay over them a piece of mosquito net, upon which have been scattered a few tender leaves chopped fine. The food by its scent will attract the young insects, which, in order to get at it, will crawl up through the net, beginning immediately to browse. When they are all on top it is easy to remove them, net and all, to another table.

In this way they are kept for about ten days, being transferred at intervals back and forth from one table to another by repeating the process just described. Thus they are kept perfectly clean, and are supplied constantly with fresh leaves.

When they are ten days old they are big enough to be placed upon frames of lattice-work (such as are represented in an accompanying photograph), on which the leaves are laid, and where they spend the remainder of their worm life. Fresh leaves must be provided at regular intervals as before, four or five times a day, care being always taken that they shall not have more than they can consume at any one time. In this manner the accumulation of débris is avoided, and the insects are readily transferred to clean frames and fresh food by laying gently over them a piece of lattice bearing newly-gathered foliage, to invite them to crawl up. This method of moving the worms renders it unnecessary to handle them and saves much trouble.

GATHERING THE COCOONS FROM THE "LADDER" IN WHICH THEY HAVE BEEN SPUN

When they are about thirty-three days old—though the time required depends somewhat upon temperature—the worms are ready to begin to spin. They give up eating, wander away from the leaves on which hitherto they have so greedily browsed, and manifest a disposition to climb upward upon anything that may afford the opportunity. At the same time they change color, turning to a creamy hue, and uplift their heads in a peculiar way. It is not possible for the grower to mistake the symptoms, and he loses no time in providing the insects with the means for fulfilling the really important object of their existence—namely, the building of their cocoons.

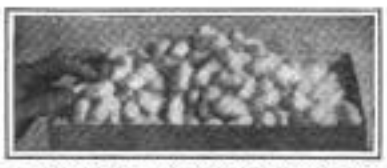
The leaves and all débris having been removed, little branches may now be placed upon the lattice frames in arches conveniently disposed, so that the worms may crawl up on them and attach to them the cocoons. But an even better method is to make a sort of ladder (such as is shown in an accompanying photograph), between the sticks of which the insects are able most conveniently to do their building. From six to eight days are required for the process, which is certainly one of the most interesting operations in Nature, beginning with the spinning of a louse floss that furnishes a sort of envelope for the cocoon that is to be. Inside of this the worm proceeds to construct the body of the cocoon, behind the silken walls of which, working inward, it presently disappears.

Inside of the cocoon the worm transforms itself into a sort of mummy, which represents an intermediate stage of its life history, and thus remains for two or three weeks. Then, if let alone, it moistens the fibres at one end of its silken sarcophagus by means of a secretion provided for the purpose, and forces its way through the envelope, emerging as a perfect moth. However, this process would destroy the value of the cocoon for reeling, and therefore the silk culturist takes an unfair advantage of the insect and kills it while as yet it is in the chrysalis state by putting it in a heated oven for four or five hours.

When the cocoons have been treated in this manner they are ready to go to the factory to be reeled—a process that requires somewhat elaborate machinery, and which need not here be described. At the factory the loose floss is first removed, to be utilized as inferior material, and then the fibre of the cocoon proper is unwound, to be afterward converted into silk thread, or into woven fabrics of various kinds. In the dyeing and printing of silken textiles there are many secrets, but these again are apart from the present discussion.

Beyond any other insect the silkworm has been modified by domestication. It is, indeed, the domesticated insect par excellence, and, incidentally to its long service as a slave of man—a period that has covered thousands of years, for silk culture was already very old in China when the first silk-worms were brought to Europe by Nestorian monks, in the sixth century, A.D.—it has become altogether incapable of taking care of itself. Though in its original wild state it was doubtless a strong flyer, it no longer enjoys the use of its wings, and, if liberated, it would not even be able to cling to the waving branches of the mulberry tree which is its natural food plant.

There are a good many different "races" of silkworms to-day, and the cocoons they spin are of various colors, some being yellow, others green, and yet others white. The white ones come mostly from the Orient, whereas French cocoons are yellow. Thanks to artificial selection in breeding the worms, the cocoons have become abnormally large and altogether out of proportion to the size of the insects that spin them. It is customary, in order to maintain the quality of the stock, to select the largest and finest cocoons for reproduction, and to withhold them from the oven, threading them together in strings and hanging them up to await developments.



In due time the moths emerge, and seven or eight hours later (after mating) the females begin to lay. They are picked up with the fingers as gently as possible, and placed in a tray, on rectangular pieces of muslin, where they deposit their eggs. Each female lays from three hundred to four hundred eggs, and the pieces of muslin, with the ova attached, are put in a cool, dark place until spring. They have to be looked after at intervals, in order to see that no mold attacks them, and that no mice or predatory insects get at them. Mice will eat silkworm eggs greedily. A temperature of zero will not hurt them, whereas if it is too warm they will hatch prematurely. As already stated, the time to bring them out of storage and transfer them to the rearing-room is when the mulberry leaves are budding.

SILKWORM MOTHS

It is believed by Secretary Wilson that the best opportunities for silk culture in this country are afforded in the South, where, in April and May, when no cotton-picking is going on, the children could gather the mulberry and osage leaves and feed the worms. At the present time there are a good many people out in Utah, foreigners by birth, who are raising silkworms, reeling the cocoons, and actually weaving the silk into fabrics for family use.

Teachers of the industry are available in plenty. In the city of Washington there is a young man named T. A. Keleher who makes a business of rearing silkworms simply for the purpose of preparing what might be called educational exhibits. He makes little glass-covered boxes, each of which contains a series of objects to illustrate the silk-producing insect in its various phases of transformation, together with the leaves on which it feeds, its cocoons, and the commercial products derived.

A Good and Faithful Servant

ROBERT J. WYNNE, the new First Assistant Postmaster-General, is recognized in Washington as a wit, and his love of humor is sufficiently catholic to enable him to enjoy a joke at his own expense.

The day President Roosevelt named him for the important post made vacant by the resignation of Mr. William M. Johnson, Mr. Wynne was besieged by fellow-correspondents for some interesting incidents in his career.

"Probably those experiences which would interest you most occurred during the years I served as Private Secretary to Secretary Foster, and I suggest that you look up George, the colored messenger in the Treasury who worked for me at that time." So George was appealed to. "I won't say anything," remarked the messenger. "I'm too loyal a man to tell any stories about Mr. Wynne."

$1—and what it will do!!!

One Dollar pays for a Membership in The Wanamaker "Century" Club. A Membership saves you exactly Half the purchase price on a set of "The Century." It sends you the books, complete, in their specially-designed Bookcase, without further immediate payment. It privileges you to pay the Half-Price a little at a time—practically on your own terms. It thus ensures your ownership of the work that is acknowledged to be of MORE PRACTICAL USE than any other ever published—and at the lowest price at which it has EVER been offered.

That's what one dollar will do—if spent wisely and promptly!

The Century Dictionary and Cyclopedia and Atlas is an encyclopedia built like a dictionary—with each of its items in its own alphabetical place instead of hidden in long chapters under some general heading, which was the old-fashioned way. It is the only reference work that is really used daily by half a million people in this country alone (and many of them were glad to pay the twice-bigger price which was charged before The Wanamaker Century Club was organized).

The Century is its own reason for its widespread popularity. It encourages its occasional use into a daily habit—The Century Habit—which simply means "knowing things without effort."

Ask any Century owner. He will tell you that The Century volumes are the best of all books to work with, to read with, to think with. If you have thought The Century beyond your means, it is no longer so. The Wanamaker Century Club, by its immense selling power, has brought it within the reach of every one. The latest revised edition is controlled by us absolutely. It is unabridged and is the only authorized edition now published by The Century Co.

A WOMAN'S WASHINGTON

By The Congressman's Wife

I NEVER so fully appreciated, until within the last week or two, the fact that anxiety is absolutely good for nothing in this world unless one is able to turn it into a weapon of defense. I have always felt myself, hitherto, a second Giralda the giantess in all things that have concerned in any way the Honorable Robert Slocum, of Spruce City, but before the overwhelming fact of his contemplated maiden speech in the Senate I was helpless. The first inkling I had that such a speech was determined on was when I noticed that Robert was going around for days with his lips moving, giving vent to occasional explosive mutterings. Now, I have understood that Vesuvius and Pelée both are addicted to mutterings and explosive sounds before they are ready to overwhelm an unsuspecting and innocent public, but I had had no experience with the seething human being who is ready to do the same thing, so I said:

"What is the matter, Robert?"

"Why?" he asked.

"You are going about as though you were haranguing your innermost being, very much as Senator Hoar does before he makes a speech in the Senate," I said anxiously.

"Well," said Robert, smiling somewhat deprecatingly, "I am going to make a speech in the Senate, my maiden one. I'm going to try a whack at the Statehood bill to-morrow if Quay will let me, or if Nelson will stop talking long enough to give me a chance."

"Have you given notice to the Senate? Are you committed?" I asked, fearing the worst.

"I am entirely committed," he returned resolutely.

Whereupon I was at once beset by that overwhelming kind of misgiving which is said to be the beacon to the wise, but I forebore to meddle with the inevitable, and contented myself with making a ladder of my thoughts.

The very day that Robert had admitted that he should make his maiden effort we were giving a dinner. A Cabinet Secretary and his wife, a new Member of the House who had Senatorial aspirations, Senator and Mrs. Blank, and our old friend, Senator P——, and one or two others were present. We were scarcely seated at the table which Jules, the chef, had supplied with every new thing known in culinary art, when the fire upon Robert began. I knew it would be a gala night, and no doubt before they were through with running Robert I should be compelled, in true Homeric fashion, to fight on both sides. The new Member started the ball rolling.

"I hear, Mr. Slocum, you are going to take a hand in the Statehood bill, and that it is likely to be a real 'live wire,' as Mr. Tillman would put it."

"Yes, I may speak," said Robert in rather a small voice, and I knew from his tone he feared the current would set in toward him.

"You mean," said Senator P——, looking over the top of his glasses, "that if the Senator from the North Star State leaves anything for others to talk about you are going to talk, but you'd better be spry, for you've seen that big book wide open on his desk with the orange-colored marker in it? Well, when he begins on that book the bottom is likely to drop out of the Statehood bill."

"Yes, I've seen that book," said Robert.

"It is well to remember," said the Secretary, taking a hand in the grooming of the Spruce City Senator, "what an eminent English jurist said once, that no speech is complete without three ingredients, 'a quotation, a joke and a platitude.'"

Robert smiled and said rather ruefully: "I hope they'll give me time for all those three ingredients. I'm going to announce when I start out that I intend to be a regular 'don't hurry Hopkins' sort of chap that Joe Blackburn tells about. Hopkins was a man down in Kentucky who gave his creditor a note on which was this memorandum, 'The said Hopkins is not to be hurried in paying the above.'"

"Now, I tell you what, Slocum," said Senator Blank, "when you speak to-morrow I'd advise you to offer up that prayer Lord Ashley made before he charged at the battle of Edge Hill: 'Oh, Lord, Thou knowest how busy I must be this day; if I forget Thee, do not Thou forget me.'"

This drew the first fire and a ripple of laughter spread around the table. Then Senator P—— said:

"Yes, prayer and provender never have been known to hinder any man's journey, Slocum, so says an old proverb, but I should recommend any man who is going to make his first speech to follow Abraham Lincoln's advice to the would-be Hoosier orator, 'Young man, look wise and talk scatterin'.'"

"Oh," said I, taking up the cudgels for Robert, "I think a better piece of advice to a man who is going to address the Senate would be that of a popular preacher when speaking of his pulpit efforts and of how he adapted himself to certain conditions:

"'Whenever I get hold of one of those heavy, stolid, hopeless congregations I always roar.'"

This thrust at the upper house of Congress was much relished by the new Member of the House, and particularly by the Cabinet Secretary, who had not been able to get the ear of the Senate for a pet scheme in his department.

"Yes, it is always a good plan to talk loud," said Senator P——. "We all do it; it gives us courage, and doesn't hurt any one;" and he smiled benignly and added:

"One thing more, Slocum, if you are interrupted in your speech and they begin to badger you, don't get funny and be betrayed into calling any man in the chamber 'Brother.'"

"Why not?" said Robert. "That's what Depew did the other day when Pettus bothered him—he called him 'Brother Pettus.'"

"Yes, that's all very well for an oldster like Depew, but the Senate won't stand it if a youngster takes liberties. The record for maiden speeches has been broken this session. There were Dillingham and Dryden—Dryden was very nervous over his. There had been eleven speakers ahead of him and at one time it looked as though he'd never get a chance. One of the men on the other side of the chamber crossed over to him and said, by way of encouragement:

"See here, Dryden, you're going to be crowded out, but you might have time to do as the stump-speaker did who waited through a whole meeting and when his turn came he had two minutes only, so he rose and said, 'Ladies and Gentlemen, I was asked to give an address this evening which I now do with pleasure. My address is 200 Prairie Avenue.' Then he sat down."

"Well, for my part," said Mrs. Blank thankfully, "I have always been heartily glad that man was the only thing in creation endowed with speech, for I do not know what we should do if animals could talk."

"What about old Borak?" asked Senator Blank quizzically. "Borak was Mohammed's horse and spoke to him in Arabic."

"Yes," chimed in Robert, "and there was the Biblical ass that talked in Hebrew. We can all recall her remarks to Balaam."

There was some amusement at this. Then Senator P—— said with a chuckle:

"Talking of speeches in the Senate, do any of you happen to remember when John Hay, our present distinguished Secretary of State, was associate editor of the New York Tribune, years ago?"

Of course Senator Blank and the Cabinet Secretary remembered the fact very well, and the Senator continued:

"In that day it was not infrequent for Members of Congress to make slips in diction and grammar, and the Senate had one man, and a big man at that, who was particularly gifted in getting together plural verbs and singular nouns and producing astounding effects with them. One day he made a big speech on a burning issue of the hour. John Hay wrote an editorial on that speech which lives in the minds of some of us to this day. He said, alluding to this Senator:

"'Lifting on high the battle-ax of his mighty logic he buried it deftly in midair and brought it down blunt end foremost on the helpless figure of his mother tongue.'"

This made a great hit at the table, but I could not prevent an ejaculation of "Mercy!" And I began in sudden alarm to run over deftly Robert's nouns and verbs to see if they were in correct working order.

"Don't be alarmed, Mrs. Slocum," said the Senator reassuringly, "your husband's parts of speech are all right. We don't slay our mother tongue nowadays in the Senate. We leave it to the Members of the House to say 'I be' and 'I done.'"

As the Senator made this somewhat exaggerated charge he looked over slyly at the new Member, who fired up at once:

"Oh, see here now, we haven't a man anywhere in the Hall of the House who says, 'I done' or 'I ——'"

ORIENTAL RUGS

It is one of the paradoxes of art that markedly individual and stylistic as a fine example of Oriental Rug weaving is, it can be placed in close juxtaposition to furniture and decoration of a widely differing character and epoch without in any way jarring upon the sense of the congruous or the fitting. From the earliest of times this fact has been recognized.

Our wide foreign connections, extending to every country where Oriental Rugs are woven, enable us to assemble a collection unequalled anywhere.

In India, we maintain our own factory and are therefore in possession of a constant supply of the very finest quality of modern Oriental Carpets, especially adapted for the use of our clients.

But the new Member stopped in the middle of his disclaimer and a general laugh went around, for everybody was remembering some happenings in that line in the lower branch of Congress during a recent rough-and-tumble debate when plural nouns and singular verbs had held high carnival. I deemed it best to lead the conversation into another channel, and fortunately bethought me of the auction sale at Sloan's which had been held within the week and which had been one of the most fashionable events of the season. Half the official bigwigs and the best part of the smart set had met in a scramble over discarded articles of historic fame from the old White House. I turned to the Cabinet Secretary, whom I had seen bidding against Postmaster-General Payne for the possession of a washstand.

"Which of you got the washstand at Sloan's the other day?"

"Oh, Payne got it," said the Secretary. "He ran the bid up to ten dollars, but as the washstand had no back I thought I'd let him have it."

"I cannot understand what either of you saw in it," I said. "It was broken, scratched and shabby beyond belief. Now I should have liked those two beautiful old oak chairs, carved with the eagles, which Mrs. Hobart bought, or I should have liked the leather lounge that ex-Governor Lowndes bought, but that dilapidated old washstand ——!"

"That washstand, though, Mrs. Slocum, was very quaint and of beautiful wood," said the Secretary, defending his taste. "I should have liked those two white and gold mantels, but John McLean had a longer purse than mine."

"What did you secure?" asked he.

"Oh," said I, "I got one of those old mirrors containing the coat of arms of the United States which has been in the mansion for fifty years, and the like of which you cannot buy to-day. I cannot understand what the Government is thinking of to let those beautiful old relics go at auction. Just fancy that carved mahogany sideboard from the State dining-room which has presided with dignity over so many famous banquets ending its days in a restaurant!"

"Well, we did not get a thing but one of those green satin ottomans," said the Secretary's wife plaintively.

"I know of one man," said the new Member, "who has been made happy by that sale, and that is Uncle Joe Cannon, who has secured some of those crystal chandeliers that cost the Government fifteen hundred dollars apiece for the Capitol. One of them has been hung in Uncle Joe's own committee-room, the Appropriations, and he wants the big one that came out of the East Room hung up in Statuary Hall."

"Ah," said Senator P—— warningly, "better tell Cannon to beware of hanging another chandelier in Statuary Hall, for the one that hung there originally, and which was considered such a work of art, came to grief away back in the fifties when the House was in session there. There was a regular panic when that great glass thing fell, and as we used to say when I was a boy, 'tunked' the heads of the members."

"So that's what became of that chandelier?" said Senator Blank. "Wood, the superintendent of the Capitol, was wondering the other day what had ever become of that famous lighting machine. He got out a picture of it to show some of us. I must tell him."

"I wonder if Ransdell, the Sergeant-at-Arms, did not secure something at this sale for our end of the Capitol?" said Robert.

The mention of the Sergeant-at-Arms brought a smile to the face of the new Member, who said:

"Did any of you hear anything about Dan Ransdell's famous party the other night?"

We none of us had. So the new Member proceeded with much gusto:

"Ransdell has the most fascinating little place up on Capitol Hill which he calls 'The Shack.' He sent out invitations last week to a lot of us to come up there for a little card-party. Well, the dinner mania has such complete sway in this town that scarcely a man who got one of those invitations but thought he was asked to dinner. So all of them save a few sane ones, including myself, went to Ransdell's dinnerless. When they got there and saw no signs of dinner they began to sniff around, but there was no smell of dinner in the air and they began to laugh and to suspect the situation. They were hungry as bears, and soon they spied a cold lay-out on the buffet and decided to make a raid on it. Ransdell caught on to the situation and said in high glee:

"LEST WE FORGET"

Due respect for our departed loved ones demands that we erect ARTISTIC and ENDURING MEMORIALS. Marble has proved an unfortunate failure. Moss-grown, broken and tumble-down slabs appear everywhere. Some cemeteries now prohibit marble entirely. Granite, too, soon gets discolored, moss-grown, cracks, crumbles and decays. Besides, it is very expensive.

WHITE BRONZE MONUMENTS are cheaper and Infinitely Better. They are strictly everlasting. Rust, corrosion and moss-growth are IMPOSSIBILITIES. They CANNOT crumble from the action of frost.

WHITE BRONZE is far more artistic and expressive than any stone. Then why not investigate it? It has been on the market for over twenty-five years and is an established success. It has been adopted for more than a hundred public monuments and by thousands of delighted individuals in all parts of the country. Many granite-dealers have used White Bronze in preference to granite for their own burial plots.

We have hundreds of beautiful designs at prices from $4 to $4,000. We deal direct and deliver everywhere. Distance is no obstacle. Write us at once for designs and information if you are interested. It costs you nothing and puts you under no obligations whatever. Address

"Wait a minute, you vultures, it isn't time for that; there's some terrapin coming."

This saved the cold lay-out for a few minutes, but not for long, for the pangs of hunger had seized upon those men, and one of them cried out:

"'I say, Ransdell, that terrapin of yours must be crawling up Capitol Hill in its shell. I vote we play for what's in sight."

"And they did," continued the new Member; "they pitched in and cleaned off that sideboard in a jiffy, and you never heard such shouts of laughter in your life as they indulged in at their own expense, and Ransdell's little gathering is known all around as the famous 'Shack Party.' Poor Ransdell has been asked continually when he is going to give another dinner to the 'Cross-legged Knights,' or another 'Barmecide feast!'"

"By the way," said Robert, addressing the new Member, "before I forget it I want to know whether you have been able to come to any understanding with the President about that postmaster business in your State?"

"By Jove, no," said the new Member, "I have not. I went up there by appointment with my whole delegation the other day and found the President as jolly as a sandboy. It was just after his hurt at playing single stick, and he shook hands with his left hand after giving us that little military salute of his which he gives when he is in particularly good spirits. But not one word could we get out of him about that postmastership. He smiled and said:

"'I have the matter under advisement, gentlemen, but the stress of public business, particularly the coal and wood strike, has made it impossible for me to dispose of this appointment.'"

"What in the world did he mean by the 'wood' strike?" we asked.

"That," continued the new Member, "is just what our entire delegation asked. The President smiled at us indulgently, and said, holding out his bandaged right hand:

"'Don't you consider, gentlemen, that I have a pretty bad Wood strike on hand?'"

"I wonder if General Wood has heard that witticism?" we all said. Robert added:

"And I'll bet that you couldn't lead the President back to that postmaster business?"

"Of course not," laughed the new Member, "for as soon as I harked back to the appointment he immediately asked us if we had seen the 'Administration bear.' We hadn't seen it, and didn't even know what he meant until he showed us a calendar for 1903 containing all those clever cartoons of the bear which he had gone down South to hunt in November, and which he not only hadn't killed but hadn't even set eyes on. Berryman has made up the funniest calendar of the bears you ever saw and has sent it to the President. It pleased him so much that he has written to Berryman to come up and see him. This bear is known all around, now, as the 'Administration bear.' One of our delegation was so tickled by the one in the cartoon where the bear has on ear muffs and galoshes that he broke out impulsively with:

"'Get on to the likeness, will you!' Of course the President joined in the laugh."

"That bear with the charmed life," said Senator P——, "must be the very bear that a certain Southern statesman of prominence was in hopes would eat up our Chief Executive when he was off on that famous trip."

"How was that?" we all exclaimed with interest.

"Well, I only know," said the Senator with much humor in his tone, "that a fine young fellow whom I know came all the way up from a Southern State in hot haste to consult this statesman about the Mississippi hunting trip just before it came off. The young man, it seems, had aspirations for the National Congress and was on the eve of running in his State. He also had a warm admiration for the President and wanted to take a hand in getting up the hunting trip and to be prominent in the party. But he thought it would be the part of wisdom to consult the Solon of the South, so he said:

"'Governor, you know the temper of Southerners better than I do, and I want you to tell me whether you think it would hurt my chances of election to Congress in my district if I should organize this hunting trip and attend the President personally?'

"'John,' said the statesman solemnly, eying the young man, 'if you will invite the President down to go hunting in the swamps, and if you'll lead him into the densest part and take care that a bear eats him up, I'll see to it that you are sent to the United States Senate!'"

SYSTEM is a 96-page monthly magazine.

Brim so full of bright ideas and clever systems that an official of the National Cash Register Company writes us as follows:—

"The ideas gathered from your magazine have enabled me to formulate systems for Mr. Patterson's letters, books, pamphlets, telegrams, bills, orders, addresses, etc., which have simplified this work greatly."

And the United States Fidelity & Guarantee Company say:—

"Since the first of the year, when we subscribed to your magazine, we have completely changed our methods of bookkeeping, and have been guided solely by the suggestions contained in SYSTEM. We find the work is more simple, and, better still, there is less chance of error."

And what a monthly reading of SYSTEM has done for them it will just so surely do for you.

The man of experience gets in SYSTEM the experience of other men. To the young man beginning business, to the clerk, bookkeeper or student, SYSTEM is more than a business college.

To enumerate SYSTEM'S contributors is simply to name the foremost system experts and the strongest business men.

The general articles they write will help any man—business or professional. The special articles for one's own work no man can afford to miss.

Systems actually used in large, successful factories, offices, stores, banks, publications, professions, are described in detail. And experts show how these same systems can be adapted to smaller businesses.

The field of SYSTEM is so broad it is not possible to particularize. But no matter what your business or profession, one at least of our experts is familiar with it, and tells the best of what he knows in SYSTEM. It is your privilege to consult him freely.

Between the Lines

IT IS possibly the increased strenuousness of New York life which apparently has done away with the picturesque Bohemian coteries of artists and writers who formerly foregathered in various clubs and societies. One of these clubs, the Lanthorn, was founded by Mr. Irving Bacheller, who was then managing his newspaper syndicate, before Eben Holden had taken form. The meetings were held in the loft of an old building on William Street which was full of historic association. The old French restaurant on the first floor was believed to be a lineal descendant of a Revolutionary coffee house. The construction of the first story showed some odd use of stones and also of bricks which were said to have been brought across the water like the bricks used in certain of the Virginia Colonial mansions. The rooms were low, the walls thick, and the stairways and passages narrow and intricate. The first "battle" of the Revolution was fought practically in the back yard, since the house stood on what was termed Golden Hill, the scene of an early affray between local patriots and British soldiers. Over across the street where a business block now stands was once the house where Washington Irving first saw the light. Furthermore, there was a legend that in the coffee-house days this quaint old building was the temporary home of the redoubtable Captain Kidd.

It was in the upper floor, a loft open to the roof and traversed by dark beams, that the Lanthorn Club held its revels. The membership was composed of some men who had written books, and more who were writing for the newspapers, together with a sprinkling of artists and others. There was once an old-fashioned Thanksgiving dinner with plenty of pie and informal speech-making. Authors of the rank of Mr. Howells, Doctor Eggleston and Mr. Stoddard were guests at some of these cheerful gatherings, where Mr. Bacheller presided, and the rafters often rang with shouts of laughter until the candles flickered. After The Red Badge of Courage brought fame to Stephen Crane his brother members of the Lanthorn gave a reception in his honor, where Mr. Howells made one of his rare speeches and the doughty John Swinton tore things in general into tatters. But the light of the Lanthorn was extinguished some years since, so far as the Bohemia of art and letters is concerned, although a luncheon club of a more practical and conservative character has succeeded to the rooms.

Irving Bacheller's Good Stories

It was after a long apprenticeship of journalism and syndicate work that Mr. Bacheller came into his own with the dry humor and goodness of heart illustrated in Eben Holden. But this was by no means his first book. Authors who find the world indifferent may take heart from his experience. How many readers recall The Master of Silence, or The Still House of O'Darrow, and yet these were Mr. Bacheller's first books. There were poems, also, and stories, but it was not until the author utilized his memories of his native North Country—the North Country of New York—that the door was opened to him. D'ri and I followed, and it is understood that there may be another novel of rustic life within the year. In or out of his books the author is a capital story-teller, with a fund of humor and good fellowship which has made his success a welcome arrival.

Once in the North Country Mr. Bacheller learned that a peculiarly taciturn guide had had a strange experience with a bull. As they sat at luncheon one day after whipping a trout stream the guide was asked for a story. In a disjointed fashion between huge mouthfuls of doughnuts and cheese the guide described "a pesky bull," so "tarnal ugly" that he attacked every one. The guide had armed himself with a club, and when the bull charged he leaped aside and caught the animal by the tail.

"What happened then?" asked the listener.

The guide slowly masticated his doughnut.

"Wal, I whaled him."

More mastication.

"What did the bull do?"

"Wal, finally he jist bellered an' run."

"And you held on?"

"Yaas, I held on an' whaled."

"How long?"

"Wal, we come to a tree an' the bull he took one side an' I took the other."

"Did you hold on to his tail?"

"I did so."

"What happened?"

LOFTUS CUSTOM TAILOR

"Clothes to be smart MUST be made to order"

TO BE really well dressed the man outside of New York knows that he should come to New York for the styles. The next best thing (and our improved system makes it practically as good) is to let us make your clothes through our Mail Order Department. We are doing the biggest custom tailoring business in the country—and it doesn't come to us by chance. It is because we have conclusively demonstrated 1st—That we give you the value.

2d—That we give you the style.
3d—That we fit you exactly right.

For the Spring and Summer of 1903 our catalogue shows the complete range of new styles in clothes for gentlemen, made to order

As Low as $15 As High as $60

Between these two extremes we can surely satisfy any reasonable taste.

For instance, our line at $15 includes plain black and blue fabrics, nobby and dressy fancies, rich subdued mixtures, English Tweeds, Scotch Cheviots, Serges, Cassimeres, Unfinished Worsteds, Clay Diagonals, Thibets, Vicunas, Oxfords, in fact, practically anything a man wants—made to measure for $15. Style, fit and value cannot be duplicated. We make (to order only) every sort of clothes a man wears:

Business Clothes, $15 to $35
Cutaway Coats and Vests, $13 to $30
Top Coats and Chesterfields, $15 to $35
Prince Alberts, $18 to $40
Dress Suits, $35 to $60
Tuxedos, $30 to $55
Trousers, $5 to $12
Also Golf Clothes, Riding Clothes, etc., etc.

Our improved system of self-measurement insures perfect fit precisely as if you came here to be measured. We take all responsibility—return anything not satisfactory, and we will refund the money. WRITE TO-DAY for catalogue and samples as every garment must be made to measure, and early orders are an advantage to the customer. "We pay express charges everywhere."

"Wal, when we got by the tree I had a darned sight more tail than the bull."

But it is unjust to the story-teller to condense any of the stories which he gives with such an unctuous appreciation of the manners and speech of the North Country folk.

Curiosities of Bookmaking

One of the curiosities of modern bookmaking is suggested by a recent book of travels in Patagonia. The expedition described in this book had its inception in a tale started some two years ago which affirmed the present existence of the Giant Sloth or prehistoric Mylodon in Patagonia. Thereupon an enterprising English publisher, whose name is associated with periodicals of vast circulation, organized an expedition to hunt down this contemporary of megatherium and pterodactyl. It was reported that a piece of the animal's skin had been found hanging in a tree at Last Hope Inlet, Patagonia, and that many remains had been found near by. Professor Ray Lancaster, of the British Museum, declared it to be "possible" that "the Mylodon still exists in some of the more mountainous regions of Patagonia." Out of this grew the expedition. But neither from the evidence of natives, from exploration, or from observation of the great forests was it possible to find any proof of the Giant Sloth's existence. His vote, therefore, was negative, but while the Mylodon was not captured, it was inevitable that the result of the expedition should be a book.

Another odd phase of some of the bookmaking of the day is the announcement of a book which is to give a back-door entrance to the mansions of multi-millionaires. One of the more conservative publishers is to issue a description of the housekeeping and marketing and kitchen organization of the "great houses" of Gotham, thereby, as it were, embalming the areaway observations of the professional Jenkins of the newspapers in permanent form. One can imagine how Thackeray would have delighted in an opportunity to review the book.

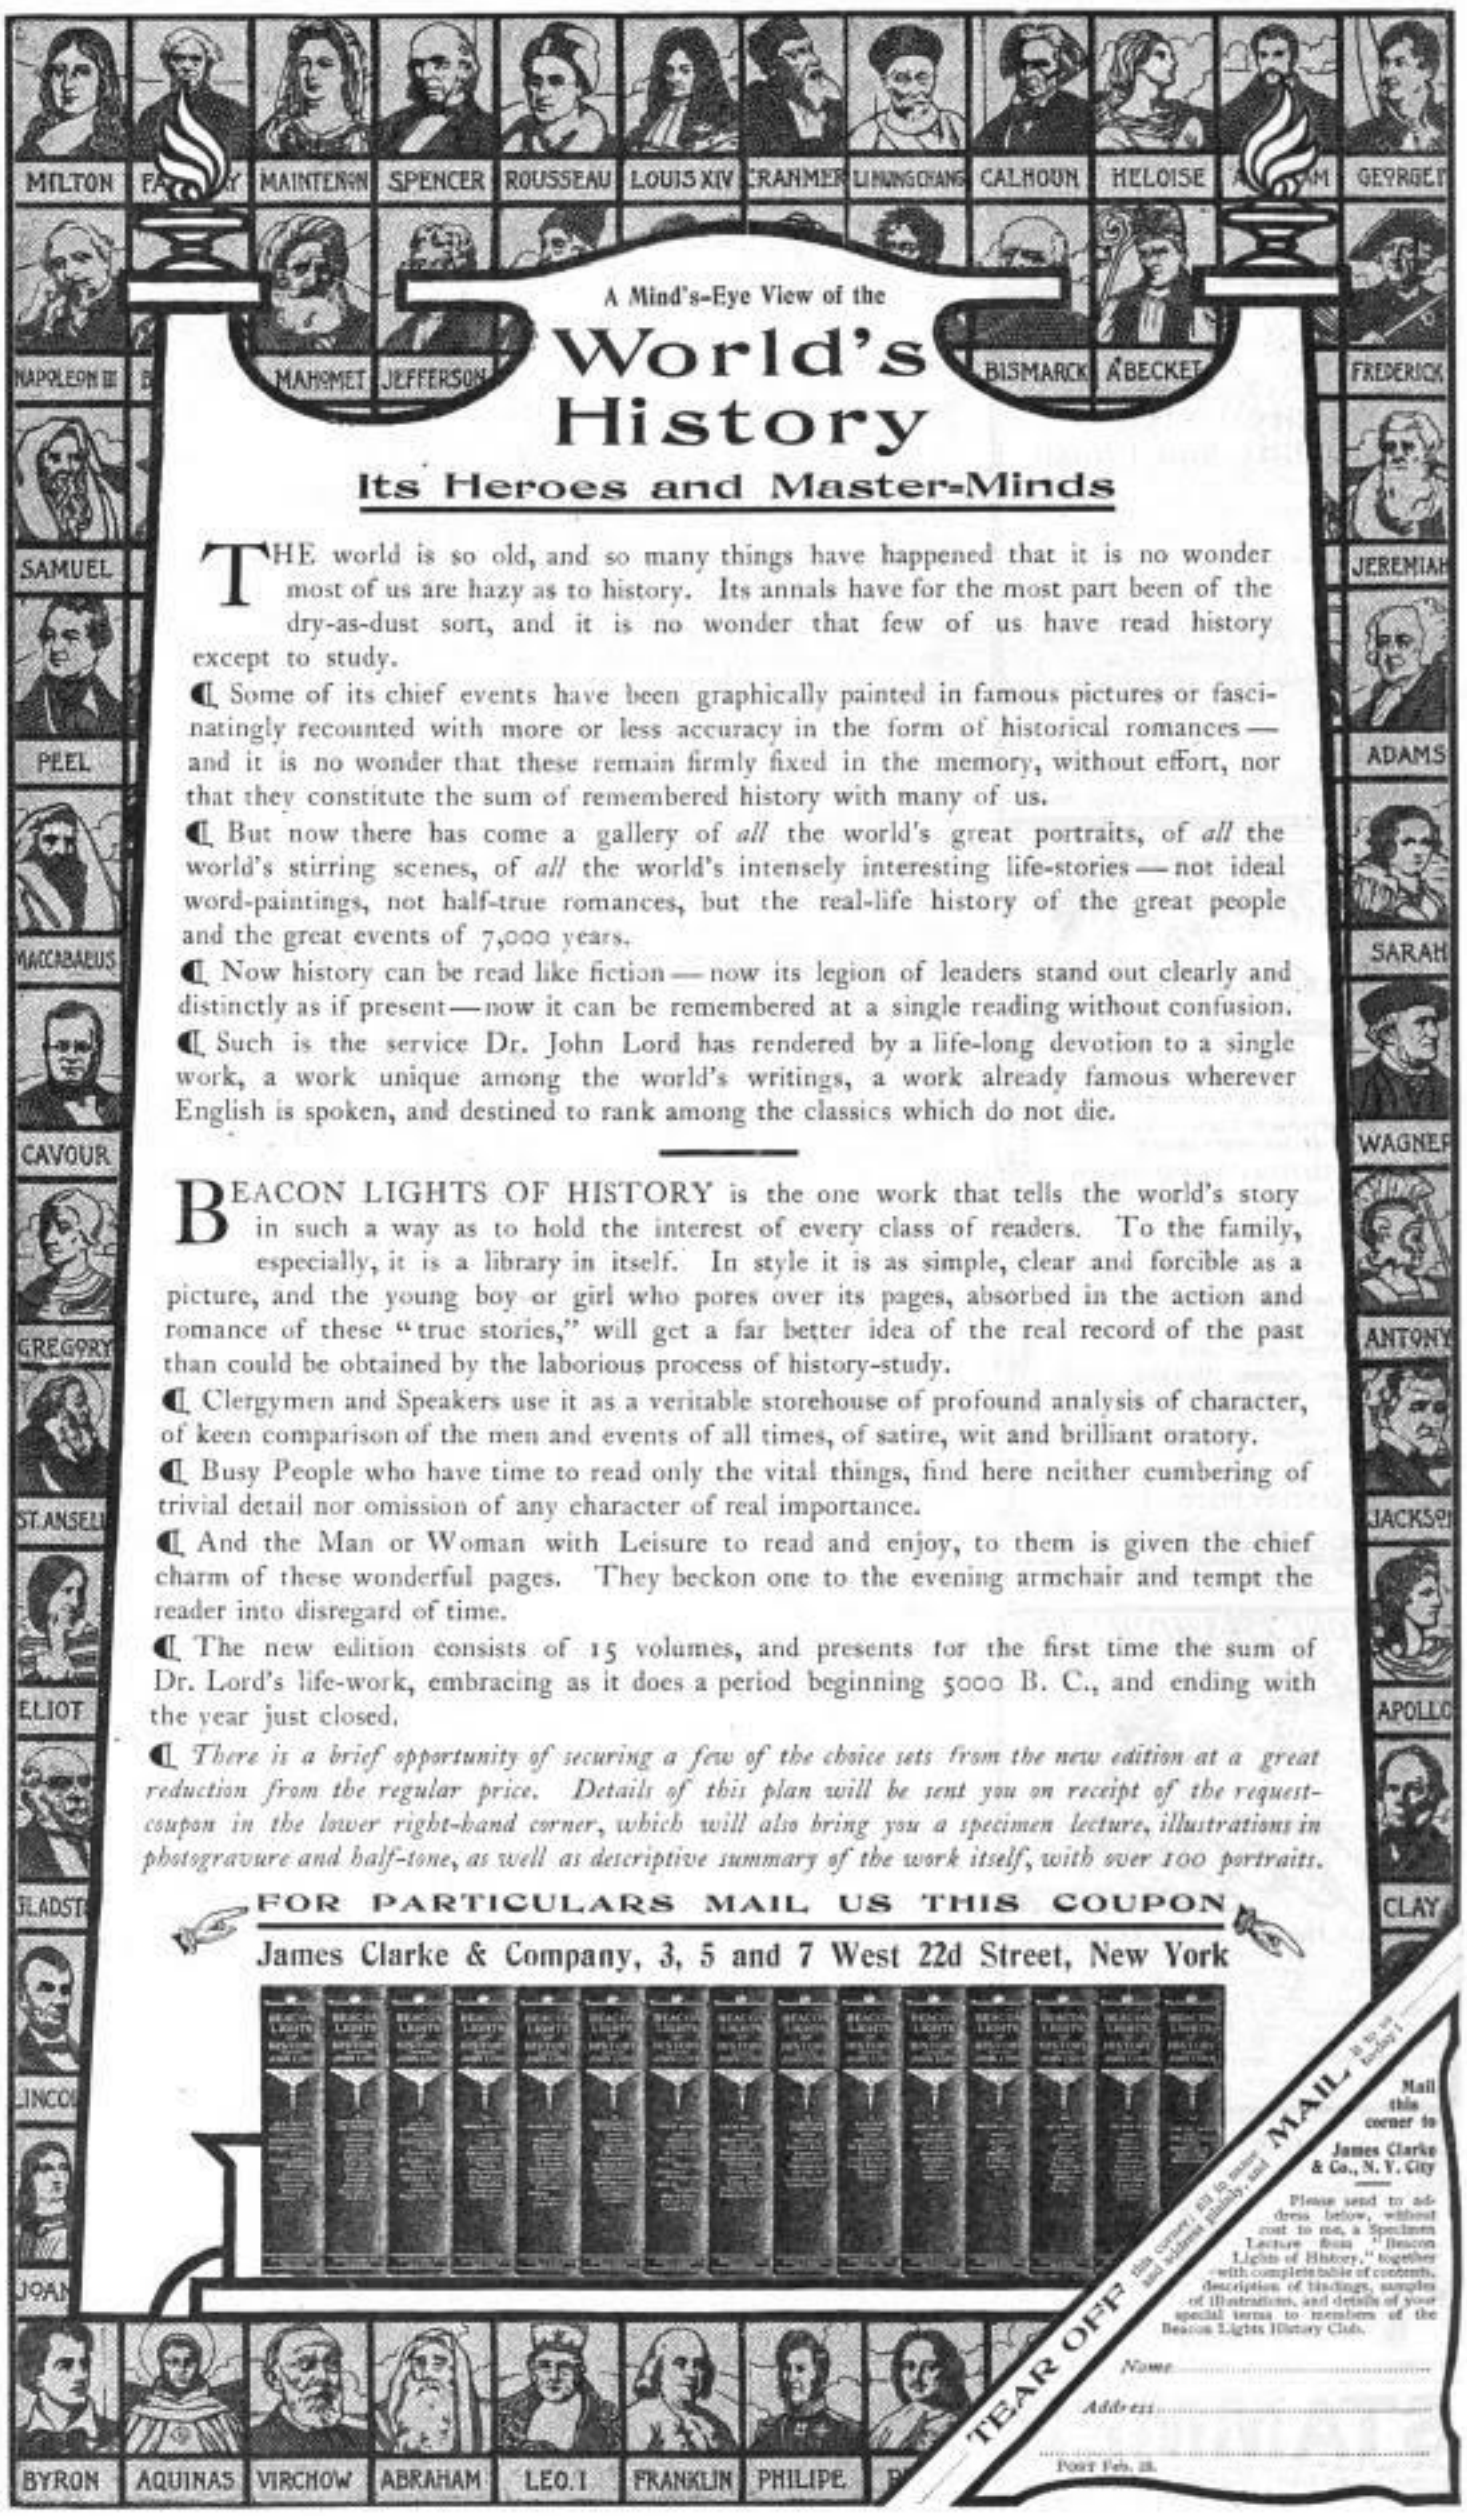
A Literary Policeman

General Francis Vinton Greene, who has lately taken the uneasy position of Police Commissioner in New York, is an author, like the former head of the police board, Theodore Roosevelt. General Greene, who was graduated from West Point and served in the regular army until 1886, was a military attaché in the Turco-Russian war, and was present at the bloody battles of Shipka and Plevna. The resulting book on The Russian Army and its Campaigns in Turkey was accounted by military experts one of the best modern studies of its kind. He has written other books, including a life of General Nathaniel Greene, of Revolutionary fame. Possibly the experiences which assist him may result in a literary memorial of a campaign with the New York police.

The improvements in transit which are under way in New York would have been appreciated by Edgar Allan Poe. When he was the editor of the Broadway Magazine his office was in the neighborhood of the City Hall. The cottage which he occupied for a part of this time still stands at Fordham, ten miles or more away. Opposite the cottage is an attractive bit of open ground with lawn and trees which is now Poe's Park. Farther up the river Irving's home, Sunnyside, stands very much as it was when he left it for the last time. Manhattan Island itself, however, is likely to maintain few literary landmarks in the future against the march of the sky-scraper.

Mr. Caine's picturesque countenance has won him some rather hard knocks as well as a large measure of publicity. There was recently a story by Henry Harland in his collection Gray Roses which dealt very harshly with a literary poseur whom some readers were unkind enough to mistake for Mr. Caine. Indeed, the gibes that one hears in the smoking-rooms of certain London clubs which have literary affiliations are not sparing of any one.

Apropos of Gilbert Parker's well-known and resolute ambition and get-ahead-ativeness, a London confrère said recently, "I do not sleep well."



"What is the trouble?" was asked.

"I am frequently wakened by a sound."

"What is the sound?"

"The sound of Gilbert Parker climbing."

A Mind's-Eye View of the World's History

Its Heroes and Master-Minds

THE world is so old, and so many things have happened that it is no wonder most of us are hazy as to history. Its annals have for the most part been of the dry-as-dust sort, and it is no wonder that few of us have read history except to study.

¶ Some of its chief events have been graphically painted in famous pictures or fascinatingly recounted with more or less accuracy in the form of historical romances — and it is no wonder that these remain firmly fixed in the memory, without effort, nor that they constitute the sum of remembered history with many of us.

¶ But now there has come a gallery of all the world's great portraits, of all the world's stirring scenes, of all the world's intensely interesting life-stories — not ideal word-paintings, not half-true romances, but the real-life history of the great people and the great events of 7,000 years.

¶ Now history can be read like fiction — now its legion of leaders stand out clearly and distinctly as if present — now it can be remembered at a single reading without confusion.

¶ Such is the service Dr. John Lord has rendered by a life-long devotion to a single work, a work unique among the world's writings, a work already famous wherever English is spoken, and destined to rank among the classics which do not die.

BEACON LIGHTS OF HISTORY is the one work that tells the world's story in such a way as to hold the interest of every class of readers. To the family, especially, it is a library in itself. In style it is as simple, clear and forcible as a picture, and the young boy or girl who pores over its pages, absorbed in the action and romance of these "true stories," will get a far better idea of the real record of the past than could be obtained by the laborious process of history-study.

¶ Clergymen and Speakers use it as a veritable storehouse of profound analysis of character, of keen comparison of the men and events of all times, of satire, wit and brilliant oratory.

¶ Busy People who have time to read only the vital things, find here neither cumbering of trivial detail nor omission of any character of real importance.

¶ And the Man or Woman with Leisure to read and enjoy, to them is given the chief charm of these wonderful pages. They beckon one to the evening armchair and tempt the reader into disregard of time.

¶ The new edition consists of 15 volumes, and presents for the first time the sum of Dr. Lord's life-work, embracing as it does a period beginning 5000 B. C., and ending with the year just closed.

¶ There is a brief opportunity of securing a few of the choice sets from the new edition at a great reduction from the regular price. Details of this plan will be sent you on receipt of the request-coupon in the lower right-hand corner, which will also bring you a specimen lecture, illustrations in photogravure and half-tone, as well as descriptive summary of the work itself, with over 100 portraits.

Letters by the Way

By Charles Battell Loomis

Author of The Man of Putty, etc.

ALMOST THERE, U. S. A.

Dear Reader: I generally like to write about the thing that's uppermost in my mind and I can't get the young man I met the other day out of my head. You see he was a professional barytone singer, and we fell into conversation while we were both waiting for a train to attend to business and take us to a suburban town out in Jersey.

He was a gentle-spoken, small-featured, refined-looking chap, a college-bred man, and he came (as I found out) of a rather well-known Massachusetts family who contributed men to the pulpit and to the Revolutionary Army when we were struggling for freedom.

It came out that he had sung the night before at the house of Zenas Q. Higgins who made the enormous fortune in Wall Street two years ago that was the talk of the whole country for nearly three days. Twenty millions, I think it was, in as many hours. Mrs. Higgins had always had society leanings, and when she became that rich it was an easy matter for her to become a lady, and she did so almost as fast as Zenas had made his money. It isn't every one who can become a lady inside of twenty-four hours even in this rapid country.

Just out of curiosity I asked the young barytone if he had had any desire to push into society while singing at such a palatial residence and his answer was amusing. He said: "Why, I did not go there as a guest. I went there on business as a paid entertainer. I didn't meet him or his wife and they didn't meet me because we aren't equals. He knows it and I know it. Of course, I don't mean to say that he is not a much cleverer man than I, because I'm no better off in a pecuniary way than I was when I was born, while he has enough money to buy cities, but he's not the sort of man that I'd care to invite home to meet my mother, and so why should I attempt to do more than sing for him?"

I laughed outright, because the idea seemed whimsical. I know well enough that Higgins felt that the barytone was highly honored in being hired to sing in his gorgeous palace. What would he have thought if he could have known that the modest barytone felt socially superior to him? And of course he was socially superior.

We had quite a comfortable chat, the barytone and I, because I have seen exhibitions of the way in which singers are snubbed by their patronesses. I know a lady who is in the habit of employing singers and musicians of commanding talent at her functions. They are always met by her housekeeper, and she never so much as acknowledges their presence save when applauding their efforts in company with her guests, but among those who have sung and played for her are some who have their own evenings at home where you will meet about all the lions in the literary and artistic world, and where every one is on an equality, because it is not money but feeling and talent that counts with them. It would be literally impossible for Madame Moneybags to obtain an invitation to one of those "at homes."

In the world she has bought with her money they are beneath her, but in the real world she is simply ignored by them. But I pray you, do not tell her, because it makes her happy to think that she is a social leader.

I told the barytone and I'm going to tell you of an experience that a young violinist had with Mrs. Moneybags' husband, who is vulgar but good-natured.

The violinist had been performing at her house together with a well-known prima donna and a tenor not so well known. The violinist was human, like the rest of us, and becoming thirsty he went and asked the person nearest him, who happened to be Mr. Moneybags, for a drink of water.

Mrs. Moneybags would have withered him with a glance and would perhaps have called a servant of a servant to attend to his wants, but Mr. Moneybags' sense of humor was touched.

"Water, water! In this house? No, young man, I don't have anything as cheap as water here. You'd better order something expensive." Then he put his hand on the young man's shoulder—you see he was democratic enough to touch a musician with his own hands—and he led him into the dining-room where the invited guests were soon to make merry, and he said to a waiter, "Say, this young feller is thirsty. Fill him up with champagne. Give him all he'll drink. He isn't a guest, but he can hit the fiddle all right."

The young musician was not a drinking man, however, so he said quietly after the millionaire had left the room:

"Mr. Moneybags means all right, but all I want is a glass of water."

It isn't necessary to say, however, that in the homes of cultivated people artists are never made to feel that there is a difference—as there frequently is—and the little barytone told me that he had many real and valued friends among people who first knew him as a professional singer. It's a fine thought that there are in America many professional business men who are not ashamed to accept professional singers as friends. Because, after all, a man who labors with his hands and brain might look down on a man who labors only with his brain and throat.

While we are on this subject who can tell what it is that makes a gentleman? It is not one's profession or trade or occupation. It is not good manners, it certainly isn't riches; it is not education, or even cultivation, or kindness of heart, or politeness. I've known men who were studiedly polite and who were not gentlemen in the real sense of the word, and I have known real gentlemen who swore like pirates. There was not an ounce of profanity in their swearing, however—not half the venom that some women can put into "Hang it!" I have known men who never smoked or drank or swore or chewed whom you would not care to take home to dinner, and I have known men of the kindest hearts in the world who were anything but gentlemen. There's no hard and fast rule. A man may break all the rules of society and yet be a gentleman, and another may obey all the rules and miss gentlehood. In fact, such a thing as a perfect gentleman never existed, but all of us have larger or smaller spots of gentlemanliness on us, and if we know how to cultivate the spots they may spread so that we'll pass for a gentleman almost anywhere—even at Mrs. Moneybags'.

And this much we all know: That a real gentleman or a lady will always contrive to make his or her entertainers as happy as her guests, and we also know that if a man systematically goes to work to make others happy—well, if he doesn't look out some one will cry at him, "You're a gentleman."

Speaking of the man whom you wouldn't take home to dinner. Have you ever thought that perhaps that man may have a good deal of feeling for his family himself, and that that is the reason he has never invited you?

A Senatorial Inventor

SENATOR-ELECT James B. McCreary, of Kentucky, who will take his seat in the United States Senate on March 4, is in every sense a typical Kentuckian. Like all Kentuckians, he loves to entertain—not for policy's sake, but in the good old way; like all Kentuckians, he loves to speak, and there is not a barbecue, picnic or public function of any kind in his district but what he is on the program; and, like all Kentuckians, he loves horses, although he never attends races. During the Civil War he naturally drifted into the cavalry, following the dashing raider Morgan throughout his career and winning a name for himself at Green River Bridge, where his cool head and determined effort saved the Confederate forces from a terrible defeat. Though the greater part of his life since the war has been spent in public service, Mr. McCreary has found time to carry on extensive and successful farming interests in the Bluegrass. Some years ago, while he was Governor of Kentucky, Mr. McCreary's favorite horse, Prince, a handsome bay of royal blood, learned the trick of slipping the bridle. The Governor had his groom to search every saddler's shop in Richmond for a bridle that Prince could not slip. Being unable to find one, he went in person to a certain shop and asked for a safe bridle. The dealer replied that he had none.

"That's strange," said the Governor; "why don't you make one?"

"Never saw one, and don't know how."

"Well, I'll show you."

With that he pulled off his coat and went to work. The result was such a surprise to the saddler that he did not get over it for a week. The hooded bridle, now in common use, is very simple, but will baffle any horse, however tricky he may be.

The dealer wanted to have it patented and called the McCreary Bridle, but the Governor would not hear of it. He said that any man who had followed Morgan, who had ridden every kind of horse that could be "borrowed" on the way, and then didn't know how to make a bridle that would not slip, ought not to be allowed to own a horse.

Only $1 If You Act At Once

We're offering RIDPATH'S HISTORY OF THE WORLD, while this Club edition lasts, at 40 per cent. off the price that over 60,000 people have paid for their sets. You pay only a single dollar before the full set is sent—balance at $2.00 a month. Nine massive royal octavo volumes, 11 inches tall, containing 4,000 illustrations and many maps and color plates.

Do you like to read interesting, exciting stories that are TRUE?

If you do, you'd pore over Ridpath's History of the World till you'd absorbed the whole of it—from the first page to the last one.

Every Race, every Nation, every Time is covered, from the earliest dawn of civilization to the present day, and the chapters are like a long succession of tales of adventure in their power to gain and hold the reader's interest.

It is not a work you read from a sense of duty for "improving" yourself, but because it entertains you. It's more like a historical novel in literary style and wealth of incident, than it's like the average history.

You feel that you actually see the scenes that its author pictures out for you.

Cæsar is not a bare name, he is a man, walking the streets of Rome, laughing, eating, sleeping, dreaming, going forth to battle at the head of legions of voiceful human beings.

Alexander, Cambyses, Ptolemy, Charlemagne, Peter the Great, Charles Martel, Napoleon, Washington, and all the hosts of history are just as real to you as Edward VII or Theodore Roosevelt after you have read this wonderful story-book of all the races and all the nations.

There is no historical reference work that approaches "Ridpath" in value. All the lands of the earth are visited; the history of every nation is fully told.

Whatever doubtful allusions you may run across in your magazine or newspaper reading, whatever hazy suggestions, are quickly cleared up by turning to the wonderfully comprehensive index in the ninth volume.

Books are Royal Octavo—about 11 inches tall.

And for children and young folks, with its 4,000 color plates, engravings, maps and charts, it is an educator worth its weight in gold.

Wouldn't it be a sensible, economical plan for you to buy this history, when you can get it at about half the price that more than 60,000 people have paid for their sets, paying only one dollar before the complete set is sent you?

USE THAT INQUIRY TICKET

President McKinley wrote: "I am familiar with the merits of Ridpath's History of the World, and commend it to the scholar as well as to the plain people."

SENT FREE It is certainly worth your while to know something about what such a famous history as "Ridpath's" is. The inquiry form will bring you a book of specimen pages and all the information necessary to help you decide whether you can afford to own the set or whether you can afford not to own it. But you must be prompt. When this Club edition is sold out, Ridpath's History of the World will cost you almost double what it costs now.

The Firm Mr. Turck

By HAYDEN CARRUTH

PERSISTENCY of purpose and the making the best of untoward happenings seemed always to arouse the admiration of the ingenious Mr. Milo Bush. He was so often heard to speak with profound respect of a certain former denizen of Sentinel Butte named Turck that I was finally convinced that he must have possessed qualities of this description, and on dropping a hint to Mr. Bush soon learned that my suspicions were not ill-founded.

Oh, yes; Turck, Obadiah Turck [he began without delay]. Remarkable man, Turck was — you never in your life seen a man so set in his way as he was. And contrary — why, if you should mebby say sort o' careless, just wishing to be agreeable and make conversation and not offend anybody, that the sun rose in the east, up that Turck would speak and say it wa'n't no such stuff — that sunrise is a local phenomenon and that in Ingeana, where he come from, it always rose in the west. If you'd never been in Ingeana what could you say? Then mebby he'd go on and say that Ingeana had a moon of its own, which never set, but just hung up and tended strictly to lighting Ingeana; though he might not neither, Turck not being much of a talker, but more inclined to set solemn and think when he wasn't working, as he was mostly, being the biggest worker in the town. You never seen such a worker. Not a fast worker like Al Doty — why, I've known Al Doty to go to the post-office and set a hen before breakfast, swap hosses twice dooring the forenoon, and in the afternoon repair his fiddle, go a-fishin', chase a tramp out of town, set ten mush-rat traps and put a new handle in the ax for his wife; and not exhausted with his labors as any other man would 'a' been, come tearing downtown in the evening and hunt two hours for a man — any man — who would take one side — either side — in a bet on something — anything. Never seen such a man for pure industry. And mebby then not satisfied, but he would set in Shanks' grocery and show how a high tariff on bananas and monkey-wrenches would pay off the national debt. And sometimes he'd go home and set up the rest of the night in the cellar with the cat helping her catch rats. And turn up fresh in the morning at the post-office. Worst man for dorgs you ever seen. Had more'n a million of 'em — pretty near. Used to have his dorgs trained so they'd take turns standing inside the front door with their tails sticking out through a knothole about two feet from the ground.

When you called you pulled the dorg's tail, the dorg barked and somebody come and let you in. Called it the Al Doty Patent Living Canine Doorbell. Then he had a dorg which — but I was telling you 'bout old Turck.

Well, this here Turck — it was very curious 'bout all of Al's dorgs that they — this here old Turck was a slow, hard worker who never said a word 'less you said two and two made four, or something of the sort, when he'd up and tell you that it wa'n't no universal fact, 'cause they didn't come within a mile of it in Ingeana. The most stick-to-it and fight-it-out man you ever seen. Used to raise garden truck out here half a mile and peddle it round town. Had a wagon he carried his stuff in. Thought it was the greatest wagon that ever got behind a boss. Said it was made out of some kind of wood which grew in only one spot in Ingeana. Byneby one wheel dropped off it. Fastened a rail under it with one end on the ground to hold up that corner. Then another wheel busted. Put a grindstone on in place of it. Then the third wheel caved. Clapped on a sleigh runner. Then the fourth and last wheel went all to smash.

What did old Turck do? Took hold of the end of the axle with one hand and went round town carrying that corner of the wagon. And all the time bragging 'bout the special wood in that wagon, and telling how he had run the agents of the Smithsonian Asylum out of the neighborhood when they wanted to examine the strange tree it come out of.

But what I wanted to tell you 'bout in partic'lar was old Turck's experience with the convict. Not that it's much of a story, but it 'lustrates his character so well. Character is the troo thing, after all. 'Tain't where a man comes from, or what he says, or what he does even, that counts; it's what he is. Old Turck had character. He stood for the right. You couldn't move him no more'n you could put your shoulder ag'in' the Rock of Jibberwalter and make it stand over out o' the way. Old Turck had stability.

Opportunity! Success!

Can You Tell the Genuine Article of Either Sort from Spurious Imitations?

If you can, I wish you would write to me and help me with the discussions I and my associates are carrying on in the New Thought Magazine. If you cannot, then I am sure you will be interested in the discussion itself.

William Walker Atkinson, Editor

The New Thought Magazine is the exponent of effort. That means sincere effort toward success. Wherever you are or whatever you are, if you value the inspiration of contact with the minds of others who are also striving for success, you will find it in the New Thought. We call it the New Thought—it is simply made up of old thoughts, about opportunity, effort, self-control, success—that's the sum of it. We try to find and understand the "how." We try to learn to know our own possibilities and limitations, to develop the one and overcome the other. We recognize the vital difference between "I can't" and "I can and I will."

Every man or woman, young or old, who has ambition, has a part with us and we want your sympathy and fellowship. The New Thought Magazine is for sale on news-stands. It costs just 5 cents a copy. You can sample the spirit of it for one nickel. If it agrees with you, each month's copy will cost you just the same price. If, by any chance, your dealer is out or hasn't the magazine, send us his name and yours and we'll see that you are supplied.

Ask for the New Thought Magazine to-day when you pass the news-stand and try it a nickel's worth. If you don't think it's worth a nickel after reading it, take it back and get your money. It will be there for you.

I want to send you free, just for your own reading, a copy of my essay entitled "I can and I will." This will be very helpful to you. Address me at my city office, or come and see me. William Walker Atkinson, 504 Howland Block, 174 Dearborn Street, Chicago.

WEBSTER'S INTERNATIONAL DICTIONARY

A CHANCE for an honest, energetic man to make money on an honest, ready-selling proposition. If you mean business write

G. & C. Merriam Co. Springfield Mass.

This convict was in the Territorial prison up at Longview. Don't know what he was in for, but I guess he done it, whatever it was.

He wasn't much of a man, anyhow, and didn't seem to profit by the advantages which our fine prison afforded, with the lockstep, and molasses on his mush three times a week, and coffee legal hollerdays, and all them luxuries.

'Stead of staying in jail as he should and being made into a new man and a useful member of society, what did this ungrateful critter do but bust out in the night and go off wearing the fine striped clothes we taxpayers had provided him with as part of the means of reforming him.

Well, this here criminal, when he gets out he looks at his clothes in the moonlight. Says he to himself, "They won't do." The stripes were black and white, 'bout two inches wide, and running round—very neat and tasty inside and calculated to help a man morally, but not the thing for outside wear, as the feller had well said. Then says the feller to himself, "I must make a swap with some man what ain't in yet," and he started on, keeping his eyes open. Just 'fore daylight he got down in this neighborhood, and came along to old Turck's house, and sneaks up through the garden. It was a warm summer night and the winders were all open. He creeps up and looks in one which happens to be in Turck's bedroom, and sees his clothes on a chair; then he fishes 'em out with a stick, puts 'em on, and shoves his own in the winder.

He then goes hence, as the saying is, and I reckon he's hence yet, 'cause they never caught him.

In the morning Turck gets up and looks at the clothes on the chair. He looks long and some earnestly. But he says nothing. He takes 'em up and sees they're about his size. Then he puts 'em on, still saying nothing, and goes out to do the chores at the barn. He comes in at breakfast-time and is surveyed by his wife, who says something, as is the habit of some few women. Old Turck still says nothing, not being able to see that there is anything left to say when Mrs. Turck stops, which she does evenchooly, there being a limit to her strength. After breakfast he simply announces in calm, measured tones that he ain't going to be euchred by no jailbird, but that he shall wear the clothes till the feller fetches his own back. Then he hitches up and comes to town with a load of garden sass.

Well, that's about all there is to it, but you'll grasp the man's character from the incident, slight though it may be. He kept on wearing them clothes as he said he should, attracting the attention of the idle and curious as he went about town, but neither courting it nor shrinking from it, like the noble character he was. The prison officers hauled him up a few times, and took a shot at him occasionally, mistaking him for the other man, but he didn't complain.

It ran on for a year. Then one day he came home with a bundle, and after retiring to his room for some time he came out dressed in a new suit and carrying the striped one in his hand.

"Thank goodness!" says his wife.

"Yes," says he, "they are getting pretty well worn, so I shall lay 'em aside."

"Some sense at last," says his wife.

"But they ain't worn out, by any means," says he. "You take them clothes, Matilda, and cut 'em down for Georgie," and he p'inted at the youngest boy.

The woman was silent for some minutes. Then she said: "Yes, yes; as you wish. I promised to obey, and I will. The woman is the weaker vessel. She is the vine—man is the oak. Yes, yes. Thy will is my will. Yes, yes. I will make them over for our dear little Georgie." She walked up and down behind him as he sot by the stove, and wrung her hands while she struggled with her emotions. Then she paused and took up a rolling-pin, hefted it in her hands like a baseball player, and then fetched old Turck a crack on the head that the hired man heard out at the barn. When Turck come to be found that she had burnt up the striped suit.

Doc Middleton, who had been sent for in the mean time, says he immegitly begun to talk about his wagon, and how he chased off them scientific chaps from Washington.

A Great Dictionary At a Bargain Price

A good dictionary is one of the few indispensable books that every man or woman who expects to be well informed must own. It is a sort of foundation on which to build an education. If it is a good dictionary, it is the universal question answerer of the household—the final book of reference. It is the only book that holds a life-long interest for everybody, from the schoolboy to the president, from the mechanic to the millionaire. The right kind of dictionary should contain all the words in the English language and should give full definitions accurately and simply written. It should possess many features of the encyclopedia.

The Encyclopedic Dictionary amply fills these conditions. It is the most comprehensive of all dictionaries, and it gives the simplest and most readable definitions and is the most attractively illustrated. It is, as its name implies, a dictionary and an encyclopedia welded together.

A Quarter of a Million Words

SIX MASSIVE VOLUMES

The dictionary portion of the work contains a quarter of a million words. Correct pronunciation is assured by a perfect system of simple diacritical marks indicating the exact value of each vowel. The history and derivation of every word are shown. This dictionary contains more words than any other dictionary in existence. It gives all the latest words created by the recent advances in science—there being about 3000 definitions belonging to electrical science alone. The volumes are printed from clear, legible type on a fine quality of white paper. The set is bound in six large volumes in half-Morocco leather stamped in gold. The entire work contains over 5000 pages. The volumes are 11½ x 9 inches in size—and nearly two inches thick.

FULL DEFINITIONS

The Encyclopedic Dictionary is noted for the fullness of its definitions. The encyclopedic portion of the work treats 50,000 subjects in an encyclopedic manner—that is, not only the definition of the mere word is given, but the thing itself is described and its history written. The encyclopedic articles were all written by eminent authorities, such as Professor Thomas H. Huxley, Professor Richard A. Proctor, and Dr. Marcus Benjamin of the Smithsonian Institution. The work contains thousands of illustrations—many of which are full-page plates in colors—explaining and aiding the definitions. Ex-Judge Noah Davis says of this work: "To the qualities of a great history it adds a fund of encyclopedic knowledge which I have never before seen in such a work."

The Reading Table

"A Collection of Human Hearts"

"Consider that awful thing that you have there—that collection of human hearts!" said Mr. Bronson Howard to the group of American dramatists who had made him the guest of honor at their dinner.

Thus did the dean of American dramatists crystallize the experience and knowledge gained from a lifetime of play-building into a single sentence that seemed to the more advanced of his hearers to lay bare for the moment the very heart and core of the drama's best cherished secret. It is a pity that an utterance of such significance and value should be permitted to sink into oblivion instead of forcing its way into the brains of the thousands of budding playwrights who have been befuddled by the false teachings of those ignorant and pretentious ones who prate complacently of the "intellectual drama" and have a cheap sneer for what they call "playing to the gallery."

To gain an idea of the truth contained in Mr. Howard's words we have only to consider the different degrees of intelligence and education to be found in the average theatre audience. There is the good woman of high ideals and richly cultivated mind, and the erring one who is to be pitied for her ignorance. There is the multi-millionaire hidden from view by the curtains of his box, planning an enterprise for the development of a country so remote that its very name is unknown to the newsboy who has invested his last quarter in the gallery seat above. There is the banker's wife and there is the maid servant. There is the college professor and there is the truck driver. The intellectual average may be higher—and it probably is—in the lower part of the house than above, but which one of us is prepared to say where we are to look for the hearts that beat the truest, for the laughter and tears that come the most quickly, for the sympathies that are the keenest?

Every one of the men and women represented by this collection of human hearts has equal right to a place at the banquet table of instruction and entertainment that the true drama sets before its votaries. The dramatist who would appeal to them all with equal force, as Shakespeare did in "King Lear" and "Romeo and Juliet" and "Julius Cæsar," must address himself directly to their hearts instead of to their brains, and turn a deaf ear to those who extol some brewage of foreign decadence as a drama "above the heads of the people."

I have never yet seen a play that was too good for the "collection of human hearts" that Mr. Howard calls upon his juniors to respect, but I have seen several that were too stupid. A drama that is too good for us must necessarily be better than the best of Shakespeare's, which are exactly good enough.

Shakespeare's Works for Shakespeare Students

If you are a student of Shakespeare's plays or a lover of the works of the Great Poet and have been plodding through the obscure passages and unexplained phrases of an ordinary edition of Shakespeare, you should send us the coupon in the lower right-hand corner of this advertisement at once, and we will send you a set of Shakespeare for examination at our expense—no matter where you live—that will surprise you. We will send you a set of the Booklovers' edition in 40 volumes—a play to a volume. This edition is not the work of one or two editors only, but its notes and explanatory matter represent the best thought and scholarship of 200 of the world's greatest Shakespearian authorities. We have secured a limited number of sets of this magnificent edition from the regular publishers of the work and we are closing out these sets at bargain prices—and on easy monthly payments.

The Booklovers' Edition

This edition reproduces the famous Cambridge text of Shakespeare. The text is unexpurgated and is printed as Shakespeare wrote it. The entire set contains 7000 pages, 40 beautiful color plates and 400 reproductions of rare woodcuts of Shakespeare's time. The volumes are 7½ x 5¼ inches in size—just the right size for easy handling—and they are bound in an attractive cloth or half-leather binding stamped in gold.

Critical Comments: This is the only advertised edition in existence containing Critical Comments on the plays and characters selected from the writings of eminent Shakespearian scholars. These comments make clear the larger meaning of the play and the nature of the characters.

Complete Glossaries: Immediately following each play is a full Glossary, giving the meaning of every obsolete or difficult word. No other edition contains Glossaries as complete and full as these, and no other edition contains the Glossaries in the same volumes as the plays.

Study Methods: This edition contains a complete Method of Study for each play, consisting of Study Questions and Suggestions—the idea of the editors being to give in the set a college course in Shakespeare study.

Arguments: Preceding each play is an analysis of the play—called an "Argument"—written in an interesting story-telling style. If you do not care to read the entire play, you can read its plot and the development of its story through the Argument.

Notes: This is the only edition published that gives two full sets of Notes in connection with each play—Explanatory Notes for the average reader and Critical Notes for the critical student or scholar.

Life of the Poet: No other edition contains so much interesting material concerning Shakespeare himself. There is a life of Shakespeare by Dr. Israel Gollancz, with critical estimates of his character and genius by Walter Bagehot, Leslie Stephens and other writers. They are vivid articles—interesting from start to finish—and they relate all that the world really knows about Shakespeare.

The Coupon Cuts the Price in Two

The fact that we have secured an entire edition for cash from the publishers is the reason we are able to offer sets of this splendid Shakespeare at bargain prices. The edition will probably be sold very rapidly, so if you wish to take advantage of this bargain, do not fail to order at once. Our special bargain prices are $27.00 for a set in half-leather binding and $21.00 for cloth binding—payable at the rate of $2.00 a month. These are about half the regular prices of this edition, and the cost to you of the forty volumes amounts to little more than fifty cents a volume. Cut out the coupon, sign it, and mail it to us to-day, and we will send you a set, express prepaid, for examination. You do not pay a cent until you examine the books and are satisfied with them.

SPECIAL PREMIUM OFFER

If your order is among the first 250 received, we will send you absolutely free with the set a beautiful picture matted and framed in oak (ready for hanging) of six of Shakespeare's characters executed in colors. The only condition is that you must order promptly, so that your order will be among the first 250. This picture is equal in value to pictures regularly sold at $2.00 each.

The Money Makers of Advertising And How They Are Created

SAMUEL MOSSER, Reading, Pa. E. T. HEALEY, Jamesburg, N. J. J. N. PAIGE, Troy, N. Y. H. D. BARTO, Syracuse, N. Y.

$100.00 to $500.00 a Month Through Mail Instruction

THE readers of THE SATURDAY EVENING POST are largely men and women who find entertainment and encouragement in the business story, and there is, perhaps, no form of literature that appeals to them more strongly than the kind dealing with great business possibilities and offering plenty of encouragement to those who will heed the signs of the times.

The marvelous development of the advertising business has opened up widespread opportunities for ambitious men and women to earn fine salaries. Advertising writers and managers are paid higher salaries than any other class of subordinate workers, some of the picked workers receiving from $10,000 to $15,000 a year.

Advertisers everywhere are calling for young men and women who have been properly trained to write advertisements, and the supply of good help does not begin to equal the demand.

The clerk, bookkeeper, salesman or stenographer who becomes a proficient ad. writer is in a position to earn double the present income because employers are quick to recognize the added worth of such knowledge, and are willing to pay the price.

The trained ad. writer does more than merely originate illustrative ideas and write pleasantly about the various products, for he or she must study conditions and apply the known principles where they will do the most good.

The enterprising American manufacturer has found out that advertising will place his goods in tens of thousands of homes throughout the land, and he is losing no time in realizing on his investment possibilities. And just as soon as his business begins to feel the effects of publicity, with an ever-increasing appropriation, then is opened up another position for the competent advertising writer.

With advertising increasing in volume at the rate of at least one hundred millions of dollars yearly it takes no prophet to foresee the wonderful effect on the skilled labor market; and those vocations which are to-day overcrowded must each contribute their quota to the ranks of the advertising writer.

Not only is it a vital part of commercial economy that all this new volume of advertising be properly cared for, but it is equally important that a large percentage of the existing matter be improved by trained business writers, for a mere glance at our magazines and newspapers will reveal the deplorable lack of originality and pithiness of sixty per cent. of the advertisements now running.

Shoe Ad. by H. D. BARTO, Syracuse, N. Y.

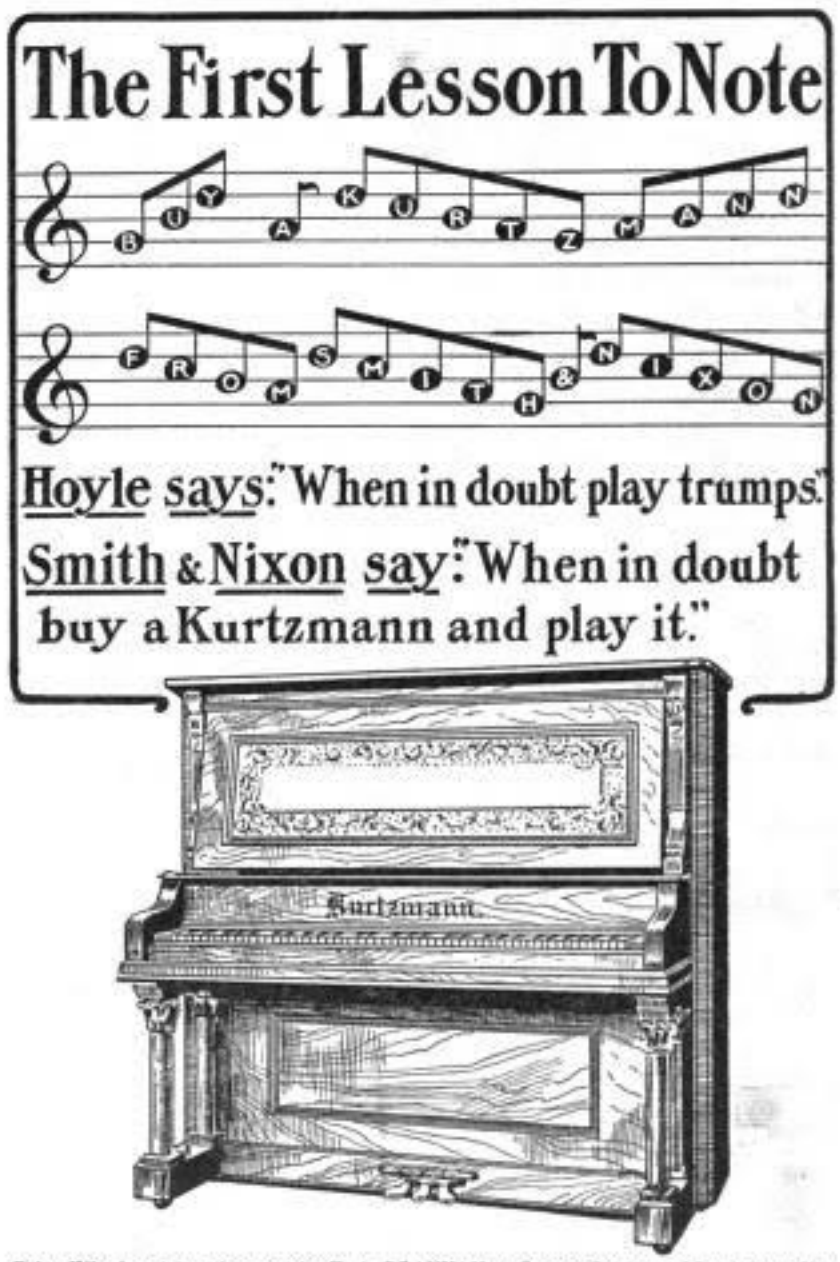
By George H. Powell

I have been asked time and again why the graduates of the Powell System of Advertising Instruction are so successful, in the great majority of instances, and how it is possible for the student by mail to gain the necessary practical experience without first entering the Advertising Department of an advertiser.

Now, of all branches of education, that of advertising writing is probably the best adapted to correspondence instruction.

A student of the Powell System after certain preliminary study is put right into practical and actual ad. writing under my personal supervision, which creates originality, where none was formerly possessed, and develops the knack of briefly and pointedly telling a business story.

And an ordinary common school education, added to a willingness to work and learn, is the sum total of the preliminary requirements to insure final success.



On this page I illustrate two more specimens of my students' work, and they point unmistakably to careful training which distinguishes my students above those who have been prepared elsewhere.

Mr. H. D. Barto began my course over a year ago, after a fruitless effort to learn good ad. writing through another course, and to-day he conducts an office of his own, with a list of some thirty customers, and with such signal success that he will soon be obliged to add to his force of workers. Not only did I teach him to produce good advertising, but I also went further and told him how to establish his own business. When one can complete my course and establish a large list of customers in less than fourteen months, many of whom contract for service at the rate of $50 each a week, it shows unmistakably what great and wonderful possibilities are within the grasp of those who are animated with a desire and determination to succeed. Mr. J. N. Paige, of Troy, N. Y., was earning a very moderate salary, and after completing less than half my course was doubling his income, and yet he has hardly begun to realize through his skill. Mr. E. T. Healey, of Jamesburg, N. J., had a similar experience to that of Mr. Barto, but he is now fitted to produce the best work at best prices. Mr. Samuel Mosser, of Reading, Pa., whose recent work has created so much favorable comment, has just been tendered the managership of a large retail store, where he will find plenty of scope for his advertising skill, and if he is not admitted later to a partnership I shall miss my guess, for scores of such advertising advancements are matters of record. The piano advertisement by Mr. Branham was a prize winner, and yet he is not ready to graduate from my course.

Advertising writing is the most congenial of all vocations, and it is, fortunately, the best adapted to home study and work. Those earning less than $25.00 per week should thoroughly investigate the Powell System, which is acknowledged by great authorities to be the best.

Business men and those who have their way to make in the world will be interested in my new Prospectus, which is the most instructive ever issued. It also contains an abundance of testimony that gives the facts as they are. To obtain a copy simply address me, George H. Powell, 182 Temple Court, New York, N. Y.

Oddities and Novelties

A Rival for the Panama

Corn husks during the present season have been bought up for the purpose of utilizing them in the manufacture of a new style of hat which may become both fashionable and popular next summer.

The material is cheap. In fact, it is usually wasted. Properly cured corn husks are tough and may be folded without cracking. Dampened, they can be made to assume any desired shape.

The process of working corn husks into hats is novel, somewhat intricate, and is protected by patent. It is said that samples already turned out are artistic as well as light and strong.

An element which enters significantly into the construction of the hat is the natural shape of the husks, which taper in width from base to tip. When split the parts maintain this configuration, as they parallel the fibers.

This tapering of all the parts has been an important feature in the manufacture of the hat. The brim and top of the hat are formed by a series of layers of corn husks. To impart a novel appearance, the outer ends of some of these layers are pointed. Considerable ingenuity has been displayed in the entire construction of the hat—even the band is made of corn husks—and it is asserted that the result is graceful and attractive, and that though it may be constructed economically to be sold at popular prices, more expensive brands, requiring exceptional skill in the manufacture, will be turned out to meet the demand for hats at fancy prices.

A Boon for Boarders

The chemical secret of making an edible butter out of copra oil, hitherto available only for the manufacture of soap, is a matter of such absorbing commercial interest that a European soap and perfumery firm has offered $60,000 for the formula. But the manufacturing chemists who have made the discovery value it more highly than that. A Marseilles firm worked for a number of years employing very costly machinery and high-priced scientists in making experiments which have finally resulted in the production of a copra butter having the consistency, taste and color of dairy butter.

When it is realized that this edible butter is the result of subtle chemical reactions of the very elements that have formerly been employed in the making of soap, the wonder grows.

Now a chemist in Baltimore, Maryland, has produced a table butter, nutritious and appetizing, from this same copra oil. It has been tested by the Government chemists at Washington who pronounce it free from deleterious matter. It comes, however, under the oleomargarine tax. The cost of production, after the first expense of experimenting is over, is not great.

One of the problems in manufacturing this novel kind of butter has been to remove the elements that cause rancidity. In an analysis of the finished product it has been hitherto impossible to discover either that secret or the more baffling one of how the oils, acids, fats, etc., that for years have not been considered valuable except for soap, now are made to blend strangely into wholesome butter. Copra butter should not be confounded with cocoa butter which is used in the drug and perfumery trades.

A Preservative for Timber

Experiments are being conducted on an extensive scale by the United States Government and by foreign nations with a wood-saturating device recently patented but not yet placed on the market. The process involves forcing preservative fluids, under high pressure, through piers, ship timber and railroad ties to protect them against destructive ants, beetles or mollusks.

Should these experiments prove successful the invention will be a source of great fortune to the patentee, and will be of incalculable benefit to shipping and other industries.

The special aim of the process is to combat the destruction wrought by the teredo navalis, which thus far has defied scientific warfare waged upon it. The British and German Governments have long had standing offers of substantial rewards to any one who should discover some efficient method of checking the ravages of this pest. The animal was originally brought into European and American ports by vessels hailing from tropical waters. It has now thoroughly domiciled

$30 Teacher to $100 Surveyor Through the I. C. S.

When I enrolled in the International Correspondence Schools six months ago, I was teaching school at $30 a month. After studying three months, I secured a position as draftsman and assistant surveyor at $70 a month, but soon after beginning work was offered $100 a month; I consider the instruction the most practical and economical ever offered to the public; in his spare time a man can acquire as good an education as at many colleges. The Instruction Papers are clear and concise, and the Reference Library is well gotten up. As soon as I finish the Surveying and Mapping Course, I shall qualify for further advancement by studying another.

A Tempting Delicacy

Shredded Whole Wheat Biscuit

is the Natural Food for Invalids because it is the most porous and light of all foods and presents greater surface for the action of digestive fluids. These fluids are drawn by absorption into every part of the wheat shreds, making the food immediately assimilable.

Shredded Whole Wheat Biscuit contains a food property to upbuild each and every element of the depleted body. Foods made of part of the wheat, such as white flour bread, cannot do this, and the ferment contained in them results in a sour mass in the stomach. There is no lard, yeast or health-disturbing ingredient of any nature in Shredded Whole Wheat Biscuit and its use insures a sweet, clean stomach.

It can be prepared in so many tempting ways that the fickle appetite is always attracted by its goodness and the ailing body quickly responds to its all-nourishing force.

itself and few wharves or ships are free from its destruction.

Coatings of tar, creosote and other preparations are only a temporary bar to the teredo's attacks.

By the process which the Governments are now testing chemicals designed to preserve the wood and to poison animal invaders are forced under enormous pressure along the grain pores of the timber. The mechanism of the apparatus can be constructed on a large or small scale, as needed. The fluid is injected through the end of the timber, but pressure is also applied to the circumference of the wood to prevent the opening of fissures which might otherwise develop on account of the great force necessary in the process of injection.

In this country and in Europe, in addition to impregnating timber to preserve it against animal destruction, experiments will be made with reagents designed to render wood fireproof. Building trades are very much interested in the outcome of the tests.

Window-Box Gardens

Indoor gardening is a branch of horticulture that is only beginning to receive the attention it deserves. A large number of vegetables may be grown in the house, in window-boxes and otherwise, if one is willing to take a little trouble with them, and in this way frequent contributions to the table in winter can be obtained for next to nothing. The pleasure incidental to the work is not to be despised, and the plants have an ornamental value.

The best way to grow parsley indoors is to get a few roots and plant them in eight-inch pots. They are somewhat like dandelion roots, sending up tufts of leaves. With a few pots thus started you will soon have a good crop of parsley. But, if you have window-space, there is plenty of opportunity for extending your gardening operations with thyme, leek and garlic, all of which will thrive in pots, requiring only a little water and some sunshine.

Meanwhile you may raise lettuce on a small but satisfactory scale, sowing the seeds at first in pots, and afterward setting out the tiny plants in a window-box. Radish seeds under similar conditions will soon sprout, and the little plants may be thinned out afterward so as not to become too crowded. For spring onions you may start with seeds, each of which will make an onion; or you may plant little silverskin "sets" (purchasable at any seed store), and each tiny onion will grow to be a big one.

Tomatoes are easily grown in window-boxes; all you have to do is to plant the seeds and wait for them to sprout. Train the vines vertically on wires or strings, and thus they will occupy a minimum of room.

Oils from Fruit Rinds

Fruit growers in California and Florida are beginning to manufacture oils of orange and lemon peel, which are likely to be produced before long on a considerable scale in this country. There is money in the business undoubtedly, inasmuch as the essences derived from the rinds of these citrus fruits are used in large quantities all over the world to flavor sweetmeats, confectionery and puddings, while oil of bergamot (derived from the peel of a kind of orange) is employed in the making of perfumes, fetching from three to four dollars a pound.

Hitherto practically all of the orange oil and lemon oil has come from Italy, where the essences were obtained by hand-work, the labor being done by peasants in their hovels under most uncleanly conditions. Recently, however, a machine has been invented which does the work much more economically. It imitates the motion of the human fingers, gently manipulating the peels (after the fruit has been cut in halves and the pulp removed), and breaking the little cells that contain the oil. One lemon will yield about ten drops of the essence, and an orange about fifteen drops. As the oil exudes it is collected on sponges, which are squeezed from time to time into a basin placed beneath the machine.

The sponges are kept scrupulously clean, and no pains are spared to keep the product as free from impurities as possible. When filled the basins are emptied into large casks containing 200 gallons each, in which the stuff is allowed to settle. Finally it is drawn off, passed through filter paper, and packed for market in tin-lined copper jars, each holding twenty-five pounds.

"Well—the stone, of course, is worthless—a few dollars. But the setting is old and quite beautiful. It might bring a hundred or so from a collector if it hit his fancy and had an authentic history. If the stone were genuine, the ring would be worth about—five thousand, I should say, as a rough guess."

"Fortunately, I haven't bought it yet," she said carelessly. And she took it from him and put it—in her pocketbook. "The stone seems to have been undisturbed in that setting for a long time," she added as she closed the pocketbook.

"Oh, there's no telling as to that. It was manufactured by the newest process. It has been only two or three years, I believe, since they learned to put in the flaws so cleverly. They make them very well in New York now."

"Thank you so much, Mr. Macready," said Elsie. "You won't say anything about it, will you?"

"You needn't have asked that, Miss Pope," answered Macready with a reproachful smile.

"Thank you again," she said. It was not until she was driving away that her cheeks began to burn fiercely and the hot tears of shame and anger to scald her eyes.

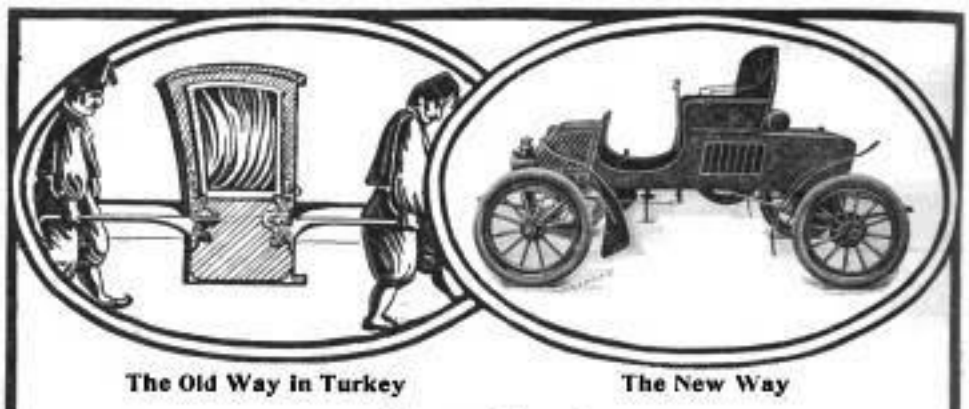
Where Everything Grows

ARRANGEMENTS are under way for the establishment of an international botanical garden in the Province of Benguet, near the west coast of Luzon. Here scientists of the Insular Bureau of Agriculture for the Philippine Islands have discovered what they claim to be the world's ideal spot for the propagation of the greatest variety of plants and trees.

Although Benguet is only one hundred and forty-three miles from Manila its climate is totally unlike that of the lower country. The site proposed for the great experimental garden lies in a high valley between summits of the Caraballo Range, many of whose peaks are seven thousand feet high. The mean annual temperature at Baguio, the capital of Benguet, is only sixty-two degrees. Even in August the maximum temperature does not exceed seventy-six degrees.

The soil of this high valley as well as the mountains is composed of volcanic clay of unknown depth. Experiments thus far made demonstrate that tropical, sub-tropical and temperate zone trees and flowers will flourish side by side. Acacias from Australia, California redwood, the cryptomerias of Japan, cedar of Lebanon, and deciduous trees like oak and sycamore, thrive there. Conditions are likewise favorable to the richest vegetation. Caladiums and dracænas, particularly valuable for their ornamental foliage, attain quick and satisfactory growth.



Although there is in the climate of Benguet nothing in common with the coast-line humidity of the islands, so favorable to tropical plant life and so trying to human beings, there is something about the mountain-rimmed valley that makes possible the successful propagation of the entire valuable flora of the archipelago.

Because of its freedom from every variety of fever the spot has been chosen as a site for a Government sanitarium.

A further matter which adds interest to Benguet is that the Philippine Government is planning to build a capitol there for the transaction of business during the hot season in Manila. Sites have already been procured for a number of the departments.

The Caraballo Mountains are covered with great forests of pine, cedar and molave. In these forests grows the rush, the pith of which is manufactured by the Chinese into wicks. Sarsaparilla and wild mulberry are also abundant in the forests. Through the province flows the Agno River. The landscape is said to resemble an American park.

The Government ethnologists have discovered that the Iggorotes have a curious legend that Benguet was in the beginning of the world a paradise set apart by the gods for good people, and that that dedication has through all time preserved the province against fevers that beset other parts of the archipelago.

8 Ever Blooming ROSES FREE

TO get you interested we will send you absolutely free, all charges prepaid, the following eight roses: They are not cheap, common roses; they are the choicest and most famous varieties. They are healthy, well-rooted plants; well packed, and we guarantee that they will reach you in perfect condition; accompanying each lot of plants there are full directions for planting, care, etc.

CLIMBING METEOR—It has been called perpetual blooming, climbing, General Jacqueminot. It is a free, persistent bloomer, and will make a growth of from 10 to 15 feet in a season; in bloom all the time. Its flowers, deep, rich red and are much larger than Meteor and are richer in color. It is just the rose to train up the veranda or around windows.

THE BRIDE—The largest white ever-blooming rose grown. The color is a delicate creamy white, very full flowers, measuring from 3½ to 4 inches in diameter.

DUCHESS DE BRABANT—This rose combines exquisite perfume, beautiful coloring and a matchless profusion of flowers and foliage. Soft, light rose, with heavy shading of amber and salmon.

BRIDESMAID—The bud is of exquisite shape and contour, so solid and firm, and stems are so long and stiff that no other rose will compare with it in keeping qualities after being cut. It is a bright pink, and is the same color all the time, under every condition of the weather and surroundings.

CLOTHILDE SOUPERT—It is a strong, vigorous grower. The flowers are large, double and beautiful in form, borne in sprays, and the color blends from a soft shell-pink to a pure satiny white.

THE UNIQUE ROSE, MME. FRANCESKA KRUGER—The striking color of this handsome rose places it at once in the front as a bud producer in the open air. In its shading of deep, coppery yellow it stands unique and distinct from all others. The flower, when open, is of good size and very symmetrical. One of the finest roses to plant in masses and clumps.

SAFRANO—Bright apricot-yellow, changing to orange and fawn, sometimes tinted with rose; valued highly for its beautiful buds; fragrant and a rampant grower.

MARIE VAN HOUTTE—Pale yellow, edge of petals often lined with rose, well formed, of good habit, and in every respect a most charming sort. The finest Tea Rose for outdoor culture.

The Winton

No shock or bump, no vibration or jar, the greatest luxury of automobile travel. The new 1903 model Winton has a 20 horse-power, double cylinder motor which can make you shoot over the roads or will let you "just crawl along," according to the pressure put upon the spring governor button, which is conveniently placed beneath the right foot. It is so simple to operate, yet as sensitive and effective as the throttle control of a railroad locomotive.

The Winton double cylinder motor, of the opposed type, has behind it an unparalleled success, demonstrating beyond cavil the correctness of the principles on which it was designed. The 1902 car, with its 15 horse-power motor, is the foundation of our present model, which has fulfilled our most sanguine expectations. The intensely gratifying results shown by this new model give added strength to our position as leaders in the world's automobile-building industry.

Price of the 20 horse-power 1903 Winton Touring Car, including detachable tonneau, two full brass side lamps, tools, etc., $2500. Visit any of our branch or agency depots and the many features of Winton excellence will be fully demonstrated.

A CITY WITHOUT GRAFT

By Thomas G. Hayes, Mayor of Baltimore

MORE than two years ago, in an article in this magazine, I told something of the efforts to put the city of Baltimore on a business basis, and in it I offered to send to any one requesting it a copy of our new city charter which I believed to be, and which I still believe to be, the most perfect instrument of its kind ever devised. I expected no such results as those which followed. A large edition of the charter was exhausted in a short time and I was obliged to have another one printed. Requests came from practically every city on this continent and from many of the municipalities of the Old World. Although more than two years have elapsed I receive daily letters about this charter and different provisions of it, until the correspondence amounts to between five hundred and a thousand letters a year, showing the widespread interest in municipal government throughout the world.

I am aware that what I said about putting a city absolutely on a business basis was received with incredulity. Something of performance had then been accomplished, but necessarily much of promise had to be made. Now, in the closing weeks of four years' experience, I am prepared to support my pledges and to state as an absolute fact that the affairs of Baltimore City are conducted on as rigid business lines as any corporation in the world. We have banished graft and grafters from the city government, and we have made commissions and rake-offs and lobbying impossible. I am told that Baltimore is the only city which can boast of these conditions; and that is the reason why this article is desired.

The story is simple though interesting. Previous to the formation of the charter commission, upon which I was appointed, I had been for many years a law officer of the city. I had, moreover, been in cases in which city officers were charged with accepting bribes. This experience gave me an intimate insight into all the ramifications of graft, and when the problem of providing the city with a charter that should make honest government inevitable came up for solution, I approached it with a constant recollection of the evils which I had seen.

Two considerations, therefore, became vital. The first of these was met by the formation of a Board of Awards, which took from the different departments the control of all contracts and the purchase of all material, and which provided for actual competition by making the conditions and specifications for all bids as broad and open as possible. This board was composed of the Mayor, the City Registrar, the City Comptroller, the City Solicitor and the President of the second branch of the City Council. In other words, the board was representative of the people and of the executive power, and at the same time of the broader business knowledge and necessities of a corporation.

The Problem of Franchises

THE second vital provision was the Board of Estimates, consisting also of five members, including the Mayor, Comptroller and President of the second branch of the City Council, all of whom are elected by the direct vote of the people, and the other two members being the City Solicitor—a lawyer of experience—and the City Engineer, who had, preceding his appointment, been for five years engaged in his profession and had responsible charge of important work. This board dealt with the public franchises and with the interests which had hitherto been sources of corruption in municipal legislation and administration. The peculiar power of this Board of Estimates is that it takes away from the City Council the right to make indiscriminate appropriations or to vote away franchises. It provides a maximum amount that the City Council may appropriate. The City Council may reduce its figures if it chooses, but it cannot add a penny to the budget; it cannot appropriate money to pay any private claim against the city without the consent of this board; it cannot bestow any grant or privilege to use the streets or other public property except on the terms and conditions imposed by this board. It will be seen at once that the Board of Estimates stands as an impregnable barrier between the city and any corruption or extravagance of the municipal legislature.

MAYOR THOMAS G. HAYES, OF BALTIMORE

With these two vital functions secured, the work of rescuing the city from its evils was greatly simplified.

When I drew up the charter I had no idea that I should ever be Mayor of Baltimore and I finally accepted the nomination of my party at a sacrifice. But I have never regretted this nor the hard work which the position has entailed. Baltimore, in comparison with other cities, was poor. It had endured many years of bad administration; the system under which it was working admitted of corruption in many forms. One of the worst was the neglect of the sinking funds and the resort to temporary loans in emergencies, these loans reaching at times three and four millions of dollars a year with interest charges approaching two hundred thousand dollars annually. In the five years preceding my administration the interest on these temporary loans exceeded a half a million dollars. In the past four years, with but one exception, there has been no temporary loan whatever, but, on the other hand, we have received more than a hundred thousand dollars of interest revenue from our deposits in the banks.

Good Men for High Offices

THIS, however, was not the most important improvement. The great work was to get men of high character and efficiency at the head of the city departments. I can best illustrate this point by my experience with the City Engineer under whose direction the improvements and the more important work of the city are carried on.

I went to the head of one of the great railroad systems, a man whom I have known for a great many years and who is a Republican—whereas I am a Democrat—and I told him that I wanted an engineer who could combine three qualities: absolute integrity, the best practical experience and mastership in his profession. He asked me how much the salary was and I told him four thousand dollars a year. He replied that he did not think I could find my man for that pay, but he would do his best to help me. In the mean time a friend suggested an engineer on a rival railroad system. I went to the first gentleman and asked his opinion. He said he would inquire and let me know. He made the inquiry and called to say that if I could get the engineer in question I should be most fortunate; that he was a thoroughly good man. The offer was duly made and to my great joy was accepted. The engineer knew nothing of politics and he probably knows little to-day, but his conduct of the office has been so admirable that the whole city recognizes his work. He has, in my judgment, done more in four years than was done before in his office during the previous quarter of a century, and he has fixed the lines of progress so splendidly that his work cannot be undone. With all of this he has reduced expenses almost one-half. This instance is one of several. I found the leading citizens not only willing but eager to aid and coöperate with me: many of them made large sacrifices for the public good. Our new School Board attracted the service, without remuneration, of such men as President Daniel C. Gilman, of Johns Hopkins University, and his successor, President Ira Remsen, and this board has reorganized our system, given to teachers more pay, and has provided more schoolhouses without increasing the total expense. When I wanted an expert commission to decide upon the best site for a hospital for infectious diseases such an eminent man as Dr. William H. Welch, who, I believe, is considered one of the greatest pathologists in the world, was willing to give his time to the city, and associated with him were some of the busiest and best physicians of Baltimore. We wanted more public baths and for that commission I secured some of the very best of our citizens, including, as president, Mr. Eugene Levering, who at one time was the Prohibition candidate for President. The result is that we have to-day the most comprehensive and practical construction and operation of bathhouses that can be found in the United States, this being the verdict of the Committee on Public Baths for Cleveland, which investigated the conditions throughout the country.

And so it has gone, until we have obtained on the personnel of the city government our present high average of character and intelligence.

A Defeat for the Boodlers

THE supreme test of the new conditions came in the spring of 1902. The Western Maryland Railroad had been largely aided by the city from year to year and the indebtedness had grown until it reached more than twelve millions of dollars. The ownership practically rested in the city. The road had in it great value to private capital; for years the purchase of it had been attempted, but in ways and on terms that were notoriously bad and inadequate. It was recognized by the interests that sought to obtain control that they would have to spend a great deal of money illegitimately; it was openly stated that the City Council would have to be bought before the road could be bought. Moreover, there were large commissions which must be paid the political powers. In the end the purchaser would probably have had to pay something approaching the real value of the property, but the city would never have received all of the money. I advised the sale from the first, and when finally we got down to business, after a contest of over three months, the competition brought forth three active and responsible bidders. The main question involved not only the great amount of money to be paid but the future effect of the purchase upon the trade of Baltimore. The fight was one of great intensity and some bitterness; there were attempts or rumors of attempts to employ money in the old way, but the threat was made that if these things were persisted in somebody would go to the penitentiary, and that had a restraining influence upon bribers and bribe takers. Through this campaign we held rigidly to our position, and in the end the sale was made in such a way as to give the city of Baltimore a competitive trunk line, and to place in the treasury every penny of the money paid over, the sum being $8,751,370.45. When the transaction was closed the representative of the controlling interest called upon me and said: "Mr. Hayes, this could not have been done in any other city in the United States."

A few months ago I attended the national meeting of an association of men who deal in municipal supplies. They came to me and said that they had found out how to do business with Baltimore, and that was to offer direct to the city their standard goods at the lowest figure—and the whole thing seemed to them almost an impossible case. Here were practical men selling their wares, amounting to many millions of dollars a year, to American cities, and privately admitting that there was only one city in which they did not have to resort to other than business methods in order to get contracts!

It must not be inferred from what I have said that all these results have come peacefully. The four years have had more than their share of turbulence. There have been many harsh words and numerous strained relations between the City Council and the Mayor, and those who clamored for special local improvements or wanted profuse pledges to their constituents fulfilled by appropriations have found the situation anything but pleasant. Furthermore and especially, the political bosses have come to regard the Mayor with an intensely bitter hatred. They have fought putting the city on a business basis from the very start, and they have not enjoyed their defeats. Personally I do not wonder that they hate me as they say they do; they would not be entirely human if they did not. Under the old methods the political bosses had to be seen before anybody could do business with the city; now they do not have to be seen at all. Their incomes from a very profitable source have been cut off, their brokerage on offices and on city supplies has been stopped; they cannot even collect campaign assessments from the city employees. They wield no more power in the city hall than any other citizen and not nearly so much as representative business men. I am not one to denounce the politicians as lacking either force or ability. They must be men of exceptional qualities or they would not be able to rule men. As a matter of fact they are great students of human nature. If there is any way to get at a man they find it out, and they do not hesitate to bulldoze or threaten or cajole him. It is part of their trade and I do not wonder that they so often succeed. In the present case they have simply failed, which leads me to say that with the best charter and the best intentions the mayor of any city must have good backbone if he expects to do his duty by the whole people and to carry forward a clean administration.

What we have done in Baltimore, therefore, in four years is the getting of honesty into all of the affairs of the city. It has been a hard task, but it has been done. Now that we have accomplished this, the larger things in the way of public improvement can be faced with the probability that the work will be done without a large percentage of the cost going into wrong pockets. I believe that it has been very carefully estimated that on the average about twenty-five per cent. of the expenditures of an American city for public improvements had been extravagantly or corruptly deviated.

In Baltimore we are about to enter upon the installation of a great sewerage system, of the building of more schoolhouses, and of other public improvements which will give the city the best equipment that skill and money can provide. The gratification is that with the honest methods which are now in vogue the work will be done without serious losses to the taxpayers—always, of course, provided that a firm man is in the Mayor's chair and is surrounded by good men who will do their duty singly for the public good.

A Trolley Magnate's Career

A FEW months ago there gathered, at the home of a Philadelphian, the most remarkable dinner-party, in point of wealth and financial influence, that ever met around one board. Hundreds of millions of dollars were actually owned by the men who ate salt and broke bread together, and billions of dollars were under their active control. From various cities they came, and special trains were run, and over hundreds of miles of track men kept sleepless watch and ward in order that nothing should happen to those money kings.

It was a veritable palace in which the party met; an immense mansion of two hundred rooms, surrounded by sunken courts in Italian style. The mansion is fronted by a row of mighty pillars, and stretches off on either side in stately wings. Paintings and rugs of fabulous value, marbles and bronzes, the sheen of gold and silver and the sparkle of priceless glass—all these things made a splendid setting for those men of money.

"Advance!" In that word lies the secret of the success of the host of the evening. The man who owns this splendid home, thus magnificently furnished, rose from humble parentage, and from a humble position in a little store. His life motto has been the word "Advance." Eastern fables tell of genii who confer unbounded wealth on those of lowly station; but Peter A. B. Widener was his own genius.

A man well groomed he is, but with a tendency to neckties red of hue; a man earnest-faced, with frankly steady eyes, with ears oddly bent at the tips, with short nose, thickish and a trifle broad. He is growing bald, his thin hair is streaked with gray, and grayish too is his thick mustache. Clearly a man of ability, of attractive personality, this. Of almost restless and nervous manner—wont to pace slowly about his desk from time to time as he talks—such is Mr. Widener.

It is his firm belief that "if you do a thing for yourself, you do it for the community," and this belief, thus succinctly expressed, he loves to propound as giving his views of the worthiness of success.

For years it seemed as if he were destined to make but an ordinary success of life, but during the Civil War opportunity came knocking at his door. The chance to fill an army contract presented itself and he seized the chance. He filled the contract to the complete satisfaction of the authorities, and cleared what to him at that time was a fortune.

He is gifted with a curious faculty for figures—an instinctive sense which even now at board meetings enables him to seize on the one vital item out of a hundred, and by means of which he can work out financial problems with ease. He discovered within himself the possession of this faculty, and decided that he might as well use it in a broad field as in a narrow one, and so he quietly began to make ventures and to invest his money to advantage. Quiet, taciturn, but with a curiously winning manner, he developed a marked faculty for the management of men, and in 1873 became city treasurer.

It was when he was over forty years of age, when he was well past the time at which most men have either succeeded or failed in their chosen lines, that he began the work of his life, the career of a street railway man. It was in the days of horse cars, and of innumerable separate companies, but Mr. Widener saw that there would be something better than horse power before many years, and even then, too, he foresaw something of the wonderful expansion, the stretching out from town to town, that was to come. Little by little, under his guidance, all of the lines of Philadelphia were brought under one control; and from this Mr. Widener has reached out until, in many parts of the country, his influence is felt as that of a main factor in trolley-line ownership and management.

"Has there ever been anything better for Philadelphia than the development of its trolley system?" he says, looking straight at you, frank-eyed, as he pauses in his slow walk beside his desk. "And are not the trolleys accomplishing wonders throughout the country in developing and uniting sections that have been dormant and out of connection with one another?"

A few years ago he gave to the city, for library purposes, his home in Broad Street, filled with books and paintings, and went a few miles away to the mansion where recently he gave his amazing dinner-party. Saddened a few years ago by the sudden death of his wife, and knowing she had felt a curious sympathy with crippled and invalid little ones, on account of a child of theirs who had died in infancy, he gave two million dollars for the founding of a home for cripples.

The Pocket Post-Office

BY HENRY A. CASTLE

Auditor for the Post-Office Department

A CHANGE THAT WILL DO AWAY WITH THE FORMAL, TEDIOUS, EXPENSIVE MONEY-ORDER SERVICE, AND TRANSFORM A BANK-NOTE INTO A DRAFT

FIFTY MILLION postal money orders will be issued in the United States during the current fiscal year. This is now the safest form of making small remittances by mail—infinitely preferable to the use of postage stamps, coin or currency, though these are no doubt used for that purpose ten times where money orders are used once. As these postal orders average in amount less than eight dollars, a conservative estimate would fix thirty million as the number calling for less than two dollars and a half each; many are for less than one dollar. Assuming that the purchasers of these thirty million small postal orders have spent an average of half an hour in going to the post-office, writing the applications, waiting while the money orders are filled out, signed and paid for, and then returned to their starting point; and assuming that ten hours a day for three hundred days per annum constitutes the full working-year of an individual, the time consumed equals the labor of five thousand men for one year. Here is an absolute waste of the productive energies of five thousand people per annum, squandered in the unproductive, unnecessary effort required to merely get possession of a piece of paper available for making safe remittance of a small sum through the mail. All this useless expenditure of time would be saved if each of these persons could have drawn from his pocket a post-check bill ready to be filled up with the name of the payee, made valid by affixing a two-cent postage stamp and canceling the same, and then safely intrusted to the prompt and careful hands of the employees of the postal service.

The loss of time in going to post-offices to get the money for the orders is less noticeable and less serious, because they are often collected in large bunches, even run through the clearing-houses of many cities and handled generally in a more businesslike manner. All this trouble caused in buying and collecting can be cheerfully undertaken when the amount to be remitted is fifty or one hundred dollars—the latter being the maximum amount allowed by law. But when the amount involved is less than five dollars the need of a simpler form of note has become painfully manifest.

To supply this need a plan is embodied in a bill which has received favorable consideration by the Congressional postal committees, and has been reintroduced with this prestige in the present session. This bill provides that all one, two and five dollar notes printed in future shall contain certain blank spaces, but will pass from hand to hand like other Government currency until they come into the possession of some one desiring to send money through the mail. Then the blank spaces are filled with the name of the payee and his address, and a two-cent stamp is placed in a space provided on the bill especially for that purpose. The bill is by this simple, inexpensive process transformed into a check, with many of the safeguards and few of the complications of the present postal money order. The scheme would not in any manner change our financial system—it would merely change the form of small notes.

How the New Law Will Work

UNDER the proposed law the process of redemption, cancelation and reissue would be simple. The post-checks are to be paid at any money-order post-office, where they will at once be canceled and withdrawn from circulation. They will then go forward as "mutilated currency" to the United States Treasury for destruction and reissue. By a suggested amendment they can go directly to the Treasury through the banks of the country. The objection urged that the post-check operations would lead to confusion in adjustment of functions between the Post-Office Department and the Treasury Department is not admitted by friends of the measure. If paid post-checks can be treated as mutilated currency there can be no conflict. Ample provision is now made for depositing surplus postal and money-order funds in banks and in the Treasury. A bureau of the Treasury Department in charge of the Auditor for the Post Office Department, with nearly six hundred employees, now handles, and audits the accounts involved in handling, about fifty million money-order vouchers annually. No confusion arises from that connection between the two Departments. It is certain that a practicable post-check system would simplify matters.

Moreover, it is believed that in practice the Post-Office Department would have comparatively little connection with the scheme. Probably ninety per cent. of the checks would flow from country districts in the smaller towns to business firms in large cities. They would be received on deposit by national banks from their customers as money orders and other forms of checks and drafts now are; they would be forwarded by the banks to the Subtreasuries for redemption and reissue without passing into the hands of any postmaster. This process is contemplated by the law, and its legitimacy is self-evident. The Government is already furnishing currency through the Treasury Department and conducting exchanges through the Post-Office Department. The post-check system proposes to supply currency which can be easily converted into bills of exchange. Naturally and logically the Treasury Department should conduct exchanges, if they are to be conducted at all, as a public function.

Treasury experts object to this innovation on the ground that additional labor will be thrown on the Department (where, if anywhere, it belongs) by mistakes of remitters in filling blanks and indorsers in signing their names. But this objection is trivial. People unfamiliar with the technicalities of business will make mistakes in filling out checks. Shall we therefore discontinue the whole system of making checks on banks? Why not, it is asked, let the man who owns a certificate of deposit in the United States Treasury (as every silver certificate is) check against his deposit with the safety of a check on a bank? A business house mailing five hundred bank checks per annum loses an average of less than one in three years. The facts are, the losses are so few and the percentage so small that they may be disregarded in considering the general plan.

A practicable postal-check system would be a great benefit to farmers, business men and publishers; women would appreciate its convenience. Business houses now receive large quantities of postage stamps through the mails. One Chicago publisher reports the receipt of $350,000 in stamps in one year, nearly $1000 a day. Others have the same experience on a smaller scale. With post-check money this nuisance is avoided; a convenient, safe and instantly available form of money is supplied with which the public can safely transact mail business which is now said to aggregate in small sums $2,000,000,000 a year. The revenue from postage stamps affixed would pay all expenses of the system.

The boon of a cleaner paper currency of the smaller denominations is one of the incidental advantages which the people, especially in the West, would have reason to hope from the post-check plan. The constant flow of canceled bills to the Treasury and their redemption with new, clean currency would ensure a much better average condition of the circulating medium, which is now, in too many cases, dirty, ragged, utterly disreputable and perhaps infected.

While the public would thus be benefited in many ways by this innovation, the interests of the postmasters at the smaller offices would be amply protected. These hard-worked and under-paid officials now receive three cents for each postal money order when issued by them, and although that is, in the case of orders for $2.50 or less, the entire amount of the fee exacted by the Government, it is confessedly unremunerative for the labor involved in writing out the order and duplicate, transmitting the "advice," making up the reports required and remitting the proceeds. The proposed law provides that postmasters of these classes shall receive credit for "cancellations" of stamps on all post-checks paid by them, and such other provisions for their benefit can be made as the operation of the new system may show to be equitable. In the end they would gain in revenues and be relieved of much hard, unremunerated work.

But the loss of time to the people in procuring and then in collecting these thirty million small money orders, and to small post-offices in making them out, is not the only defective element in the present system. There is a corresponding loss of Government time—which costs money—that is little appreciated.

Sixty million manipulations yearly are performed by the Post-Office Department, ninety million manipulations are performed in the office of the Auditor for the Post-Office Department—which is a branch of the Treasury—and sixty million auditing operations in the same office on thirty million small postal money orders, not one of which has paid a cent of revenue to the Department to compensate for this vexatious and expensive labor.

The necessity for all these audits and manipulations arises from the fact that a postal money order is a voucher and must be treated as such, with as much care and scrutiny in the accounting office as if it involved hundreds or thousands of dollars. There is no possible way of simplifying or avoiding these processes if correct accounting by the auditor's office is to be had with the thirty-four thousand postmasters who issue and pay these orders. All necessity for this auditing and for these scrutinies would be avoided by the post-check proposition, which treats a paid and canceled order as mutilated currency and not as a voucher, a thing impossible to be done under the money-order system, or any possible scheme of postal notes issued and paid by postmasters.

The total financial transactions of the postal service for the current fiscal year will exceed $1,000,000,000. All these transactions must be examined and accounted, in detail, in the office of the Auditor for the Post-Office Department, whether they involve a million dollars to a railroad company for carrying the mail or a two-dollar money order. The business has increased seventy per cent. during the past five years, and bids fair to increase still more rapidly in the immediate future. A practical suggestion which will relieve this work of some of its unprofitable and embarrassing features would naturally be welcomed by all who comprehend the magnitude of the interests involved and their importance to the public service.

The Seizure of the Scotia Mill

BY ARTHUR E. McFARLANE

COME now, come now, come now!" Egan, Schunk's lawyer, tried to give his old hatred of "Big Rory" its most softly infuriating expression by speaking to him as if he were a great child in a rage. "There's no necessity for any bullying, you know, no necessity whatever. And, as we've told you several times already, you'd be much wiser to get a legal adviser."

Schunk sat stolidly beside him. The clean-shaven purpleness of his suety chops, his city grooming, and the sleekly fitting tweeds which covered the fat coarseness of his person contrasted curiously with the lank and shaggy looseness of the gigantic lumberman. And he contemplated the blaze of his blue-steel eyes with much wonder and contempt. "Why, it's a straight matter of business, you know, Mr. MacKenzie," he said. "There's no use you talkin' as if I had somethin' again' you."

"Big Rory" had fiercely stretched his great freckled hand—red-bristled as a Tamworth's back—along the cornice of the filing-cabinet he towered beside. Now he flung his arm free in a Celtic explosion. "A strecht matter o' beezness and nawthin' again' me! Ye've got yere fingers a-grip o' my thrapple, if that's nawthin' again' me! Ye're tellin' me that if I dinna get ye yere money ye'll seize the Scotia, and will gie me no time to get ye money—if that's a strecht matter o' beezness!"

Egan smiled with all pleasantness. "You were to make Mr. Schunk his payments in cash. For the first and second he has been content to accept mortgages on the mill and machinery. But I think that hardly delivers you from meeting the subsequent notes. I am assuming that you took over his pine land with the intention of paying for it in full."

Rory struck the cabinet rabidly. "But when I saddled mysel' wi' that Red Lake stumpage did I ken that in three months McMahon Brothers would be ga'en to the wall? Or that for my whole August and September sawin'—eight million feet an' mair—Garbut & Hall would noo be aflerin' me twenty cents on the dollar? And wha' can any lumber mull do tae help hersel' sax weeks before navigation opens, and in this weather?" He looked desperately out over the "Harbor" ice flows and the slaty gray sweep of Lake Huron beyond them. "Ye maun bide for yere money till the logs come doon again. Till then I sit hand-tied."

He had continued to speak only to Schunk; but again it was the Portage lawyer who replied. And his sneeringly lean face was still all affability and good nature. "Possibly so, my friend, possibly so. But I've always noticed that if you want to make a man produce money you—just have to put him in a place where he swears he can't get any. Isn't that right, Mr. Schunk?"

"I guess that's right!" And the Detroit man blinked his little, shifty, pig eyes and laughed heavily.

"Big Rory" gasped at it. "And ye laugh, mon! Ye laugh! It's the buildin' up o' thirty year ye'll be takin' frae me, and ye smile and sneeker and cleek——!"

Egan snapped him off as by the twitch of an electric button. "Well, you have a month yet before we apply for judgment. And you can get your backing by wire in an hour—if you're good for it!"

The innuendo was enough. "And I am guid for it, blame ye. I am guid for it! And I'll get it for ye, if for naught else but to choke yere dirty gullets wi' it!"

As he got himself into the street the crash of the outer door followed the lock-starting smash of the inner one, and they both laughed again.

"Will he get it?" asked Schunk.

"I don't know. It's just possible. It's a chance you've got to take."

The same night Rory left for Saginaw and Bay City.

That was the worst of the "hard-time years"—and it was never anything but "hard-time years" with those who go out to borrow large sums of money on personal security. If "Big Rory" had taken it for granted that having once brought himself to hold out the beggars' tincup, the humiliation of its filling was a foregone conclusion, he was given a bitter disillusionment.

His first morning in Saginaw left him in a hot daze. And this, after his second day in Bay City, had turned to a burning headache. He hardly knew that it was physical; it seemed a part of the sick shame of his mendicancy. He went on to Detroit, thence over to Muskegon, and up to Manistee and Traverse City. His head had gradually become a molten anguish. He did not sleep, and the green gall he was hourly swallowing drove away all hunger. He had circled Michigan, but he did not know when or how he had caught his trains.

By the middle of the second week his heart had dropped out of him, and he crossed over to Canada—to Windsor—to see his brother Sanders. Sanders had been the timid one, the son who "got on terrible slow"—and Rory had never helped him with a dollar. Nor indeed did the big man acknowledge to himself that he intended to ask him for money now. He went to him only in that mysterious drawing toward kin which comes to many in time of trouble. And other than this younger brother, kin he had none.

Sanders heard him through that night without speaking; and he had made him no answer when he went out next morning. But he came back with a loan company's check for $3500. He had mortgaged his house and garden-lot for every cent they would carry. And this drove the ax through the barky roughness of Rory's heart more than all previous refusals and unkindness.

"Na! Na! Na!" he cried, his voice blaring out like a woman's. "I'd never think o' takkin' it! And indeed noo, Sanders, mon, ye hae misoonderstood me." He was sore shaken. "I did na come to ye by way of askin', ava! I had no sic idea, whatefler! I but thocht ye micht wish to hear it frae me direct and personal, as ye micht say. But ye hae taught me. Gin you can do this for me, I can go and beg, even to they at the Harbor. I see weel that afore I get on my feet I maun get on my knees! But ainee I do get on my knees, Sanders, mon, ye'll find me a better brither!"

He went back to Portage that night. And, on the same train, Schunk returned from Detroit. But they did not see each other until Rory went to Egan's office next morning.

Digitized by Google

He found lawyer and client sitting almost as he had left them a fortnight before. And he spoke to his creditor with the blunt directness of the despairing. "Weel, I hae no money for ye! If openin' my veins could hae got it, ye'd hae had it. But there's nae a stiver ga'en noo. And I ask ye again for mair time."

Egan cleared his throat. But "Big Rory's" words rushed on appealingly again, and as always he spoke only to Schunk. "Ye see, ye dinna oonderstan'. Ye think I'm but fendin' aff the evil day. But that's nae so, nae so, ava! If I canna coin siller oot o' the snaw-drifts for ye, gie me only till spring, and wi' the comin' doon o' the April drives the lumber'll be pilin' up on the wharves for ye like new-mintit gold. And, mon, it's worth yere bidin' only tae see the Scotia under full pooer! Sic band and gang work—sic re-sawin'! Losh, she'll rup through her hoonderd and fufty thoosan' feet a day, and fair yammer and drie for mair! And to tell ye true, too"—he spread his hands in a kind of fiercely smiling, coaxing confidence—"it's a matter of mickle mair than that wi' me. I hae the best o' my years—nane o' the wastin' folly o' youth—but all my workin' life in her. She's wife and bairns and coontra and recht hand to me! Ye maun juist gie me mair time to clear her, noo—sax weeks or twa months—three at maist!" He was standing now, and his big silver ring began to give out a curious clicking where he gripped the desk. "Mon, I hae tried tae think o' mysel' wi'oot her, but it's as ye micht say imposseeble. Cut us a-twain and I'd fair bleed to death!"

Schunk fidgeted with the paper-knife and frowned angrily. He was stock-market trained, and such men as he had hitherto seen go into bankruptcy had learned to accept the fate in the upper man without any unpleasant dramatics. He again shifted the business of replying to the lawyer's shoulders.

And Egan was good for it. "Oh, pshaw now, Mr. MacKenzie," he said with a laugh, "there's really no sense in your going on in that strain. Mr. Schunk isn't a woman, to be worked by pulling out the pitiful stop."

Under all his red hairiness, "Big Rory" turned whiter and whiter. "Pulling out the pitiful!" And with one grip and twist he could break the grinning little lawyer's skinny spine across the back of his swivel chair. "Pulling out——" "Noo, Heaven keep ye!" he said in a dry whisper, "for ye sure dinna ken hoo near death ye are the noo."

He turned and looked at Schunk for a long time in a kind of numb stupor. He seemed to have lost the capacity for rage. "Then ye go on for joodgment and an execution?"

"Why, you had that understanding before you went away," he answered testily.

When Rory spoke again it was in a queer, flat voice. "Ye tell me to get money, but ye wull na gie me the time ye ken weel is necessar' to get it."

"You've got two weeks more yet."

"Ye wull na gie me time," said Rory. "Ye wull na gie me time. And tell me, why wull ye na?" Now his voice began to rise in a searching interrogation.

Neither man replied. Schunk continued to frown, and Egan a second time laughed contemptuously.

Rory spoke again, never taking his eyes from his creditor's face. "Ye tell me that ye wull attach the Scotia if I canna pay ye, yet ye feex it so that pay ye I canna." And then suddenly a gaping light of comprehension began to take life upon his face. "Ah-h-h-h! Ah-h-h! Is it I who has na been oonderstandin'? Mayhap it's not my money ye're wantin' ava, but it's the Scotia hersel'?" Once more his ring began to click on the edge of the desk, and now the trembling seemed to run all through him, and take him at the throat like a chill. "It's the Scotia hersel'?"

Once more he received no answer, but confirmation was written plainly enough in the flaming fire of Schunk's twitching countenance. "Lord! Lord! So, along wi' gettin' back yere pine land ye've schemed to get the best saw-mull along the North Channel. And ye'd hae the sheriff's hammer mark the Scotia to get her the cheaper? Do ye deny it? Do ye? Do ye? And I, Rory MacKenzie, hae fleeched to ye for her, like a coupit lassie ower her love bairn!" He flung out his arms like an infuriately prophesying druid. "Noo, alane and friendless as I stand, I tell ye ye'll never hae her! I dinna ken wha' to do, or where to turn, but I'll beat ye yet, I wull!"

He got himself out of the office, quivering and choking in his huge rage. And ten minutes later he passed under their window going toward the mill with a pair of great gray Halifax blankets over his shoulder.

"Gad," grinned Egan, "it looks as if he was going to sleep on it like a dog on a bone!"

Schunk crossed the room to the cuspidor. "Say," he said, "Portage Harbor is all right in some ways. It's a good place to own a mill in, but you've got people here that don't belong in this century!"

"Big Rory" slept in his mill that night. Nor did he come out the next day, nor the next, nor the next. And old Wallie Kempesson, the Scotia's engineer, who was now stolidly getting his driving and sawing gear into shape for next month's opening, was known to be bringing food in to him. But the report was that he would eat nothing.

And then rage blazed in Portage Harbor. Egan had played "black dog" time and again before; but this last was Judas business. As for Schunk, upon him fell all the loathing of the successful carpet-bagger. Young Leslie, the last Ann Arbor man to take hold of the Portage Sawyer, put the fury for justice of a graduating Junius into his long paragraphs of nonpareil, and a dozen times a day he was told "to lace the scoundrels harder." A general subscription was proposed, and the hiring of outside legal help. But those who really knew Rory's pride and temper had sorrowfully to stop such movements in their useless beginnings. The mayor, a nervous, anxious-eyed man, whom the hard times had driven to a perpetual rubbing of his hands, went to Schunk and virtually offered to give Rory's credit the backing of the municipality. And he was virtually told to mind his own business. In the helplessness of the town lay its worst exasperation.

But if Portage had to stand powerlessly inactive, there was another force which assuredly did not! When the word went back to the MacKenzie shanties that "Big Rory" had been attacked in his own stronghold and capital, the very Scotia herself, such a roar of wondering wrath went up as had never before echoed from Red Lake to the North Channel. Was it for this, then, that they had made the name of "Rory's men" terrible to all the numbers of the encroaching Consolidated Company, and had driven the whole chopping force of the united Hastings & Stevens combination from the "disputed territory," spite of all court injunctions and sheriff's deputies? Now a sheriff was to enter the Scotia! Well, by the red beard of "the ald man himsel'," if he did, it would be to go up the jack-ladders and through the saws!

And in no MacKenzie shanty was any more work done that March. Choppers, teamsters, cooks and carpenters grasped axes and cant-hooks and streamed down to the "Harbor," bristlingly unshorn as a drove of Highland cattle, and red-eyed for battle. They sent in word to Rory that they were there when he wanted them. Then they proceeded to fill hotels and boarding-houses with riot, and swept the streets till midnight chanting the song that "Crooky" O'Neil had made for them in the time of that great feud with the "Consolidated":

"We're Rory's men, Rory's men, Rory, Rory, Rory's men!
If you're lookin' for scrappin'
Come out an' say when, come out an' say when!
Blunt from the knuckles or hard from the heft—
However you have it, you'll know us again,
Know us again, know us again!"

And Portage Harbor, if civically a little nervous, rejoiced with all the secret lawlessness of the individual: if Schunk did get the Scotia he would have to pay heavy interest on it. And there was hope, too, that this time Egan would get much more than fee and retainer.

As regarded the latter worthy, he delighted in the situation! Once more he had brought down on himself the bellowing furies of the many-headed; and the Mephistopheles in him chuckled over it as with the relish of the most excellent comedy. And if the shanty challenges and insults jeered at the fat Detroit man from every street corner greatly angered him he did not show it. But on the other hand, that Rory should act as he was doing seemed to have a strange potency to gall and rag his nerves through all his heaviness. While MacKenzie still clung to the mill he would not leave the business to the lawyer. And he spent most of his time walking Egan's office and throwing away half-smoked cigars.

"D——n him!" he broke out at last. "Do I imagine he's soakin' things with kerosene, or makin' ready to dangle himself off from a cross-beam? I don't know what he's doin,' but I know I got fifty thousand to lose on this game, and I've made up my mind to go in there and see!"

And, as it happened, next morning he had his opportunity. Rory had gone out before sunrise and taken the Up-shore train. At noon, Egan and Schunk slipped quietly down a side street, found that the wicket of the big sliding mill gate was open, and were soon climbing through the silent Scotia. But they found neither kerosene nor halters, nor indeed any evidence of life whatever, until they entered the boiler-room. There two long rows of brass valves and "feeds" were lying, dripping yellow oil upon a tow-covered work-table. And, on a ladder in the shadow, old Kempesson was taking off a lubricator. He gave a sudden hunch as his eye caught their reflections in a gauge glass. But he paid no further heed.

"Gettin' things in shape?" asked Schunk clumsily.

The old man grunted, but made no answer.

"I hope you'll be staying with us, Kempesson," said Egan.

"Ye—hope—scha'!"

"I remarked that, if changes should occur, we should be very glad to have you stay with the mill."

He turned around once, and focused them with a full, red, headlight glare. "I hae no eentention o' lea'in' the mull whateffer!"

"Well, then," said Schunk, "if MacKenzie should be givin' up the Scotia——"

"Nor I hinna heerd that Rory MacKenzie has onny eentention o' givin' up the Scotia, neither!"

Egan crowed. "Say, you're all right, Kempesson. You're the best thing yet! But I'm afraid, though, you're a trifle elderly to learn new tricks. I'm afraid you're of the age that isn't wide open to argument!"

"He's of the age that'll be chasin' a new job by the end o' next week," said Schunk savagely. "The old fool! For two shakes I'd pitch him out now!"

They left the mill, having got nothing from their investigation. And a crowd of lumber-jacks followed in their wake uptown, explaining, not altogether soberly, what they intended to do to them when Rory gave the word. And Portage Harbor, crowding the sidewalks in the after-dinner hour, further expressed its intention of giving "Rory's men," if not actual assistance, at least the very freest hand.

But Sheriff Silverthorn could not look at it in that way. He had been MacKenzie's friend for a dozen years, and, at the thought of what was ahead, his office was his misery. Yet, for all that, it was his business to protect the town's good name; and every day brought in not only more of Rory's men, but uglier rumors of the resistance in preparation. That night—it was a Saturday—MacKenzie came back again, and once more silently buried himself in the Scotia. On Monday morning the little sheriff went down to the mill and had it out with him.

"Rory," he said, "if I've got somethin' to do here this week it'll be the toughest job I've ever had to do in my life, and I want you to help me get through it without no bloodshed. You know your lads are comin' in from everywhere. There's a hundred and fifty here now; and there's a story goin' that Cap Blackman's goin' to bring down your Robbie Burns and a crowd from Point aux Pins, and the Achilles may come in with another tug-load from Anchor Inlet, if the ice opens enough. Now you know what that means, Rory. I'll have to go an' swear in the whole county as depities—and God knows what'll be the end of it. For if you had all Michigan behind you, I'd just have to go ahead and do what's laid out for me!"

Rory looked at him with a strange quietness, which went to the soul of the man-of-law more keenly than outcrying despair. "He canna get his execution afore Saturda' morn, can he?"

"Well, now, you know, he's on pretty near the top of the list. And seein' as you're not fightin' his judgment and there won't be no stay to it, he may get his *fy fay by Friday. But if I see he's goin' to get it then, if it's any use to you I'll go out of town and hold up the service till Saturday noon. I won't be actin' very legal to do that, but I'll do it, if you'll help me a little."

"All recht," said Rory; "then I'll pass ye my word that ye won't hae me to reckon wi' on Saturda'. I'll lea' the toon, too—I dinna well ken for where—but I winna be here. And I'll do a' in my pooer to get my lads to lea' wi' me—and I think they wull! And—and—ye're a good little mon, Sherie, a michty good little mon!" Whereupon that good little man fell a-cursing and swearing in a way that was not good at all. But nevertheless he had a message to bring back that stupefied all Portage: Rory had now abandoned any thought of battling to keep the Scotia. The same day, too, Kempesson came out among those shag-jawed battalions of MacKenzie henchmen; and their manner after he had left them was a silent repetition of the sheriff's tidings. The swaggering ferocity went out of them, they sang their war-song no longer, and no longer even did they take more than was good for them. From the first a certain rough feeling had kept them from trying to see Rory. Now, while the spirit was dying in the big man—where he lay in his sawdust or walked his empty "gangways"—they hardly showed themselves at all. They waited in Portage for the end, but for the most part they waited in silence. They would talk only to one another. Even when they saw Schunk or Egan they no longer sent unprintable growlings after them. For the town, too, the end could not come too quickly now. Even the Sawyer had little more to say.

Egan, happening to meet young Leslie on the court-house steps, beamingly commented on that. "Why no more of the scorching rhetoric?" he asked. "Why no longer the red-hot headline? And all this 'Shall Trelawney Die' business? It seems to have had a puncture, somehow, too! I'd even heard there was to have been a naval force cooperating with your Wat Tylers. Is that declared off as well?"

He received no answer. In the whole town there was not the spirit to reply to him. On Tuesday night, too, Rory was known to have come out and posted a bundle of letters, one being addressed to his brother Sanders, in Windsor. And although there were many then who said that they ought to go into the Scotia and bring the big man away from it, whether he would or no, no one was ready to lead—and with the shadow of tragedy cold upon them, nothing was done.

If you have ever seen a fatal fight between a great St. Bernard and a bulldog, when there was at hand no power that could pry the bull from the big, choking throat, you will unendurably remember that at the end there came a time when the final hysterical shriekings for some one to do something, and the wild, useless beatings upon the bull's iron head ceased at last, and there was a turning away from the death, of souls that sickened at it. On Friday afternoon Schunk got his judgment, and when it was learned that Sheriff Silverthorn had gone out of town and would not be back until late next day, there was a kind of general anger at him.

The mayor was one of the crowd that stood about the Scotia's gate as night fell. After a time Kempesson came out to them. It was said that through it all he had gone calmly on cleaning his machinery.

"How—how's he going to take it?" whispered the mayor fearfully. "My, my, but this is a hard business!"

Kempesson looked at him from under his owlish eyebrows with a kind of grim satisfaction. "I think he's ga'en to tak' it like his true sel'," he said.

"And you'll stay near him? If you could just fix it to sleep here to-night, now——"

"I wull!" said the old engineer, "I wull dae juist that. And I dinna doot but what I'll be of some coomfort tae him. Onnyway, I'll be here."

The mayor went away rubbing his hands together woefully. "I suppose it's all I can do," he said, talking aloud to himself, "but I wish I could have had a talk with MacKenzie." He made up his mind to go to him before breakfast next morning, and tell him just how he and all Portage felt about it.

But no one in the Harbor heard "Big Rory's" voice that morning following.

No one heard "Big Rory's" voice that morning following. But, barring the bedridden and infants in arms, there were few who did not hear him that Friday night! At twelve there was in Portage a roar and tumult as of a town in sack. The whole Harbor in fire array was pouring down Main Street toward the Scotia. And in the clutches of a half-dozen whooping lumber-jacks, Mr. E. G. Egan, clad in little more than his boots and great coat, was being carried gaspingly along in the centre of the flood. Ahead of him, through the swirling snow, he could make out Schunk, raging and fighting, but no less foamingly helpless in the grasp of as many more of "Rory's men." The lawyer tried to call to him, but a large, sweaty, buckskin mitt was clapped across his mouth. He tripped over a wire. "They've all been cut an hour ago!" yelled some one behind him. "You don't telephone or telegraft for help this night!"

He was borne half-choking through the Scotia's gate—now open wide enough—and on into the midst of the shouting crowd a-surge in the mill-yard. The Scotia, within and without, was crawling with men and lanterns. And along the wharf front dipped and swayed a score of red and green lookout lamps. The braying of two tug whistles rose trumpetingly above a hundredfold thudding of maul-blows, the running clank of winches, and the bellowing of orders.

The lawyer was thrust through the ragged front of the press. Two score shantymen, like swarming bees on a branch, clustered in dark clumps along the "jack-ladders." And out of the midst of them sprang down "Big Rory."

Egan shrieked at him in a falsetto of fright and fury. "Now you lay hand on us, MacKenzie—you try it now, or you burn or destroy this mill—and it'll be penitentiary business for you! I warn you—before these people as witnesses, I warn you!"

Rory flung free the forky lengths of his great red beard, and lifting high his lantern he grinned down on the lawyer like a werewolf. "Burrn or destroy the Scotia! Ye fule, ye fleerin', pettifoggin' lick-stamp! And you, ye leech-fat bloodsucker—oh, I hae a brawer game than that to show ye! Or, mayhap, ye'd ca' it 'juist a strecht matter o' beezness!' And syne ye speak o' weetnessin', I'll tell ye that juist to weetness this beezness hae I had ye twain haled here this nicht. For I'm thinkin' that but for yere twa precious sel's, we'd a' be of ain party. But noo yere kind attendance mak's it smooth and legal-like." He took a step nearer them, and his eyes seemed to leap and flare. "Ah, ye thocht ye had me, did ye na? Ye thocht I had lain doon to die like a foondered horse? Well, ye'll ha' a chance to joodge o' that for yersel's! Fling them aboord the Robbie, lads, and ha' them well watchit, for later I hae mair to say to them!"

He turned and again climbed swiftly up to the back of his men, now wrenching and hammering at the great endless chain. And Egan and Schunk were pitched like puppies aboard the tug. It backed away through the crunching ice, to turn and push a huge scow—only one of a tow of half a dozen—in athwart the wharf. And almost at the same instant, with a last crushing drive of the maul, the whole forward sheathing of the Scotia came down in a shattering rush like a broken theatre curtain. And the second story, the "sawing floor" of the mill, was filled and tumultuous with its own stage hands and scene shifters!

Old Kempesson, half-clothed and crookedly thick-set as a gorilla, dropped from a shafting beam into the main gangway. "Noo," he screeched deliriously, "you Tamson and Hicks an' yere gangs, come wi' me doon tae the bilers. And the rest of ye, back tae Rory and the skidway booms!" They started on the run. "And swing yeresel's for Meechigan while ye may, for on the morrow's morn ye'll be standin' aff all the baillies across the line, and sweerin' ye're loyal subjects o' the Queen!"

And then the pair on the Robbie Burns understood. Kempesson was an ancient mechanic concerning whom they had entertained delusions; he had been doing much more than clean machinery that last week. There had been something other than farewells, too, in a certain bundle of letters posted Tuesday night; and the naval force that was to cooperate with the men from the bush had been launched on more than a tide of rumor. "Big Rory" was going to attempt to put the Scotia piecemeal aboard his "tow" in that one night; and then, fighting through the drifting ice of the Channel and the March gales of the Lake, carry her the hundred and fifty miles into Canada!

And, by all that was desperate, it looked as if he were going to do it, too! Already the ladders were down. The wharfward wall of the boiler-house had been broken out, and a squad of "picks and crows" were tearing away the brick and concrete settings. Derrick and skidway had been ready long enough to be white with snow. Now the Achilles passed in double hawsers over the first of the scows, and they were bent to the nearest boiler.

"Ye canna bide to gang saft wi' 'em!" yelled Rory frenziedly. "Oot o' here they maun come!"

For one minute, two, three, four—there was a tension that was intolerable. Then the huge steel cylinder began to stir. "Oxen and wain ropes, but she's daein' it!" shrilled Kempesson, beside himself. And the boiler came down the skids like a stuck pig dragging on a lariat.

The swaying amphitheatre of humanity waited to see it safe on board, then sent up one fierce, wild shout of joy. Already they had started a score of bonfires and were preparing to watch the night out.

And thereafter, one by one, the whole battery of boilers followed. At the end of the first hour Kempesson gave over that business to Rory, and flinging the sweat from his greasy brows, he spurred and pushed his gangs in to the heavy driving-gear. Half of those men had helped to set it up, and they needed little guiding in its taking down again. "Come on, noo, come on!" went up that hoarsely tremulous scrannel pipe; "get in mair rollers! And in wi' yere crows and levers! Every mon that can find place for himsel', bend tae it!"

And as soon as the derrick could be reset for them, the ponderous castings and forgings were in their turn being swung to the skids and delivered over to the groaning hunger of the hemp. Without a halt, too, the half dozen turtle-like mill trucks were trundling out the lighter gear. Indeed, in those hours the main strength of fiercely straining men did much more than winch and derrick boom.

By four o'clock Kempesson and his gangs were once more carrying their lanterns up to the sawing-floor. "Get mair lines frae the tugs!" shrilled the old man. "An' lend a hoost tae McKeown and his taikle again." By this time the skidway to the second story was a very toboggan-slide, and now down it they slipped section after section of the massy, twenty-ton yoke of steel that stayed and buttressed the great ten-inch "band." Part by part the oscillating gangs swung after it. "Dinna stop to put spanner tae bolt or connection!" yelled Kempesson. "I tell ye again, I've had every nut aff and joint loose these twa days syne!" The resaws, the trimmers, and edgers, and butters, the shingle and lath machines, moved out in grotesque and clanking procession.

And for the last two hours, saddled on the hundred joists and braces high overhead, Rory's carpenters and their gangs had been drawing bolts and driving out key-pieces—unjointing the huge skeleton of the mill. They were heavy timbermen, such mechanics as built three-hundred-man shanties as their town fellows would build hen-coops. They knew their work. Fifteen minutes after the trucks had run the tailings of the canters and conveyors on to the creaking scows there began to seize the Scotia a mighty, mugient trembling. And, once a-sway, it fell with the gathering roar of a broken log-jam.

Already the Achilles was crowding in with the last of the scows, heaving and crushing them through the ice like another Ermack. And then, by trucks and hawsers, there began to be rushed aboard them sills and studding and sheathing, joists and sleepers and uprights, in a double stream.

It was almost dawn, and the snow had turned to a gale-borne spindrift. Save for the burner, towering up blast-furnace-like above the trampled waste about it, and the shattered masonry of saw and boiler settings, the site of the Scotia had been swept of everything by that human cyclone. And now "Big Rory" and his engineer, both hatless and dripping, open-throated and tangledly unkempt, sprang like great cats upon their last unwieldy freighter, leaped down over her rail to the Robbie, and made lance-straight for their captives in the cabin.

Schunk burst into a fury of blue-lipped curses as he saw them come. "Oh, by ——, but you'll regret this, you'll regret this!" And Egan barked venomously beside him.

"I regret it noo," guttered Rory, "that I hae had to lea' ye the saw-dust an' foondations!"

"But nae doot," insinuated Kempesson, "ye'll be wantin' them to foond yere future foortunes on—to say naethin' o' havin' somethin' solit to attach yere baillie's paper tae!"

One of the shanty cooks had made a ten-gallon caldron of boiling coffee. Rory silently dipped out two big tin mugs full. "Noo," he said with fanning nostrils, "in another forty-eight 'oors I've calculated we'll be in Canady. And if Meechigan's the 'loomber-jack's mitt' in the geographa, I tell ye the head and shouthers, and a' the body o' the pine chopper 's to the north o' her. Aince there, I dinna fear me. But mayhap we'll be at the bottom o' Lake Huron afore we're across her, and ye twain are noo ga'en to drink luck to oor expedeetion." If his eyes smiled, his fingers never stopped opening and closing. "Wha'? Wha'? Ye wull na?"

"Ye'd be wiser tae," came in old Kempesson again, "for I'm thinkin' ye're soon tae tak' a wee bit water trip yeresel's. And ye'll dae well tae drink hot afore ye drink cald!"

"Na? Na?" said Rory once more, the words coming like file-raspings. "Vara well, then! Na doot ye can swum? Na? Then ye'll be the first this year t' mak' yere try at it! Tak haud o' them, lads. Oh, ye maun come to it, my buckies!"

"I'm afeared they're baith tae yoong t' learn new ideas," said Kempesson. "I'm thinkin' there's no use argufyin' wi' that age, no use ava!"

"They'll hae learnt this nicht," said Rory thickly, wrenching Schunk from the cabin door, "that the pooers abo' dinna fecht only on the side o' the meek an' lowly. Ower wi' them, noo!"

They were quoited, swearing like demons, into the logway, gray with slush ice and snow. And when they came up again cant-hooks were twisted into their collars, and they were hauled in to the boat-landing.

Dawn was breaking. The scows were receiving their final interlashing, and the tugs were making fast their tow-lines. A good eighty of Rory's men were going with the Scotia, and they were swiftly building themselves shelter shanties under

IF EVER ANY ONE LEAVES YOU MONEY IN SIX FIGURES REMEMBER WHAT GEORGE AND MARY MADE OF THE JENKINS MILLIONS

"A GOOD STRAW HAT IS 'SOMETHING'"

IT HAD always been one of the luxuries of the Grimeses to consider what they would do if they were rich. Many a time George and his wife, sitting together of a summer evening upon the porch of their own pretty house in Susanville, had looked at the long unoccupied country-seat of General Jenkins, just across the way, and wished they had money enough to buy the place and give it to the village for a park.

Mrs. Grimes often said that if she had a million dollars the very first thing she would do would be to purchase the Jenkins place. George's idea was to tear down the fences, throwing everything open, and to dedicate the grounds to the public. Mrs. Grimes wanted to put a great free library in the house and to have a club for poor working-women in the second-floor rooms. George estimated that one hundred thousand dollars would be enough to carry out their plans. Say fifty thousand dollars for purchase money, and then fifty more invested at six per cent. to maintain the place.

"But if we had a million," said George, "I think I should give one hundred and fifty thousand to the enterprise and do the thing right. There would always be repairs and new books to buy and matters of that kind."

But this was not the only benevolent dream of these kind-hearted people. They liked to think of the joy that would fill the heart of that poor struggling pastor, Mr. Borrow, if they could tell him that they would pay the whole debt of the Presbyterian Church, six thousand dollars.

"And I would have his salary increased, George," said Mrs. Grimes. "It is shameful to compel that poor man to live on a thousand dollars."

"Outrageous," said George. "I would guarantee him another thousand, and maybe more; but we should have to do it quietly, for fear of wounding him."

"That mortgage on the Methodist Church," said Mrs. Grimes. "Imagine the happiness of those poor people in having it lifted! And so easy to do, too, if we had a million dollars."

"Certainly, and I would give the Baptists a handsome pipe-organ instead of that wheezing melodeon. Dreadful, isn't it?"

"You can get a fine organ for $2000," said Mrs. Grimes.

"Yes, of course, but I wouldn't be mean about it; not mean on a million dollars. Let them have a really good organ, say for $3000 or $3500; and then build them a parsonage, too."

"The fact is," said Mrs. Grimes, "that people like us really ought to have large wealth, for we know how to use it rightly."

"I often think of that," answered George. "If I know my own soul I long to do good. It makes my heart bleed to see the misery about us, misery I am absolutely unable to relieve. I am sure that if I really had a million dollars I should not want to squander it on mere selfish pleasure, nor would you. The greatest happiness any one can have is in making others happy; and it is a wonder to me that our rich people don't see this. Think of old General Jenkins and his twenty million dollars, and what we would do for our neighbors with a mere fraction of that!"

"For we really want nothing much for ourselves," said Mrs. Grimes. "We are entirely satisfied with what we have in this lovely little home and with your $2000 salary from the bank."

"Almost entirely," said George. "There are some few little things we might add in—just a few; but with a million we could easily get them and more and have such enormous amounts of money left."

"Almost the first thing I would do," said Mrs. Grimes, "would be to settle a comfortable living for life on poor Isaac Wickersham. That man, George, crippled as he is, lives on next to nothing. I don't believe he has two hundred dollars a year."

"Well, we could give him twelve hundred and not miss it and then give the same sum to Widow Clausen. She can barely keep alive."

"And there's another thing I'd do," said Mrs. Grimes. "If we kept a carriage I would never ride up alone from the station or for pleasure. I would always find some poor or infirm person to go with me. How people can be so mean about their horses and carriages as some rich people are is beyond my comprehension."

It is a delightful pastime, expending in imagination large sums of money that you haven't got. You need not regard considerations of prudence. You can give free rein to your feelings and bestow your bounty with reckless profusion. You obtain almost all the pleasure of large giving without any cost. You feel nearly as happy as if you were actually doing the good deeds which are the children of your fancy.

George Grimes and his wife had considered so often the benevolences they would like to undertake if they had a million dollars that they could have named them all at a moment's notice without referring to a memorandum. Nearly everybody has engaged in this pastime, but the Grimeses were to have the singular experience of the power to make their dream a reality placed in their hands.

For one day George came flying home from the bank with a letter from the executors of General Jenkins (who died suddenly in Mexico a week or two before) announcing that the General had left a million dollars and the country-seat in Susanville to George Grimes.

"And to think, Mary Jane," said George when the first delirium of their joy had passed, "the dear old man was kind enough to say—here, let me read it to you again from the quotation from the will in the letter: 'I make this bequest because, from repeated conversations with the said George Grimes, I know that he will use it aright.' So you see, dear, it was worth while, wasn't it, to express our benevolent wishes sometimes when we spoke of the needs of those who are around us?"

"Yes, and the General's kind remark makes this a sacred trust, which we are to administer for him."

"We are only his stewards."

"Stewards of his bounty."

"So that we must try to do exactly what we think he would have liked us to do," said George.

"Nothing else, dear?"

"Why, of course we are to have some discretion, some margin; and besides, nobody possibly could guess precisely what he would have us do."

"But now, at any rate, George, we can realize fully one of our longing desires and give to the people the lovely park and library?"

George seemed thoughtful. "I think, Mary Jane," he said, "I would not act precipitately about that. Let us reflect upon the matter. It might seem unkind to the memory of the General just to give away his gift almost before we get it."

They looked at each other, and Mrs. Grimes said:

"Of course there is no hurry. And we are really a little cramped in this house. The nursery is much too small for the children and there is not a decent fruit tree in our garden."

"The thing can just stay open until we have time to consider."

"But I am so glad for dear old Isaac. We can take care of him, anyhow, and of Mrs. Clausen, too."

"To be sure," said George. "The obligation is sacred. Let me see, how much was it we thought Isaac ought to have?"

"Twelve hundred a year."

"I SENT HER MY RED FLANNEL PETTICOAT WITH MY LOVE"

"H-m-m," murmured George, "and he has two hundred now; an increase of five hundred per cent. I'm afraid it will turn the old man's head. However, I wouldn't exactly promise anything for a few days yet."

"Many a man in his station in life is happy upon a thousand."

"A thousand! Why, my dear, there is not a man of his class in town that makes six hundred."

"George?"

"Well?"

"We must keep horses, and there is no room to build a stable on this place."

"No."

"Could we live here and keep the horses in the General's stables across the way, even if the place were turned into a park?"

"That is worth thinking of."

"And George?"

"Well, dear?"

"It's a horrid thing to confess, but do you know, George, I've felt myself getting meaner and meaner and stingier and stingier ever since you brought the good news."

George tried to smile, but the effort was unsuccessful; he looked half-vexed and half-ashamed.

"Oh, I wouldn't put it just that way," he said. "The news is so exciting that we hardly know at once how to adjust ourselves to it. We are simply prudent. It would be folly to plunge ahead without any caution at all. How much did you say the debt of the Presbyterian Church is?"

"Six thousand, I think."

"A good deal for a little church like that to owe."

"Yes, but——"

"You didn't promise anything, Mary Jane, did you, to Mrs. Borrow?"

"No, for I had nothing to promise. But I did tell her on Sunday that I would help them liberally if I could."

"They will base large expectations on that, sure. I wish you hadn't said it just that way. Of course, we are bound to help them, but I should like to have a perfectly free hand in doing it."

There was silence for a moment, while both looked through the window at the General's place over the way.

"Beautiful, isn't it?" asked Mrs. Grimes.

"Lovely. That little annex on the side would make a snug den for me; and imagine the prospect from that south bedroom window! You would enjoy every look at it."

"George?"

"What?"

"George, dear, tell me frankly, do you really feel in your heart as generous as you did yesterday?"

"Now, my dear, why press that matter? Call it meaner or narrower or what you will; maybe I am a little more so than I was; but there is nothing to be ashamed of. It is the conservative instinct asserting itself; the very same faculty in man that holds society together. I will be liberal enough when the time comes, never fear. I am not going to disregard what one may call the pledges of a lifetime. We will treat everybody right, the Presbyterian Church and Mr. Borrow included. His salary is a thousand, I think you said?"

"Yes."

"Well, I'm willing to make it fifteen hundred right now, if you are."

"We said, you remember, it ought to be two thousand."

"Who said so?"

"You did, on the porch here the other evening."

"I never said so. There isn't a preacher around here gets that much. The Episcopalians with their rich people only give eighteen hundred."

"And a house."

"Very well, the Presbyterians can build a house if they want to."

"You consent then to pledge five hundred more to the minister's salary?"

"I said I would if you would, but my advice is just to let the matter go over until to-morrow or next day, when the whole thing can be considered."

"Very well, but, George, sixty thousand dollars is a great deal of money, and we certainly can afford to be liberal with it, for the General's sake as well as for our own."

"Everything depends upon how you look at it. In one way the sum is large. In another way it isn't. General Jenkins had just twenty times sixty thousand. Tremendous, isn't it? He might just as well have left us another million. He is in Heaven and wouldn't miss it. Then we could have some of our plans more fully carried out."

"I hate to be thought covetous," answered Mrs. Grimes, "but I do wish he had put on that other million."

The next day Mr. Grimes, while sitting with his wife after supper, took a memorandum from his pocket and said:

"I've been jotting down some figures, Mary Jane, just to see how we will come out with our income of sixty thousand dollars."

"Well?"

"If we give the place across the street for a park and a library and a hundred thousand dollars with which to run it, we shall have just nine hundred thousand left."

"Yes."

"We shall want horses, say a carriage pair, and a horse for the station wagon. Then I must have a saddle horse and there must be a pony for the children. I thought also you might as well have a gentle pair for your own driving. That makes six. Then there will have to be, say, three stable men. Now, my notion is that we shall put up a larger house farther up town with all the necessary stabling. Count the cost of the house and suitable appointments, and add in the four months' trip to Europe which we decided yesterday to take next summer, and how much of that fifty-four thousand do you think we shall have left at the end of the year?"

"But why build the house from our income?"

"Mary Jane, I want to start out with the fixed idea that we will not cut into our principal."

"Well, how much will we have over?"

"Not a dollar! The outlay for the year will approximate fifty-six thousand dollars."

"Large, isn't it?"

"And yet I don't see how we can reduce it if we are to live as people in our circumstances might reasonably be expected to live."

"We must cut off something."

"That is what I think. If we give the park and the library building to the town why not let the town pay the cost of caring for them?"

"Then we could save the interest on that other hundred thousand."

"Exactly, and nobody will suffer. The gift of the property alone is magnificent. Who is going to complain of us? We will decide now to give the real estate and then stop."

Two days later Mr. Grimes came home early from the bank with a letter in his hand. He looked white and for a moment after entering his wife's room he could hardly command utterance.

"I have some bad news for you, dear—terrible news," he said, almost falling into a chair.

The thought flashed through Mrs. Grimes' mind that the General had made a later will which had been found and which revoked the bequest to George. She could hardly whisper:

"What is it?"

"The executors write to me that the million dollars left to me by the General draws only about four per cent. interest."

"George!"

"Four per cent.! Forty thousand dollars instead of sixty thousand! What a frightful loss! Twenty thousand dollars a year gone at one breath!"

"Are you sure, George?"

"Sure? Here is the letter. Read it yourself. One-third of our fortune swept away before we have a chance to touch it!"

"I think it was very unkind of the General to turn the four per cents. over to us while somebody else gets the six per cents. How could he do such a thing? And you such an old friend, too!"

"Mary Jane, that man always had a mean streak in him. I've said so to myself many a time. But, anyhow, this frightful loss settles one thing; we can't afford to give that property across the street to the town. We must move over there to live, and even then, with the huge expense of keeping such a place in order, we shall have to watch things narrowly to make ends meet."

"And you never were good at retrenching, George."

"But we've got to retrench. Every superfluous expenditure must be cut off. As for the park and free library, that seems wild now, doesn't it? I don't regret abandoning the scheme. The people of this town never did appreciate public spirit or generosity, did they?"

"Never."

"I'm very sorry you spoke to Mrs. Borrow about helping their church. Do you think she remembers it?"

"She met me to-day and said they were expecting something handsome."

"I HAVE SOME BAD NEWS FOR YOU, DEAR—TERRIBLE NEWS"

Mr. Grimes laughed bitterly.

"That's always the way with those people. They are the worst beggars! When a lot of folks get together and start a church it is almost indecent for them to come running around to ask other folks to support it. I have half a notion not to give them a cent."

"Not even for Mr. Borrow's salary?"

"Certainly not! Half the clergymen in the United States get less than a thousand dollars a year; why can't he do as the rest do? Am I to be called upon to support a lot of poor preachers? A good deal of nerve is required, I think, to ask such a thing of me."

Two weeks afterward Mr. Grimes and his wife sat together again on the porch in the cool of the evening.

"Now," said Grimes, "let us together go over these charities we were talking about and be done with them. Let us start with the tough fact staring us in the face that, with only one million dollars at four per cent. and all our new and necessary expenses, we shall have to look sharp or I'll be borrowing money to live on in less than eight months."

"Well," said Mrs. Grimes, "what shall we cut out? Would you give up that Baptist organ that we used to talk about?"

"Mary Jane, it is really surprising how you let such things as that stay in your mind. I considered that organ scheme abandoned long ago."

"Is it worth while, do you think, to do anything with the Methodist Church mortgage?"

"How much is it?"

"Three thousand dollars, I think."

"Yes, three thousand from forty thousand leaves us only thirty-seven thousand. Then, if we do it for the Methodists we shall have to do it for the Lutherans and the Presbyterians and swarms of churches all around the country. We can't make flesh of one and fowl of another. It will be safer to treat them all alike; and more just, too. I think we ought to try to be just with them, don't you, Mary Jane?"

"And Mr. Borrow's salary?"

"Ha! Yes! That is a thousand dollars, isn't it? It does seem but a trifle. But they have no children and they have themselves completely adjusted to it. And suppose we should raise it one year and die next year? He would feel worse than if he just went along in the old way. When a man is fully adjusted to a thing it is the part of prudence, it seems to me, just to let him alone."

"I wish we could——"

"Oh, well, if you want it; but I propose that we don't make them the offer until next year or the year after. We shall have our matters arranged better by that time."

"And now about Isaac Wickersham?"

"Have you seen him lately?"

"Two or three days ago."

"Did he seem discontented or unhappy?"

"No."

"You promised to help him?"

"What I said was, 'We are going to do something for you, Isaac.'"

"Something! That commits us to nothing in particular. Was it your idea, Mary Jane, to make him an allowance?"

"Yes."

"There you cut into our insufficient income again. I don't see how we can afford it with all these expenses heaping up on us; really I don't."

"But we must give him something; I promised it."

George thought a moment and then said:

"This is the end of September and I sha'n't want this straw hat that I have been wearing all summer. Suppose you give him that. A good straw hat is 'something.'"

"You remember Mrs. Clausen, George?"

"Have we got to load up with her, too?"

"Let me explain. You recall that I told her I would try to make her comfortable, and when I found that our circumstances were going to be really straitened, I sent her my red flannel petticoat with my love, for I know she can be comfortable in that."

"Of course she can."

"So this afternoon when I came up from the city she got out of the train with me and I felt so half-ashamed of the gift that I pretended not to see her and hurried out to the carriage and drove quickly up the hill. She is afraid of horses, anyhow."

"Always was," said George.

"But, George, I don't feel quite right about it yet; the gift of a petticoat is rather stingy, isn't it?"

"No, I don't think so."

"And, George, to be perfectly honest with ourselves now, don't you think we are a little bit meaner than we were, say, last June?"

George cleared his throat and hesitated, and then he said:

"I admit nothing, excepting that the only people who are fit to have money are the people who know how to take care of it."

MEN AND MEASURES

By Charles Emory Smith

THE CHANGE IN THE CHARACTER OF FOREIGN REPRESENTATION AT WASHINGTON. MR. BOWEN'S VIGOROUS CONDUCT OF VENEZUELA'S CASE. THE CLOSE OF THE CAMPAIGN AGAINST THE TRUSTS

THE diplomatic corps at Washington used to be chiefly the dazzling ornament of society. The foreign representative was the pet of the parlor, and little more. With the extraordinary advance in the position of the United States among the world Powers our capital has become one of the centres of world activities, and the diplomats have something to do. The recent prolonged pourparlers through which the Venezuelan settlement was reached brought out impressively two things—first, the increasing importance of Washington as a diplomatic focus, and, second, the sweeping change in the personnel of the corps.

As the dispute involved an American country and the Venezuelan representative was the American Minister, it was natural and convenient that the conferences should be held at Washington. Yet they might have been held at London, and under the old order of things probably would have been. To locate them at our capital was undoubtedly to recognize and facilitate the friendly and advisory, not to say supervisory, interest of our Government. The three representatives who conducted the negotiations on behalf of the European allies were all men who had just taken up their missions. The death of Lord Pauncefote and the retirement of Holleben and Fava had removed the old landmarks, and when to this reconstruction is added the transfer of Cambon and of several of the minor Ministers it indicates how largely the corps has been transformed.

Of the European negotiators Baron Speck von Sternberg is the most active and interesting figure. He belongs to the new school of diplomacy—the school which is frank, direct, open and outspoken, which seeks the truth and does not seek to escape it by sticking the head in the sand. He came over here to tell the Berlin Foreign Office the facts as he found them and not as the Foreign Office wanted to hear them. He reported American sentiment as it was, and not as Berlin imagined and desired it to be. There are diplomats who give the home office what they think it wishes to believe and not what it ought to know. Baron Speck is not one of these. Throughout his career he has been distinguished for telling the truth, whether altogether palatable or not. He was once recalled and humiliated for his plain speaking, but he now has personal standing enough with the Kaiser to be safe in giving the facts as he sees them.

Von Sternberg's Share in the Affair

IF THE German demands on Venezuela seemed arbitrary and excessive in the settlement as it was finally made, there is good reason to believe that they would have been more harsh and exacting if the moderating and restraining influence of Baron Speck had not been exercised. When it was supposed that all points of difference had been adjusted and an agreement reached new requirements were unexpectedly imposed. The autocratic will and the mailed hand were plain in these exactions. The energetic remonstrance and admonition of Baron Speck resulted in a modification, but even as it is Germany secures an advantage over her allies. If she does this at the expense of their distrust and of her own good faith, it may prove in the long run to be a costly gain. But there can be no criticism of the German representative. He promptly recognized the conditions on this side. He was quick to see the American feeling and to understand that it was not wise to trifle with it. He is alert and dexterous, and, though handicapped in taking up an unfinished work, he was clever and discreet in handling it within his limitations.

After the President had declined to arbitrate the general issue it was foolish to ask him to arbitrate the minor question of preferential treatment for the blockading Powers. His negative was certain. It is safe to say that Baron Speck did not approve that suggestion. As he is not an Ambassador, but has Ambassadors as his colleagues, he was playing the difficult rôle of being a leading actor in a secondary part, and though his name appeared on the paper with the others, it was his hand without his head. No little finesse was required in preserving apparent unanimity of action where there was not entire unanimity of judgment and method.

The new British Ambassador has made an agreeable impression in Washington. Sir Michael Herbert is a genial, unaffected and attractive gentleman. He enters into life at the capital with kindly and sympathetic spirit, and is sure to be popular in the social circle. He has shown on two or three occasions that he can speak in a graceful and tactful way, and his footing with the nimble wits and good fellowship of the Gridiron Club has been promptly established. In the Venezuelan negotiations he has had little independent and original power. He was simply the medium of his Government, and was once reminded rather pointedly that it was his business to obey instructions. The Italian Ambassador, though senior in order of precedence, stood for the Power with least voice and influence, and naturally left the leadership to his associates.

It was against these men, and still more against their Governments, that Mr. Bowen was pitted. He was well fitted for the rôle he had to play. Representing the feeblest of the nations he was the most assertive and peremptory of the negotiators. Standing on the defensive, he was the most aggressive and positive in his tactics. Physically commanding, intellectually vigorous, temperamentally bold and decisive, with quick perceptions, clear purpose, resolute tone and dominating manner, he had the right bearing and the right qualities to make the most of the position in which he was placed.

How Plain Talk Won the Day

THE influence he had gained over Castro was remarkable. He went to Caracas when the relations between Venezuela and the United States were strained over the usurpations and rapacity of the Venezuelan Government respecting the rival claims of American citizens, and he at once adopted an energetic attitude. Rarely is a ruler treated to such plain speaking by the representative of another Power. Castro found that in the American Minister he had a fearless observer who knew his designs and who did not hesitate to tell him the truth to his face. The very frankness, directness and boldness of Mr. Bowen seemed to win his confidence, and when he found the allies pressing him he put his whole case in Mr. Bowen's hands.

The American Minister was in a unique situation. England and Germany were seeking the approval of the United States in their proceeding. Venezuela was dependent on the United States for protection. All roads led to Rome and all interests led to the American Minister. His personality enforced his representative position. When England and Germany withdrew their Ministers they placed the care of their nationals in his hands. At the same time he was the trusted adviser of Castro. His quality was shown at the outset in a characteristic act. Castro answered the English and German menace by seizing the English and German nationals and thrusting them into prison. Immediately Mr. Bowen hastened to the palace, pointed out the folly of this rash act, insisted on their instant release, and secured it.

When the issue passed to the stage of negotiations Castro made him his plenipotentiary. Then Mr. Bowen came to Washington with plenary powers. Note how he played his game. He first armed himself with full authority to arrange a settlement or arbitration of the claims of all nations against Venezuela. He next exhibited his credentials to the blockading Powers, received their recognition and announced his readiness to proceed. He then informed the neutral nations that he was empowered to settle their claims also, and skillfully arrayed them against the demand of the blockading Powers to be treated as preferred creditors. He thus gained the moral influence of the majority of nations, including the United States, for his side.

England and Germany had yielded much. They had agreed to raise the blockade; they had agreed to adjudicate the unadmitted claims with Venezuela without formal arbitration; they had agreed to accept only a part of the thirty per cent. reservation of the custom revenues in satisfaction of their claims; and they were unwilling to yield the last point of all and surrender all demand for preference after all their demonstration. Then Mr. Bowen played his trump card. "It will take six years or more," he said, "to pay the claims under the proposed arrangement; if the allies are to have any preferential treatment it means that they are to stand together or tie their hands for that period, and it will cause surprise and disappointment to learn that England has entered into an alliance with Germany or limited her freedom of action on an American question for six years or more."

That was a shaft that pierced to the quick. It was sure to arouse American feeling. It was sure to open the eyes of the English people to the danger of an American estrangement and to intensify the already wide unpopularity of the alliance. Such a blunt declaration was resented as shocking to sensitive and diplomatic nerves. In personal intercourse it was probably put with trenchant force and not in any soft and sinuous way, and its immediate publication to affect public opinion was quite contrary to the old code. It was called "shirt-sleeve diplomacy." There could be no further discussion of the question with a diplomat who struck out in that fashion. But it was all that was left of the controversy, and it must be settled in some way. The allies committed the blunder of invoking the arbitration of the President, and when he declined, as he was sure to do, there was no recourse but to refer it to The Hague Tribunal. Thus we have the paradox of the Tribunal established for the express purpose of promoting the ways of peace being asked to decide that the resort to war gives preferred rights!

This is an outcome with which both Venezuela and the United States may be very well satisfied. If the curtain were lifted on all that took place behind the scenes it would doubtless be found that our Government deemed it expedient to guide Mr. Bowen somewhat in these negotiations, and it might be revealed that his methods were his own. Secretary Hay has such skill in masking the keenest blow with the velvet touch that, though incisive and outspoken, he probably would have suggested the deft rather than the brusque delivery.

But American diplomacy, though somewhat varied in its methods according to the men, generally accomplishes its objects. Throughout its history it has had signal success, and it succeeds because, though we have no diplomatic school or career, and few trained diplomats, our representatives have for the most part been successful men of affairs, who have gained experience and shown capacity in the practical work of life. They treat diplomacy as they treat other work that may fall to them, as requiring a distinct object, an intelligent understanding of facts, a clear grasp of right principles and a very direct method of going at the end in view. If they have generally prevailed in their diplomatic contests it is because they have been more resourceful men, with less intricate relations and complicated interests to serve and with a more direct and vigorous way of moving straight to the mark.

A Tribute to Senator Cockrell

THE marriage of Senator Cockrell's daughter has furnished the occasion of a striking demonstration of the great esteem felt for the veteran Missouri Senator by his associates without distinction of party. The general purpose of "Men and Measures" cannot be better served than in turning aside for a moment from the more showy figures and the more spectacular exhibitions, and in aiding a broader recognition and appreciation of one of the most useful men in public life. Senator Cockrell is not so conspicuous in the public eye as some others. He is not a brilliant gladiator like his colleague who, after a long and shining career, is just leaving the Senate. But in the actual work of practical legislation relating to all branches of government this unassuming man is one of the most efficient and valuable forces in Washington.

Mr. Cockrell has been in the Senate twenty-eight years, and during all that time has devoted himself to his public work with a conscientious assiduity equaled by few. He is a member of the two great Committees of Appropriations and Military Affairs. He is also one of the Committee on Rules, which no one understands better than he, and, though belonging to the minority, he is chairman of Engrossed Bills, so that every measure which is enacted passes through his careful hands. Some years ago he served on the special committee which made a minute and exhaustive examination of all departments of the Government and of their construction and operation. As the result of this experience no man understands all the machinery of the Government better than he does, and he fairly divides with Senator Allison the distinction of having the largest information and being the highest authority on the whole range of Governmental administration.

Best of all, he fills his great position in the truest and worthiest public spirit. He is a Democrat from a Southern State, and on partisan issues he stands with his party; but on a question of meeting a public necessity or advancing a just public interest no partisanship sways his judgment or impairs his usefulness. He is an ex-Confederate soldier, but he is none the less a genuine patriot, and he brings to the consideration of the multiplied questions of public concern which come before him a true patriotic spirit.

The Closing of the Trust Campaign

THE completion of the program of anti-trust legislation was accomplished in the end with less friction and more apparent ease than was anticipated. The perfection of the work three weeks before the close of the session and without any serious struggle baffled many calculations. It was the result of good tactics and of effective work behind the scenes. The persuasion which did not come in open argument was exercised in private appeal. The President's personal presentation of the case to the leading Senators was conclusive, and his evident command of an irresistible public sentiment carried acquiescence, if not hearty consent. The fact of what may be the most important domestic legislation of years going through the Senate without any debate whatever and through the House with only nominal debate is a curious and interesting development. The discussion was really before the people and not in the legislative chambers, and the result is a striking example of the power of public opinion.

There was a sort of singular mystery without being any real secret about the elusive telegrams from trust magnates which were supposed to aid action at the last, if they did not precipitate it. Just before the publicity amendment to the Department of Commerce bill was to be reported the whole country suddenly rang with the uproar of the telegrams protesting against it, and insisting that it must be stopped. Immediately the revelation made its passage doubly sure. But not one of the telegrams has been actually caught. The one to Senator Quay does not count, for that was outside of the group and was part of a correspondence. The real broadside went to eight or nine Senators. The President instantly knew it and quickly recognized the weapon that had been placed in his hand. The friends who visited the executive office on that memorable Saturday morning—and there happened to be some from out of town—knew it. Within twenty-four hours the country knew it, and if there was any opposition to the publicity amendment it was silenced. But the Senators withdrew within their shells, and the telegrams, though perfectly well known in Washington and an entirely legitimate expression of opinion and interest if they had been more discreet, have not been publicly identified.

The points covered by the acts which comprise the anti-trust legislation are precisely as described in these columns four weeks ago.

The question of reposing the power of supervision and investigation in a commission like the Interstate Commerce Commission or in a permanent executive bureau was a crucial issue in the judgment of many conservative business men. It was wisely decided in favor of the executive bureau. This guards against excessive disturbance and assures responsible and self-contained oversight. Instead of making the requirement of reports and publicity arbitrary and universal, it is left to be applied where needful at the discretion of the Commissioner and practically of the President. This opens the way to the protection of the public without exposing legitimate and unquestioned business to needless intrusion. There has been a widespread impression that the Littlefield bill embodied the views and plans of Attorney-General Knox. This is entirely incorrect. The Attorney-General put himself in communication with Mr. Littlefield and the members of the House Committee, but for the purpose of restraining and moderating their extreme plans. The measure as they conceived it was thus modified, but it still raised doubtful questions and proposed radical action. Though carried through the House it was laid aside in the scheme of responsible legislation, and any modification in Senator Hoar's committee will meet the same fate. President Roosevelt's Administration has accomplished the new departure, but will inaugurate it in a conservative and experimental way.

SHE went straight to her father with the whole story. He listened sitting at his desk, balancing a broad ivory paper-cutter on his forefinger. She felt much better when she had finished; her anger seemed to have been carried off in her words.

After a long silence her father said: "What do you wish to do?"

She looked foolish. "I don't know, papa," she said feebly. "What do you think we ought to do?"

"He may have been honestly deceived."

"But Mr. Macready said——"

"That was merely his offhand opinion," he interrupted. "They've been making imitation jewels of all kinds for years. I know the Italians have long been clever at it."

Elsie was silent. She could not help remembering Rontivogli's stupid, overcrafty reiterations. She knew that he knew.

"And," continued her father, examining the paper-cutter critically, "there isn't the slightest doubt as to the genuineness of Prince Rontivogli himself."

Another long silence during which neither father nor daughter showed the slightest curiosity as to what thoughts the other's face might be revealing.

"Even if he did willfully deceive in this—not vitally important—matter," continued the aspirant for a princess daughter, "I can imagine many extenuating circumstances. It isn't the young man's fault that he's poor. It isn't unnatural that he shouldn't wish to expose his poverty—especially if he"—the Senator's face took on a smile of fatherly benevolence—"happened to care for the young lady. 'All's fair in love and war,' you know. And we must not judge harshly those who have less than we have. Still——"

Rontivogli's "temperament" was vigorously reenforcing his title in repairing the havoc the false jewel had played with him in Elsie's mind. He had been a convincing lover; Elsie had too much vanity and too much desire to be loved madly not to be a credulous young woman. "I don't know what to do, papa," she said in the tone that proclaims a decision reached and a wish for support in it.

"Perhaps," replied the Senator slowly, the picture of forgiving charity, "it might be best to let the matter drop."

"But I simply can't wear the ring! I'd feel such a fraud, and I'd soon be disliking him, though this may not be at all his fault. Besides, some one might——"

"That could be easily arranged." Her father's eyes twinkled—he was preparing to treat the discovered deception as a little private joke on the prince between his daughter and himself. "We can get Tiffany to set an emerald in the ring. No one will know. And some day you can tease him about it. If he is innocent, it would mortify him horribly to learn the truth now, wouldn't it?"

Elsie smiled somewhat cheerfully. She was trying hard to make herself doubt the prince's guilty knowledge. "It must be done right away," she said.

She wore her gloves that afternoon. But Rontivogli, with nerves like a sensitive plant's leaves, felt a change in her, hard though she tried to seem unchanged. In the clear light of hind-sight he had been cursing himself for saying so much to her of Madame Almansa's insinuations; and at first he feared that by his blundering he had roused suspicion in her. But she showed that she was still in the mood to marry him, and the negotiations for settlements went smoothly on between Senator Pope's lawyer and the attorney to the Italian Embassy, whom he had engaged to represent him; he dismissed his fear as a wild imagining of guilt and set himself to remove the coolness just under Elsie's surface of warmth by lavishing his "temperament" upon her. And he was rewarded with swift success. A flaw in such a lover was as inconsequential as a flaw in an emerald—and was it not as much a matter of course?

Toward the end of the week she went with her father to New York, and in two days Tiffany changed the setting for a consideration of four thousand eight hundred dollars. She returned to Washington fully restored—but she kept the false jewel. The shock and its after-effects were over now. She was a little astonished that she, so used to the quaint ways of foreigners, should have attached importance to the quaintness of this foreigner—a lover who was fiery and infatuated, a lover who sang, a lover who was a Prince of a "house" that ruled and plotted and patronized the arts when Europe beyond the Alps was a savage wilderness. Rontivogli had not been studying women for twenty years—or ever since he was eighteen—aided by a classic face, a classic figure, a classic name and classic recklessness, without learning thoroughly the business he was now following.

Frothingham had ceased to hope, and, for lack of any other opening, was arranging to go to Chicago, there to visit his steamer friend Barney whom he had not permitted to forget him—Barney had a marriageable daughter and was rated at eleven millions; also, Chicago was reputed to be a promising field for titled foreigners. He felt that he was neglecting business in lingering at Washington. He saw no signs, heard no news, of available rich girls or rich men's daughters. Half a dozen questions about any girl and he would get an answer that would force him to strike her from his list—the father was opposed to large settlements; the family was opposed to international marriages; the family's social ambitions were of the new cis-Atlantic kind; the daughter was already engaged; the mother's aim was for princely or ducal rank. And he was kept in low spirits by the spectacle of the triumphant Rontivogli, and was exasperated by Elsie's treating him as an object of pity, a rejected and inconsolable lover.

As he sat alone in a corner of the club, staring with grim satire into the ugly face of his affairs, upon him intruded a man whom he had often described as the most viciously tiresome person he had ever met—Count Eitel zu Blickenstern. He disliked Blickenstern because he was a German; he avoided him because he was dull, because he was a chronic and ingenious borrower of small sums of money, and because every remark that seemed to him to have been intended humorously was hailed by him with a loud, mirthless laugh—the laugh of those who have no notion of wit or humor and fear their deformity will be discovered.

Frothingham had first met Blickenstern in the Riviera, where he was living on the last lees of tolerance. He would have cut him when he ran across him in New York had he not found him in high favor with the women who dominated fashionable society. They admitted Blickenstern as they admitted almost any of the few available men with no occupation but idleness. They needed escorts, attendants, fetch-and-carry men; Blickenstern was idle and willing, was big and always well dressed, was useful to do the hard work of arranging an entertainment once it had been planned. And his noisy convulsions flattered those unaccustomed to having their jokes appreciated.

"I HAVE COME, SIR, TO REPEL THE LIES OF THAT INFAMOUS PRUSSIAN"

Frothingham's cold stare did not disturb Blickenstern, born insensible to mental temperatures. He posed for a moment to give Frothingham a chance to admire his fashionable array of new light-gray frock suit, white spats, orchid in buttonhole and dark red tie; then he dropped upon the lounge with the good-natured, slightly condescending greeting he gave men when he had money in his pockets. He explained that he had come the night before in a private car with a party of distinguished New Yorkers who had to testify before a Senate committee. "And, do you know," said he—his English was idiomatic American and almost without accent, "the first person I ran into was that Italian scalawag, Rontivogli."

Frothingham's eyeglass glistened; otherwise he did not change expression. "D' you know 'im?" he asked languidly.

"Know 'im?" replied Blickenstern. "Rather! I'm responsible for him in this country. He landed without a friend, and the people he had letters to shut the door in his face—they don't fancy Italians in New York. I introduced him round and got him in everywhere. And, by gad, he not only refused to pay a note he gave me, but when I met him here last night he stared at me as if he'd never seen me before."

"Rough, wasn't it?"

Blickenstern laughed cheerfully, without a trace of irritation. Insults did not disturb him; he had killed one man and had wounded several in duels, but he fought only because it was the "proper thing for a gentleman"—and respect-inspiring in certain countries and in certain circumstances. "I'm off for home next week," he said, "never to return to this bounder-land. I think, just before I go, I'll get the face value of that note and interest—and not in money, either."

Blickenstern had several drinks "on" Frothingham—half a dozen in as rapid succession as Frothingham could induce. But he refused to disclose his proposed revenge; only chuckled, "I'll bet the dago'll leave on the first steamer after I sail."

Frothingham got Boughton to attempt Blickenstern, and Boughton not only tried it himself but also put at work a friend of his in the German Embassy. Blickenstern, however, would not go beyond waggling his big blond head and saying, "Wait! I don't want to spoil the fun." The military attaché at the German Embassy was with him when he met Rontivogli again. "I'll give the guinea one more chance," said he, overflowing with good nature as always when he had drunk to excess. It was the office of the Shoreham and Rontivogli was on his way out; Blickenstern bore down upon him, caught him by the lapel.

"I'm giving you your last chance, Cosimo," he said. "You'd better pay up."

"If you don't take your hands off me," exclaimed Rontivogli in French, "I'll have you put into the street." The look in his black eyes suggested the glitter of a stiletto.

Blickenstern shook him gently. "If you don't pay that note," he replied with unruffled good nature, "I'll publish it and the contract also. I'm leaving the country and don't care what they think of me here. But you—I hear you're about to marry?"

Rontivogli grew yellow under the bronze of his clear, pale skin. "I tell you, I can't pay the note. You know it. You drove me out of New York with your dogging and dunning me. In a few weeks I can pay, and will."

"Yes—when you're married." Blickenstern laughed loudly and not hollowly—here was a joke he could see. "What do you think I am—an imbecile? Don't I know that as soon as you're married you can snap your fingers—and will?"

Rontivogli disengaged himself and readjusted his close-fitting coat. "I'm certain you will not lay yourself liable to arrest for blackmail," he said with calm contempt and went on to his carriage.

Blickenstern looked after him, nodding and laughing. "Just wait!" he said, addressing his fellow-German and including the curious loungers in the office.

Frothingham searched for Blickenstern—he had a vague idea of taking him to call at the Popes. But he could not find him. He did see Rontivogli, however—one glance was enough to tell him that Blickenstern's threats had devoured his high spirits and were eating into his courage. He waited impatiently for the explosion—a five days' wait, for it did not come until the following Tuesday. That morning, as Hutt went out of his bedroom after fixing his bath, Joe Wallingford called from their common sitting-room:

"You're awake, aren't you?"

"Almost," answered Frothingham.

"Then just read that." He flung a newspaper through the crack in Frothingham's door on to his bed.

Frothingham took the paper and instantly caught the names of Rontivogli and Blickenstern in the largest headlines. He began eagerly upon a three-column article, the most of it under a New York date line.

"Ain't that cruel?" called Wallingford. "Ain't it a soaker?"

"Um," replied Frothingham, too busy to pause.

It was an account of a suit brought by Blickenstern against Rontivogli to collect a note for twenty-five hundred dollars. The "sensation" lay in a document which Blickenstern had attached to the note and had filed with the papers in the suit—a contract, reading:

> I, Cosimo di Rontivogli, hereby agree to pay Count Eitel zu Blickenstern twenty-five hundred dollars as soon as he has introduced me to the persons whose names are written upon the back of this contract in my handwriting. And I further agree to pay him an additional twenty-five hundred dollars within one month after I become engaged to an American lady, whether or not I am introduced to her by him. And I further agree to pay him an additional ten thousand dollars within three months after my marriage with an American lady, whether or not he introduces me to her.
> (Signed) COSIMO DI RONTIVOGLI.

This contract, the newspaper said, was in Rontivogli's autograph, and was witnessed by two clerks at the Holland House; on the back of the contract, and also in Rontivogli's autograph, were the names of fifteen fashionable and rich New York women. Frothingham glanced at the names—he knew the bearers of most of them—and hastened on into Blickenstern's interview. "In Europe," he had said to the reporter, "I should call the fellow out and kill him. Here, where the duel does not exist, I must take the only redress open to me for his betrayal of my friendship. I asked him to pay only the note. In fact he owes me five thousand more, as he is now engaged to a Washington heiress. He is a black rascal. If you will send to Milan you can get a fine tale of how he happened to come to your country. I owe all my American friends an apology for introducing him. I confess with shame that but for me he would have known no one."

The article went on with an account of Rontivogli's engagement to "Miss Elsie Pope, one of the best-known young women in Washington, Philadelphia and New York society, the only daughter of Senator John C. Pope, reputed to be the third richest man in the Millionaires' Club, as the Senate is called." Then followed Rontivogli's sweeping denial and his denunciation of the Prussian as a "blackmailer," a "notorious card-sharp," a "thorough scoundrel."

When Frothingham finished he said, "Gad, what a facet for Miss Pope!"

"Isn't it, though?" replied Wallingford. "And for her father. I always blame the fathers."

"But I thought it was the mothers who hankered after European marriages," said Frothingham.

COUNT EITEL ZU BLICKENSTERN

"That's what is usually said," Wallingford answered, "because only the mothers appear in the public part of the business. But who gives up the money for the settlements? The women ain't a nose ahead of the men in the race of snobbishness. Poor little Elsie Pope! This ought to be a lesson to our girls against——"

He paused abruptly and reddened, though Frothingham could not see him. "I almost forgot that Frothingham's one of 'em," he said to himself.

Frothingham was grinning in the seclusion of his bedroom. "I should say so!" he exclaimed in his drawling, satirical voice. "Wonder what the Milan yarn is?"

He learned in a few hours, for the Washington afternoon papers had a long Associated Press dispatch from Milan. Rontivogli, heavily in debt and ruined, had been backed by a syndicate of his creditors for an American tour in search of an heiress. They had risked in the venture forty thousand lire and, within a month, an additional twenty thousand. They regarded it as a by no means desperate investment for the recovery of the very large sum which Rontivogli had got out of them before they discovered his financial plight—certainly with such a title and so much personal beauty and charm he could win the daughter of one of the multitude of rich men among those title-crazy American vulgarians. The Milan dispatch set forth that the correspondent had had no difficulty in getting the facts, as "every one here knows the story. The formation of such syndicates is said to be common in England, France, Germany, Austria and Italy, and many of them have been successful."

"Poor Frothingham!" Wallingford thought as he read. "This is bad for his business. I fancy it'll be many a day before I see my thousand again." And then he delicately gave Frothingham a hint that if he needed another thousand he could have it. But Frothingham didn't need it just then—and, it should be set down to his credit, he would have hesitated long before taking it, had he needed it. Wallingford was not wrong in thinking there had been since he first knew Frothingham a marked decline in his "honor as a gentleman," and a marked rise in his "honor as a man."

Rontivogli went to the Popes at eleven o'clock that morning. The look of the flunky who opened the door foreshadowed to him his fate. He was shown not into the drawing-room but into a reception-room—a small alcove to the left of the door, intended for wraps rather than for callers. The footman returned with a package on his tray. "Miss Pope is not at 'ome," he said haughtily, omitting the customary "Your 'Ighness" and not even substituting so much as a "Sir" for it, "and she left this to be given to you."

Rontivogli ignored the impudences of omitting his title and of addressing him as "you" and took the package. The footman held aside the portière with the broadest possible hint in his face and manner.

"Tell Senator Pope that the Prince di Rontivogli wishes to see him," said Rontivogli in a tone which at once reduced the footman, in spite of himself, from a human being to a mechanical device for the transmission of messages.

When he hesitatingly withdrew Rontivogli opened the package—his ring with the stone unset and loose in the box. He solved the puzzle almost as soon as it was presented to him. He scowled, then gave a short, sneering laugh, put the lid on the box and thrust it into the tail pocket of his frock coat.

Senator Pope received him in his study, rising and bowing without advancing or extending his hand. He was serious, but bland—he did not know how to be brusque or even unkind in manner; he did know how to be diplomatic.

"I have come, sir, to repel the lies of that infamous Prussian," began Rontivogli with suppressed passion.

"You will, I trust, not distress me with the painful subject," said Pope slowly and gently. "We know that the Count has maligned you. But you, as a gentleman, must appreciate how terrible the notoriety is to us all. I assume that you have come to relieve the young lady of the embarrassment of the situation."

Rontivogli lost control of himself, raved, paced the floor, pleaded, denounced, threatened even. But Pope, sympathetic and in the proper places tenderly sorrowful, pressed in upon the Prince his and Elsie's unchangeable determination. At last Rontivogli gave up the useless battle and drew the box from his pocket. "Your daughter," he said, "sent me by a servant this broken ring. The stone has been removed and to my astonishment I find that a false emerald has been substituted." His voice and manner were apologetic, deprecatory, as if Senator Pope owed him an explanation which he was loth to demand.

He opened the box and exhibited its contents to Pope, who looked with polite interest. "The stone has become detached," was all he said.

"But why was it not returned to me?" asked Rontivogli. "Why this false emerald in its place?"

"It is the same stone," said Pope. His tone was absent as if he were thinking of something else.

"It is not!" Rontivogli's voice was bold and hard, a covert threat in it.

They looked each the other straight in the eyes—Pope inquiringly, the Italian defiantly. Then Pope said: "Ah! Excuse me one moment."

He left the room, muttering as he reached the hall, "The miserable swindler! He knows we won't have any further scandal, no matter what it costs." When he returned he had in his hand the emerald he and Elsie had bought at Tiffany's. He laid it on the corner of the desk nearest Rontivogli.

"This is a genuine emerald," he said, his voice neither hot nor cold. "You may take it—if you like."

"I thank you," replied Rontivogli with a slight bow of acknowledgment, as if a wrong to him had been righted.

He put the emerald and the ring in his waistcoat pocket; he put the box, with the false emerald in it, on the corner of the desk exactly where Senator Pope had laid the genuine stone. Then he went on, in a way that was the perfection of courtesy: "May I presume further on your kindness? This German cur has placed me in a distressing position. I wish to leave America at once, to return where a gentleman cannot be thus attacked without defense. Unfortunately——" He hesitated with a fine affectation of delicacy.

Senator Pope's eyes were more disagreeable to look at than any human being had ever before seen them. "I shall be glad to give you any reasonable assistance," he said with admirable self-control.

"You are most kind!" Rontivogli was almost effusive. "I shall return any advance you may make as soon as I am at home."

"How much?" asked Pope with a trace of impatience.

"I have many obligations which must be settled before I leave. I had just cabled for a remittance, but I wish to go before it can arrive. Might I trouble you for an advance of, perhaps, five thousand—I think that will be enough."

Senator Pope unlocked and opened a drawer, took out a flat package of bills. "Here is a thousand dollars," he said. "I cannot advance you more. And I trust you will sail the day after to-morrow." He looked hard at the Prince. "That will spare me the necessity of making a private appeal to the Italian Embassy through our State Department."

"You are most kind, mon chèr Senator," replied Rontivogli.

He put the package of bills in the inside pocket of his coat. He reflected a few seconds, then took his top hat. "Will you do me the honor of presenting my compliments and regrets to Madame Pope—and to Mademoiselle?" he said with steady eyes and elaborate politeness. "I thank you again. I regret that we part in circumstances so unhappy. I shall send your little advance within the month."

He bowed profoundly and Senator Pope inclined his head. He went to the door, turned there, bowed again. "Au revoir, my dear Senator," he said cordially, and was gone—a fascinating patrician figure of handsome ease and dignity.

XV

FROTHINGHAM let three days pass and on the fourth called at Senator Pope's. Elsie was in Philadelphia—was visiting an aunt. It had not occurred to him that she would run away and hide herself, so little did he think of the matter in any other light than that of a game between himself and Rontivogli. He was much upset and did not know what move to make next. Fate helped him the evening of the same day—the mail brought a note from Elsie:

My dear Friend:

I can't help writing to thank you. You warned me, and you were good and kind about it, and I was very disagreeable. I should like to say so to you, but I don't suppose you'll be in Philadelphia, will you? And it will be many a day before I see Washington. Indeed, I hope I shall never see it again. I didn't deserve your friendship. E. W. P.

Frothingham had not reflected on this letter long before he was telling Hutt to get his belongings together. The next afternoon found him at the Bellevue in Philadelphia, and a few hours later he was dining at the Hopkinses' with Elsie and her uncle and aunt. He liked the Hopkinses—stiff and shy, but kindly. He liked the dark furniture and walls and woodwork, suggesting old English; liked the faces in the family portraits—English faces; liked surroundings where there was nothing new or new-fashioned except his own and Elsie's dress, where there was so much that was fine as well as old. And he had never liked Elsie so well as now that she was chastened into an appealing gentleness and humility.

He saw that he had been right in thinking her note an apology and an attempt to recall him. And when the Hopkinses left them alone in the parlor after dinner he soon said: "I've come for an answer to that question I asked you."

She hung her head and flushed deeply. "Oh, I wish to get away from all this," she said in a low voice. "I'll be glad to go far away—far as—as you care to take me."

He sat beside her and took her hand. But he made no effort to show "temperament." "I'll go back to Washington and see your father to-morrow—if you wish," he said, after a silence.

"Yes," she replied.

She wrote a long letter to her father as soon as Frothingham was gone—her maid posted it at midnight. So it came to pass that Senator Pope was expecting him. He received him with the benign courtesy he gave to the humblest negro. He liked Frothingham—but, for that matter, it was impossible for him to dislike any member of the human race, even Rontivogli, or any well-disposed domestic animal; ever since he had "gathered his bunch," his content and complacence had, with a few brief pauses, been bubbling over in words and acts of kindness. But when Frothingham said, "I've come to see you, sir, about something of which I and your daughter have been talking," his face clouded with the same look as that with which he had received Rontivogli for the final interview.

Frothingham would not have attributed it to embarrassment had he known Senator Pope better. It was the look he wore whenever the exigencies of fate forced him to do anything unpleasant—whether to refuse a small favor or to cut a rival's throat or to scuttle a financial or political ship. For, being a good man and a lover of smoothness, it pained him exceedingly to cause his fellow-beings any other emotion but happiness. In the present instance the cause of his distress was the discovery that an alliance with nobility would destroy his chances of the Vice-Presidential nomination which he was plotting to get. He had not confided his ambition to his closest political lieutenant. But when Rontivogli was exposed and cast out, his colleague and boss had said to him: "I'm glad to hear you are not going to take a foreign nobleman into your family, Senator. Until the engagement was announced we were hoping you could be induced to make the race for the Vice-Presidency. While an Italian wouldn't have been as bad as an Englishman on account of the Irish vote, I don't think the people would have stood for even an Italian."

That settled any aristocratic ambitions.

"I've come, sir," Frothingham was saying, "to ask your consent to marrying your daughter."

Senator Pope's eyes swam, so strong was his emotion. "I am highly honored, Lord Frothingham. But I cannot give you an answer in so important a matter at once. I must consult with her mother." Mrs. Pope was a shadowy nonentity, flitting nervously in the wake of father and daughter.

He detained Frothingham for a long talk on England and America, and sent him away in an almost jubilant mood—no applicant ever left him downcast. The next day Frothingham got a telegram from Elsie asking him to come to her as soon as he could. He assumed that her father had decided to convey his consent through her, and his spirits rose higher. But the first glimpse of her disturbed him—hers was not the face of a bearer of good news.

"I saw your father," he began.

"Yes," she interrupted. "He has written me."

"Does he consent?"

"Yes and no." She hesitated. "He asked me not to tell, but I know I can trust you. He has been planning to be nominated for Vice-President. And he has found that he can't have the nomination if I marry a titled foreigner—especially an Englishman, because of the Irish. They say it would kill the ticket."

Frothingham retreated behind a vacant look.

"He found it out only a few days ago." She did not feel equal to telling him that her father had learned this fatal fact through the exposure of Rontivogli. "So," she ended, "we couldn't marry until after the election. For he says he's sure of the nomination."

"And when is this election?"

"A year from next fall."

Fortunately Frothingham had not the habit of letting his face speak for him. After a pause he said: "But surely you can persuade him."

"It's useless to try. You don't know him as I do. He seems yielding, but where he's set he's hard as granite."

"Nearly two years," he repeated. And to himself: "Impossible! I might weather six months, but two years—the creditors would laugh at me."

"And I wished to go away at once," she said with a long sigh, looking at him mournfully.

"I—we—can't wait two years," he replied.

"We needn't, need we? We might——" she began, then halted, blushing vividly.

He pretended not to understand—though he did, for he had already thought of that plan.

SHE WENT STRAIGHT TO HER FATHER WITH THE WHOLE STORY

"You know—I'm of age," she went on, seeing that he was not going to help her out. "We—we needn't wait for his consent." He did not change expression, but he was saying to himself, "Here's a mess. She's so mad to get away that she's ready to do anything."

"I think he'd forgive us," she went on. "But even if he didn't, I'd never regret."

He knew that he must say something, must say it quickly, and that it must be appreciative but noncommittal. "I couldn't accept such a sacrifice," he said. "It wouldn't be decent to take advantage of you in that fashion. I know it sounds unromantic to say it, but, by Jove, I don't go in for the sort of romance that makes a fellow a blackguard." And he frankly told enough of his financial difficulties to make the situation clear to her. "I believe you can talk your father round," he ended. "He thinks the world of you."

Elsie smiled—melancholy and cynical. "Yes—so long as I don't interfere. But I know how he feels about the Vice-Presidency. And that—that other affair has made him ——" She shook her head.

This chilled Frothingham. "He'd never forgive her if she ran off with me and lost him the office," he reflected. "Besides, I can't afford to go in without settlements arranged beforehand. I must chuck it—quick as ever I can."

He urged persuading her father and she promised to try. He saw her the next day and the next, both afternoons and evenings. On the third day he did not see her until late in the afternoon—her father had come from Washington and had spent the morning with her. And while they were talking Frothingham was reading a letter from Honoria which had been languidly pursuing him for a week. Part of it was:

> I think you met Cecilia Allerton in Boston. Had you heard of her bolting with Frank Mortimer?

"Frank Mortimer!" he exclaimed, sitting bolt upright in bed in his astonishment. "That brute with the big teeth and the empty head!"

> Her father was angry with her for something or other and treated her cruelly. Every one was pitying her. Frank fell in love with her out of sympathy, and she was so miserable that, when her father wouldn't consent, she ran off with him. Mr. Allerton has changed his will, they say, leaving everything to colleges and charities. But Frank has an income and will have more when his uncle dies, and she has a rich aunt who loathes her father, and so may leave her something.
> Cecilia's quite mad about Frank, now that they're married. Willie Kennefick was dining with us last night. He says she was in love with Stanley Huddiford who died a year or so ago. He says she believes Stanley's soul has entered into Frank! She's a clever girl, they say, but a bit eccentric, like so many of them down Boston way——

Frothingham looked on this news as a direct warning to him. "I'll take no risks with Pope," he said. "It would be sheer madness."

And before he left his rooms he wrote to Barney, fixing the next day but one for his arrival at Chicago. He felt that there was no hope of winning Pope—at least not at present. "If she by chance succeeds after I'm gone—and I'll leave her in a good humor—I can easily return. But I know there's nothing in it."

Failure was mourning in her eyes when he called at five o'clock. They went for a walk, and in reluctant words she told him that her father was immovable, that their only choice was between disobeying him and breaking the engagement. She listened coldly while he explained his position again; when he had finished she sneered. "You are—unanswerable," she said bitterly.

"No doubt I do lack 'temperament,'" he drawled, an ironic gleam on his eyeglass.

She was humble at once. "Oh—I understand," she answered.

But she was too heartsick to talk; and he forgot that he was walking with her, could only feel ruin's arm linked firmly in his. It was dusk when they reached the house.

In the doorway he took her hand and held it.

"I shall see you when I return?" he asked. "Will you answer if I write, now and then?"

"Yes," she replied gratefully.

She sent away the servant who came at her ring. She detained Frothingham, hoping against reason and instinct that he would tear off that tranquil mask of his, would forget his responsibilities as the bearer of a proud and ancient name, and would say: "I care for only you. Come!" Even after he had left her she lingered, holding the door ajar, listening for returning footsteps. At last she shut the door and went forlornly and wearily to her great, lonely, sombre dressing-room. She stood before the mirror of her dressing-table, studying her plain, wistful, woeful little face. "You aren't pretty," she said to it, "and one can't expect much when men think of nothing but looks in a woman." She could no longer see herself for tears. "And I believe he'd have been—at least kind to me." She rang for her maid and began listlessly and mechanically to dress for dinner.

Poor Richard Junior's Philosophy

¶ Envy is admiration in despair.

¶ Progress is slow because it is the work of dreamers.

¶ Experience is a good teacher, but charges like a specialist.

¶ Laws may not make a man good, but they may keep him from being bad.

¶ Friends are made by exchanging services; enemies, by exchanging servants.

¶ The cry "Plagiarist!" was doubtless raised by the first author when the second began to write.

¶ It is concentration that counts. The flame of a candle applied direct is more uncomfortable than the diffused heat of a blast furnace.

Rich Men's Monuments

A NEW YORKER famous for his wealth died about three months ago. Already his family are vigorously bestirring themselves socially. They are entertaining; they entertain; they wear the slight and swiftly curtailing symbols of grief as if they were some sort of a grim, tactless mortuary jest. Many "old-fashioned" people are scandalized. The less serious-minded shrug their shoulders and say: "Life is so short nowadays that there is no time to mourn."

The dead man gave considerable sums to charity; he built for himself a splendid mausoleum; he left a name which might be called on the whole honorable, if one will make liberal allowances for human frailty under extraordinary temptation. But his real monument is the disrespect of his family, unable to maintain even the conventions of grief for so short a time as ninety days after his death, although they are most conventional people and he left them all rich. And he himself built that real monument. He himself is to blame that his name is already a mere legal phrase in the execution of a "last will and testament."

The test of a man's character is his intimate, private relations. What he does before the public—whether in the accumulation or in the distribution of wealth and other kinds of force—is necessarily tainted with vanity and selfishness. But a reputation built up with his family and friends is a genuine reputation, a character. It is the man himself.

This rich man had no character fit to be remembered. True, he did not beat his wife and children; he did not fail to provide for them according to his means. He did everything which the law would have compelled him to do, had he been inclined otherwise. And he did everything which the even more potent sanctions of public opinion compelled. But he would have been arraigned and severely condemned if the courts of this world were able to reach and judge the deepest wrongs, the cruelest injustices.

He neglected his family shamefully in that he gave practically none of his time to them. He knew little about their movements, less about their thoughts. And he aided and abetted his wife in making frivolity and uselessness the chief occupation of herself and their children. In the least important sense of the words he was a husband and a father. In the truly important sense he was neither, though he assumed the responsibilities of both. And he closed his career with what was in the circumstances almost his crowning crime—he left his family the riches which he had never taught them to use, which he had permitted and encouraged them to abuse.

Over against this record must be set his abstention from crime or conspicuous meanness in his business relations and his public gifts. Certainly no one will plead that it is an extraordinary merit for a man to keep from being indicted or jailed. And is there much greater merit in comparatively trifling public gifts given through the carelessness of good nature or the vanity for public applause or through obedience to the current fashion which makes it as much the "proper thing" for a rich man to give of his abundance as for males to wear trousers and females skirts?

If we had the old Egyptian courts of the dead they might here enforce a wholesome lesson upon rich and poor, upon famous and obscure.

Not long ago some one wrote to a philanthropist for a small donation toward a tiny but amazingly helpful hospital. The answer came: "I do a wholesale, not a retail, business." This man, well-meaning though he is, does not realize that a human being can do little good "wholesale," that the highest good, the good which counts for progress, must be done "retail," must be the influence of the individual upon those with whom he comes immediately and personally and intimately into contact. This truth, always important and heretofore usually recognized, is in danger of being forgotten now that the minds and the eyes of men are full of schemes for making everybody intelligent and high-minded by act of legislation or by donation from multi-millionaires.

If Washington had had the personal character of Napoleon as well as perhaps equal military and administrative genius and certainly equal power of enlisting the enthusiasm and devotion of an army, what a tremendous difference it would have made in the history of the world. The greatest work which Washington's character did for his country and for mankind was in shaping and determining the actions, the very thoughts of those who were in intimate personal contact with him. And his fame to-day, as high above that of all the other friends of liberty as is his monument above the housetops of the capital, rests chiefly upon his personal character, during his lifetime shining apparently upon his associates only, but now seen to have illuminated his every act. His genius led his country from dependence. His character led it to sound and enduring liberty.

History, so often shallow of brain and false of tongue, tells us that mankind has been built up chiefly by reputations—by the men who strutted and swaggered. But reason and experience tell us that mankind has been built up chiefly by character—by its man to man, shoulder to shoulder, heart to heart influences. And it is only when the products of intellect are preserved in character that they do not decay and become rank and poisonous.

Of all the pitiful masquerades on this world-stage does any cut a sorrier figure than he who, when he is dead, will be remembered by those who did not know him, will be right speedily and charitably forgotten by those who did? And if his life-account should by chance show a balance to the good, that balance is his mask's, not his.

Back to the Tall Grass

THE cities are growing more and more crowded every year as people are attracted to them from the country, and year by year men are learning better and better the truth that it is in the country that one can live the sanest life.

Thus we can account for the remarkable exodus of city people to the country and the tremendous influx of country people to the city. Brooklyn, for instance, was never so populous as now, and there are whole Jersey suburbs made up to the last man of people who have fled from Brooklyn and its confinements to breathe the fresh air of the Oranges.

It is easy to understand why this is so. The city holds out inducements to the country boy that his own environment will never yield him, and he comes to the metropolis, works at his business as few city boys can work, and in course of time he marries a girl who has also come in from the country to earn her living, and they settle down in a cosy flat up in Harlem or out in Brooklyn, and when his means at last permit he builds himself a house on Riverside Drive or the Park Slope and is happy. His children have all the advantages of the city that were denied him when he was a small boy, and if they do not grow up to as lusty a manhood as his, if they do not amount to as much as he did, there are two reasons for it: they have a rich father and he did not, they were born in the city. Now, it is an undeniable fact that few city men rise high in the councils of the nation. If a great man is wise he is born in the country.

Yes, it is easy to understand why there has been such an exodus to the country. The city boy, born and brought up in brick-walled dwellings, getting a smell of the life-giving country air only during an all too short vacation, envies his country cousin who can breathe ozone all the year round and who has all outdoors for his playground, and he determines to go to the country to live if ever it becomes possible. To be sure he is only a clerk and promotion is likely to stop when he has reached a certain point, but perhaps he can get an ideal little house not too far from the city and lead there an ideal life—and perhaps an ideal girl.

In course of time he meets and marries the latter, also a city denizen but with longings for the country. For the first months, or perhaps years, they must put up with a cramped city flat, although her father owns his house in the vicinity of Washington Square. But in course of time children come to them and then they see the absurdity, the criminality of bringing up children in the city. They remember their own childhood and how physically dwarfing it was, and they go a-househunting in the suburbs and at last find a cosy little house, not so far from New York but that he can commute, and they move out there, and he raises his own vegetables and she goes in for chickens and becomes something of a botanist, and her sons grow up lusty and broad-minded.

And the end of it all is that when the sons are of an age to take up business they go into the city with a country education and they take the prizes from under the very noses of the city-bred children whose country-bred father won the prizes of his generation before, and so the city and the country are changing inhabitants all the time, and who shall say that it is not for the best?

But he is wisest who, having fled from the city as soon as he was able, keeps his children in the country, there to live and die. If every one lived in the country the city would be a very good place in which to live because there would be plenty of room. Pending that time it were better for all city people to live in the country, for there is always lots of room there.

Collectors with Shotguns

IF THE painful experiences of England and Germany in attempting to collect their bills from Venezuela with shotguns shall promote more civilized methods of transacting international business the enterprise will have been well worth its cost. There was at first, even in this country, a general impression that the allies had a good case against Venezuela, but they have succeeded in making the disreputable little Republic a martyr, not only in our eyes but in those of the whole civilized world. And when they get their money it will have cost them in war expenses, loss of trade and general ill-will ten dollars for every dollar they collect.

All this is as it should be. It does not comport with public policy that one member of the family of nations should be encouraged to chase another member with a gun to collect a debt. The peace of the world is more important than the settlement of a trivial account.

Of course it is desirable that a debt should be paid, but there are other and better methods of pressing a debtor than blockades and bombardments. The appropriate penalty for financial dishonesty is loss of credit. If a country refuse to protect foreign investors, let them keep out. On the New York Stock Exchange billions of dollars change hands on no more substantial guaranty than the raising of a finger. The contracts so made are not enforced by guns, or even by courts. Their execution often means ruin to some of the parties. Yet they are never repudiated. Why? Because a broker who refused to carry out his agreements could no longer do business on the Exchange.

If the South American Republics are dishonest, that is the way to treat them. Let foreign capitalists refuse to take their bonds or build their railroads. Let the exchanges of London and Berlin refuse to list their securities. Let them be placarded everywhere as "wildcat." But if the foreign capitalists think they see sufficient profit in South American investments to make it worth while to risk their money in that quarter, let them stand by the chances they have accepted. Let them not charge triple interest to cover risks and then call on their governments to make their investments gilt-edged with warships.

The time is coming when such proceedings as those of England and Germany will be as unknown in polite international society as an irruption of cowboys to "shoot up" the feet of the guests in a drawing-room. In that time, too, of course, the conduct of countries like Venezuela will be very materially improved. We cannot accept the European theory that the Monroe Doctrine requires us to keep the South American republics in order and compel them by force to live up to their obligations. But we might very readily adopt the rôle of a benevolent adviser. We might let the disorderly republics know what we thought they ought to do and warn them when they seemed in danger of getting into trouble. A favorite idea of the cartoonists is to represent Uncle Sam in the guise of the international policeman. That is not a very attractive rôle. It might be better to regard him as the international schoolmaster.

WHAT A GOVERNOR DOES

OLD STATEHOUSE AT SPRINGFIELD

GOVERNOR RICHARD YATES

PRESENT STATEHOUSE AT SPRINGFIELD

By Richard Yates

Governor of Illinois

RICHARD YATES

WAR GOVERNOR OF ILLINOIS

IN THE routine discharge of his official duties every present-day Governor of a great commonwealth is confronted with a task alike peculiar for the variety and volume of its demands and the manner in which he is permitted to accomplish their discharge. If the citizens of each State understood how manifold, exacting and complex are the affairs to which their chief executive must attend and also appreciated the especial handicaps to the dispatch of these duties imposed by tradition and the exigencies of our form of popular government, it cannot be doubted that the people would, as a natural consequence, so alter their demands upon him as greatly to facilitate his official labors. Because of my belief that a better understanding of the work which a modern Governor must discharge will have this desirable result, I consent to give this glimpse of the routine of life in the executive office and mansion.

From Colonial days has descended to the American people a legacy of formalism, in relation to the discharge of the functions of a Governor, patterned after European models. While the limitations of a pioneer life made for a radical degree of "democratic simplicity," in the Statehouse and Executive Mansion of the West a survival of the spirit of polite consideration has always prevailed, no matter how plain and simple the tastes and habits of the citizen occupying them as the official head of the State. And such polite consideration is still expected by the public.

How Executive Labors Have Multiplied

IN THE days when many States contained not more than half their present population, when transportation was so difficult that it required greater time and discomfort for the citizen to make a pilgrimage from an adjoining county to his State capitol than is now needed to go from Chicago to New York; when the telegraph was in its infancy and the telephone unknown; when the postage on a letter was so considerable a tax that communications of this kind were confined to matters of the most pressing importance; when home-seeking left the people little time for office-seeking—in these "good old days" the Governor of a commonwealth had a leisure for the exercise of courtliness and a gallantry of attention to his visitors which is impossible to a modern chief executive of State. In the period of our country's development shortly preceding the Civil War, for example, the daily callers at the office of the Governor of a State in the Middle West were numbered by dozens where now they are counted by scores and hundreds. Then the reception of a telegram was an event in the executive office, while now they are far more numerous than were letters in the antebellum days. To make this contrast between the old days and the new more concrete let me say that in the administration of the war Governor of Illinois, this commonwealth had but four State institutions, three of these being in one city, whereas it now has twenty, the largest of which probably contains more inmates than were in all of the original four. Then Illinois had less than two million inhabitants, with a lack of transportation facilities which made it impossible for more than a few hundred of that number to make their voices heard in the capitol; now there are five million residents within the borders of Illinois who may reach the ear of their executive through the desk telephone which is ever at his hand. What wonder, in view of these marvelous advances in facilities for communication, that the old-time Governors had leisure for the exercise of courtly graces?

Altogether the most onerous labor imposed on a Governor is that of filling the appointive positions at his official disposal. In this task are involved all the complications of party and personal politics: self-interest, the interests of friends and political associates, and the broader interests of the administration and its policy.

In giving a glimpse of this phase of a Governor's work, of its extent and ramifications and of all the demands which it imposes upon the time and energies of the executive, I speak without complaint or criticism, and simply as an observer at first hand of this phase of our political life.

Illinois to-day places at the disposal of her government a total of 2950 positions. Of these about 2450 do not pay an annual salary or wages above $600 and are, on the ground of their comparative unimportance, passed by the Governor to be filled at the discretion of his more responsible appointees. But on this score he often counts without his host. All things are relative, and the position paying only $50 a month is regarded by the small farmer or the laborer from the "back town" of a remote and thinly populated county as quite as desirable as the place paying $5000 to $10,000 is desirable to the city resident. More than this, he feels that he has a right to just as prompt an assurance that he will receive this party recognition as that given to the candidate for the more lucrative position. Consequently he refuses to wait until the latter has been appointed and finds time to select the recipients of his official favor. This view of the matter brings him at once to the office of the newly elected Governor, with whom he requests an interview. He has as much right to such an audience as has the politician who is after the more responsible appointment, and he cannot be refused, either in justice or in good policy. Probably neither the county judge nor the county clerk in his community receives a salary larger than that of the position for which the farmer or villager is an applicant, and the compensation is measured by this standard.

A Mountain of Patronage to be Leveled

EXCLUSIVE of teachers in the normal schools, physicians in State hospitals, experts in the grain-inspection office, and other specialists who are properly regarded as not subject to political removal, there are only 150 positions of importance at the disposal of the Governor. As these carry salaries of respectable size, together with dignity and influence, the contest for them is more general, spirited and persistent than any save those familiar with this phase of partisan strife can possibly realize. Broadly speaking, 6000 applications for appointment were filed and urged upon the consideration of the Governor. If he was not able personally to examine and pass upon all these documents, he fell far short of meeting the expectations of the applicants and their friends.

These applications, however, formed merely the foundation of the structure of influence and persuasion builded by these industrious political architects. Letters and petitions of indorsement followed until the total number of communications directly related to the original applications exceeded 100,000. All these were expected to pass under the eye of the executive; and a very large share of them did receive his personal consideration. To classify and file this volume of correspondence requires the labor of a force of clerks, and even the formal acknowledgment of the most important communications of the mass involves weeks of work by responsible assistants.

No wide-awake American politician is ever content to rest his hopes on the convincing power of any written indorsement, no matter what may be the weight of authority behind it. He is alive to the advantages of a personal interview and regards his documentary application and indorsements much as the lawyer regards the written brief. They are formal memoranda to be enforced and amplified by the more convincing eloquence of the oral argument, by the intimate appeal of eye and voice. Also he seems to cherish the conviction that if he can look the executive squarely in the eye, the man who holds the appointive power will not be able to deny his request.

Why the Governor is Less Fortunate than the President

UNFORTUNATELY the Governors of most States come into office almost simultaneously with the convening of the legislatures of their commonwealth. This results in a congestion of affairs, making it necessary for him to fill his list of appointments at the time when he should be free to give his whole attention to the course of legislation and to other duties of an official rather than political nature. Unlike the President of the United States, he does not have time, before the assembling of the legislative body, to dispose of the complicated and burdensome task of filling the offices and formulating his policies as to the routine of his work. Instead he is compelled to discharge both of these heavy lines of work at the same time and, if it is his first term, to do this before he has had time fairly to take his bearings in a position full of grave responsibilities.

Not only does the assembling of the legislature bring a double official pressure upon the shoulders of the executive, but it also calls to his doors a multitude of casual visitors, mainly from country districts, who come to the capital city only in the course of the session. The special pressure to which I allude relates to the matter of appointments as well as to legislation. The Senate, for example, is designed to act as a check upon the official deeds of the Governor. His appointments, of the "nominative class," must be confirmed by that body before they become operative. It is no secret that this branch of the General Assembly or Legislature, which has a comparatively small number of members—say fifty to sixty—is, to all practical purposes, run by a very small coterie of men who have the gift of leadership. Depend upon it that not only have these leaders agreed among themselves as to the appointment which they will ask at the hands of the executive, but such an agreement has been reached before the legislature is organized. Also, it is safe to assume that these political generals have not failed to file claim to the disposal of any important appointments which they do not understand to be otherwise apportioned in accordance with the plans of the party organization. After the Senator who is a follower and not a leader, but who belongs to the party of the administration, votes day after day for the confirmation of the Governor's appointments, he is likely to say to himself: "Why should I sit here day after day and vote good appointments to the friends of other Senators while I get no favors of this sort to distribute among my own followers?"

Reasoning in this manner for a day or two he calls upon the Governor, urges a friend for an appointment and, unless he receives encouragement, perhaps intimates that in the future the executive may not find it so easy to get appointments confirmed. If the Governor has sufficient courage and is making an equitable distribution of party favors, he need have no fear of this kind of pressure; but it makes an added problem for him to deal with, and one which he would not have, at least to so great an extent, if the legislature did not convene almost immediately following his election, which is always attended by the excitement of a campaign.

Keeping an Eye on Current Legislation

ESPECIALLY is it within the power of the chairmen of the committees on appropriations, judiciary and several other important interests to make strong demands upon the executive, who must see to it that his administration is not hampered for funds properly to conduct the State institutions. On the other hand, he is naturally interested to protect his administration from the charge of a too lavish expenditure of public funds through unwise appropriations, for he may be sure that, rightly or wrongly, the people will hold him responsible for the acts of the members of his own party in the General Assembly.

Although the Governor may not have in the legislature a single "administration measure" or bill to which he is committed, he can scarcely expect to exercise his full duty in an intelligent manner without keeping a close watch upon the course of legislation. It is not enough that he should understand the contents of the bills which are finally passed and presented to him for signature or veto, or are left to become laws without either; he must have also a fair knowledge of the antecedents of the more important measures; he must know by whom they are inspired, the motives and the men behind them, through what hands have they passed and by whom have they been amended, championed or assailed. If he does not keep in touch with this kind of information he will find himself sadly at sea in the matter of party leadership and responsibility.

This kind of surveillance he must accomplish through the watchfulness of trusted friends and lieutenants, who are either members of the Senate and House or who are in attendance as alert observers. Then, too, he must have a working knowledge of the bills and measures which are finally passed and come to him for approval. All this might seem to be comparatively a simple matter—and so it would be if the executive had unlimited time in which to pass upon these measures.

The Burden of Pardon Petitions

Although the work of making his appointments is the most burdensome and demands far more time than other features of the Governor's work, especially in the early portion of his term, it is not by any means the duty which will put him under the greatest stress. Consideration of petitions for pardon imposes the most wearing strain to which he is subjected. It is one thing to refuse a man appointment to a coveted political office and quite another to turn from the prayers of mothers, wives and children pleading that the life of a man under sentence of death be spared. His responsibility, as the day for the execution approaches, becomes very depressing to the executive who is possessed of the average amount of sympathy. Let me give the experience of a single day in reference to pardons.

Entering my office in the morning I found the father of a young prisoner waiting for me. This man's son had been convicted of stealing goods from his employer. The theft was not made in a moment of sudden temptation, but was carefully planned and systematically executed. In order to dispose of his plunder the culprit had corrupted the integrity of a fifteen-year-old boy. This was the kind of a criminal I was asked to release from a lengthy prison term.

With him the father brought a request for clemency from the trial judge, the State's attorney, several members of the jury which had brought in the verdict of guilty, and from numerous men of high standing and strong influence. With such indorsements the father expected the success of his mission; but the facts of the case were against the justice of his plea, and the painful interview was closed with a denial of the petition.

Scarcely had this matter been disposed of when a woman in middle-life, leading a little girl, entered the office. The mother was evidently very poor as her dress was of coarse material resembling blue denim. At once the little girl threw herself upon the floor at my feet and sobbed: "Oh, please give me back my papa." To the prayer of the child the mother added all the pleadings that the heart of a faithful wife could devise, beseeching me that I should spare the extreme penalty in the case of her husband because of the many virtues which her heart imputed to him.

This scene was keenly distressing, but when I left the office and walked back to the Executive Mansion another awaited me. There, sitting outside on the steps, I found a most pitiable old woman who greeted me with the words, "I've come, sir, to see you about my baby—my poor baby in the prison." The "baby," so I soon learned, was twenty-four years of age. At the mention of his name I clearly recalled the facts of his case: that all the evidence showed that he was a confirmed highwayman of a cruel and desperate type. But to the wretched old woman before me this hardened criminal was a "baby."

There was but one thing to do, and that I did: to tell her, without explanation, that there was no hope and that the law must take its course.

Social Duties and Harassments

Regarding the volume of correspondence which passes through the office of the executive, it is well to begin, as he must, with the acknowledgment of letters and telegrams of congratulation. If it be his first term, and if his State is a large one, he will find that the number of these communications will probably exceed five thousand, and more likely will approach the ten-thousand mark.

In the ordinary course of business, judging from personal experience, the executive office will send out an average of one hundred letters, a very considerable share of which demand in some degree the personal attention of the Governor. Then he must deal with a considerable volume of correspondence, such as reports, relating to the management of State institutions and other departments of the public service. These, in Illinois, will amount to 150 formal communications each month. Add to this the daily presentation of requisitions from executives of other States. In former days these demands to surrender into the custody of an officer from another State the person of a supposed criminal were seldom investigated or denied, but were generally allowed on the grounds of State courtesy. This practice has been greatly modified, and no requisition is now allowed in Illinois without examination into the merits of the case.

Not fewer than five invitations are each day received at this executive office, and of these about eight a month are accepted. In this matter, as in many others, the Governor of a State finds himself between two fires. If he habitually denies these requests for his presence at public or social functions he is subjected to sharp criticism by those he is obliged to disappoint.

On the other hand, the acceptance of any considerable number of such invitations will involve numerous trips into more or less remote parts of the State. Inevitably many citizens coming to the executive office while he is absent on these trips are disappointed and inconvenienced, and are prone to observe that if the Governor would give less time to social and semi-social affairs and more attention to the business of the State he would render more service to the public.

In this connection it may not be out of place to observe that the new executive is likely to be surprised at the curious nature of many requests which come to him because of his official position. These are interesting as indicating the unique conception of the utility of a Governor which some persons entertain.

The Part of a Tactful Wife

Let no executive's wife be surprised to receive eight hundred requests to send "only one common handkerchief," while the committees in charge of popular "sock socials" do not hesitate to send miniature bits of footwear to the official head of the commonwealth with the request that he send them back with an inclosure of coppers. Also, he will not escape requests for his autograph on patch-quilts and other kindred articles. But those requests do not assume the serious proportions which characterize the demands for private charity to which he is constantly subjected.

It is the custom of most Governors to hold weekly receptions during the session of the legislature. These functions are almost invariably attended in large numbers, and demand not a little of the executive's time. Another social claim upon his time is in connection with the meetings of the State Militia, when custom properly demands that he shall entertain the officers of the organization of which he is commander-in-chief. These are pleasant duties, but they require time, and help to swell the list of obligations to which he must give his personal attention and presence.

Still another requirement is that the Governor shall pay at least an annual visit to each State institution. These are scattered throughout the State, and as Illinois contains twenty of these institutions, each requiring a visit of one to three days in length, it will be seen that this demand on the Governor's time is not a light one.

Comparatively seldom is the executive who occupies a State mansion able to take a luncheon or dinner in the privacy of his family. Guests at the board are the regular order of the day, and these vary in number from two or three to a score or even more. He is glad to welcome them and takes delight in their presence, but this does not alter the fact that family privacy and moments of personal leisure are almost unknown to the average executive of a large State. He keeps open house and should do so, for his house is the people's house, and many a homesick legislator comes to regard it as a second home, where he has a welcome to the atmosphere of family life.

Most happy and fortunate is that Governor who brings to the executive mansion a wife who presides with grace, tact and efficiency over its social and domestic affairs. Her duties are scarcely lighter than his own, but their successful discharge gives cheer and pleasure to hundreds of guests, and at the same time exerts a most powerful influence upon the career of her husband; and the place which a State administration occupies in the regard of the people is often determined almost as much by the mistress of the mansion as by the official and political acts of the executive.

BORAX
CLEARS THE COMPLEXION

Your pores are full of soap
This injures your complexion

When you wash your face and hands, nine times out of ten soap is left behind in the skin. It gets down into the pores and resists your efforts to rinse it out. When the face is dried the soap is still there. The natural result is apparent in the thousands of poor complexions we see about us. Usually they belong to people whose pores are full of soap.

If you add a quarter teaspoonful of BORAX your basin of water will be "softened" so that the soap becomes much more soluble in it and is quickly rinsed out of the pores, leaving the skin in a healthy state.

ANY WOMAN WHO USES BORAX IN THIS MANNER WILL SEE AN ALMOST IMMEDIATE IMPROVEMENT IN HER COMPLEXION.

FIRST — Add a quarter teaspoonful of borax to a basin of warm water. Wash your face in this water with soap and a wash rag and rinse it thoroughly in the same water.

SECOND — Rinse your face with clear cold water.

Your physician will recommend BORAX for this purpose. Hands should be cleansed in the same way without the wash rag. They will clean quicker and stay clean longer because there is no soap left in the pores to catch dirt.

There are dangerous adulterations of borax sold. Pure borax is sold in packages under the name

"20 MULE TEAM BORAX."

To be had of your druggist or grocer. If neither your druggist nor grocer can supply you send us their names with 20 cents in stamps to cover cost and postage and we will supply you with a pound package direct.

Our booklet, "Borax—Come In," goes more into details and gives many valuable suggestions. Sent on receipt of a 2-cent stamp. Address Dept. E, Pacific Coast Borax Company, Chicago.

How Shall a Young Man Educate Himself?

By WILLIAM MATHEWS

I HAVE been asked to write for THE SATURDAY EVENING POST an article answering this question—How can a young man who is an employee or in business for himself, and who must work hard during the daytime, best cultivate his mind in the evenings and in the odd moments that he can seize? The question seems an easy one to answer, but is really difficult, because to do so is like prescribing a medicine or regimen, not for John Jones or William Smith, whom one personally knows, but for a man of whose ancestry, bodily constitution, idiosyncrasies and environment one knows nothing. Still, as there are certain general rules of health which all men must observe, or suffer from disease and weakness, so there are certain general rules of self-culture the observance of which is vital to success.

I begin by saying of that much-abused term "self-culture," that, strictly speaking, there never was, and never will be, a "self-educated" man in the history of the world. Self-education, without the help of others, is, indeed, inconceivable; for in that case the individual must have been separated from his very birth from all communion with his fellow-men. Nay, more; he must have invented his own language and his own alphabet, and must have achieved singly in a lifetime what his fellow-men collectively have been occupied in doing for six thousand or more years. Nevertheless, there have been men, like Samuel Lee, of Lognor, in Shropshire, England, or James Ferguson, of Keith, Scotland, who have possessed themselves of an education from its lowest to its highest branches with so little foreign aid that they form a class by themselves, and, relatively to the tutored class, may be called self-educated.

These men, who have stood to themselves in the double relation of teacher and pupil, have sprung up under the most unpropitious circumstances, and, like certain sturdy plants, in spite of unfavorable soil and climate, almost without sunshine or shower, have reached a glorious maturity of intellect. Thirsting for knowledge as the hart panteth after the water brooks; urged on by a burning, insatiable desire for self-improvement; struggling like the chained eagle for its native heavens, they have converted obstacles into stepping-stones to self-advancement, discouragements into helps to progress, and fought their way upward, in the face of wind and sun, to the heights where "fame's proud temple shines afar," and where, encircled with a splendor of their own creation, they are gazed at with wonder by their fellow-men.

Limiting the meaning of "self-education" to mental culture, every graduate of Oxford or Harvard is, to a large extent, self-educated. Every college student has two educations: one which his professors give him, and another—by far the more important—which he gives himself. An undergraduate may have the most learned, accomplished and skillful instructors, who may aid, encourage and stimulate him, but they cannot think for him. They may simplify what is abstruse, explain what is difficult, and illuminate what is obscure; but they cannot relieve the scholar from the necessity of personal mental effort. They cannot perform in his stead the mental operations which are necessary to train and discipline his mind, enrich it with knowledge, energize its faculties—in short, gymnaze it, as athletic exercises do the body—things which constitute the very essence of education. All these things the learner must do for himself.

I would say, then, to every young man who aspires to self-culture: You have everything to encourage and stimulate, nothing to depress or dishearten you. Between the mightiest and the meanest of men there is no difference so great as that which is wrought by culture, and that culture may be yours. Having learned the alphabet, you have a key which will unlock every door to knowledge. It was a saying of that wonderful boy, Chatterton, that God had sent His creatures into the world with arms long enough to reach anything, if they would choose to be at the trouble. You have all the faculties which have been possessed by men of the highest order of mind. These faculties are as susceptible of culture in your case as in theirs. They did not attain their high mental culture without long and patient toil; and the same

Good Manners

By Mail

Seventeen of the most famous social writers in the country, including: Mrs. John Sherwood, Mrs. Burton Kingsland, Adelaide Gordon, Mrs. Ella Wheeler Wilcox, Mrs. Harriet Hubbard Ayer, Mrs. Margaret E. Sangster, Mrs. John A. Logan and Marion Harland, have just prepared a course of instruction in correct social usage for the guidance of all who wish to appear well and those who wish their children to appear well.

It teaches the correct thing to do, to say, to write, to wear on all occasions. A complete guide to perfect ease of manner. Worth many times its cost as a work of reference. Good manners are to-day essential to either business or social success: a parent's duty.

"noble rage" for self-improvement, the same fervid energy and persistent toil will build up and invigorate your intellect as it did theirs.

Make Time for Reading

If you ask what is the best means of carrying on the work of self-culture, I answer, it is reading. Books are the great storehouses or granaries of nearly all the knowledge which the observation, the experience, and the researches of the human race have been accumulating during successive ages. They offer us, without cost, the intellectual stores which myriads of laborers have been gathering in days and nights of toil for thousands of years. There is no possible subject on which they will not enlighten you, if you crave information. Do you say that you have little time for reading—that you are the servant of others, and are engaged during the entire day in business or manual toil? I answer, in the words of Channing, that an earnest purpose finds time or makes time. It seizes on spare moments, and turns larger fragments of leisure to golden account. Have you not as much time for study as had Heyne, the great classical scholar of Germany, who struggled thirty-two years with the bitterest poverty, and who, when trying to educate himself, slept for six months but two nights a week? Have you not as many hours for reading as had Samuel Lee, a miserably poor carpenter's apprentice in England, who, though noted only for his dullness at the charity school, acquired, while working for his master, a dozen languages, including Greek, Latin, Hebrew, Aramaic, Arabic, Persian and Hindustani, and became a professor in the University of Cambridge and one of the profoundest linguists of Europe?

There is hardly any man who may not have some portion of the day at command—an early hour in the morning, fifteen minutes at noon, and an hour or two in the evening; and it is simply astonishing how fruitful of improvement such hours and bits and snatches of time become, when eagerly seized and wisely used. An hour only a day, given to the study of some favorite subject, will insure you unexpected accumulations of knowledge. Read with care but ten pages a day, omitting Sundays, and at the end of a year you will have made your own the hived wisdom of ten volumes of three hundred pages each, even after allowing thirteen days for illness and other interruptions—enough for the mastery of two histories or sciences! Choose, then, without delay, some valuable branch of study; fasten down upon it, and cleave to it until you feel that you have mastered it. Select for this purpose a few of the best and most substantial books on the subject, whose contents have been sifted and approved by the best judges; read them slowly and deliberately, seizing on their pith and marrow, and pausing from time to time to reflect on what you have read, and to fasten it in the memory. Try this plan for a twelvemonth, and see if at its end you have not added a cubit to your intellectual stature!

"But how and where am I to begin?" some young man may ask. "What subject and what books am I to study first?" I answer: Begin with the subject in which you are most interested. If it is history, begin with that. No study can be more profitable or more delightful. "If a man is in a strait," says Carlyle, "a very good indication as to choice, perhaps the best you could get, is a book you have a great curiosity about. You are then in the best possible condition to improve by that book." It matters little what you take up first. Choose the history of some central country which has had constant relations with the other countries of Europe—as France, for example. In learning its history you will necessarily learn much of the history of other countries. Get Guizot's History of France, in eight octavo volumes, which is profusely illustrated and cheap. White's History of France in one volume, read afterward, will serve to recall the leading incidents in Guizot. If you wish for a more thorough knowledge, Martin's History may be read. As your curiosity is excited about celebrated Frenchmen, turn aside occasionally from the history, and read their lives in the Encyclopædia Britannica, or some trustworthy biographical dictionary, or in some of the brief biographies which the press is now multiplying. Lanfrey's Napoleon, by a hostile writer, and Count Segur's history of the campaign against Russia, will be found intensely interesting, and the same may be said of Gardner's history of the disastrous Waterloo campaign. Finally, read Carlyle's pregnant, dramatic and thrilling History of the French Revolution.

In some respects Motley's vivid and picturesque histories of The Dutch Republic and

The United Netherlands, on account of their inspiring, dramatic treatment of the themes, would be the best works to begin with. A similar remark might be made regarding Macaulay's History of England. For ancient history, Arnold's History of Rome is excellent to start with.

To acquire a foreign language one needs (except for the pronunciation) only a grammar and a dictionary, and a few well-edited textbooks. Samuel Lee, the self-educated linguist of whom I have spoken, had less than these, for his textbooks had meagre notes and other helps. In buying textbooks—and indeed, books generally—get the best-printed ones you can afford. If you afterward change your books for finer editions, you lose the advantage of a local memory, and will turn less readily to a passage. In reading history, have always a good Atlas at your elbow for reference. Without such reference, history is, in a large degree, unintelligible.

Read Deeply, Not Widely

Read much, but not many books. Read actively, and not passively; with an independent, questioning spirit, and not with a slavish deference to the author. To master a book thoroughly, frequent reviews will be necessary. Only thus can you fix its facts and ideas firmly in the memory. There are few first-rate books which will not yield more profit on a second and even a third perusal than at the first. Many eminent men have had their pet authors with whom they have been in daily communion—never weary of brooding over their well-worn pages, and treasuring their imperishable thoughts. The Germans have a saying that nothing is so prolific of improvement as a little learned well. Everything completely learned is a spur to further acquisition; while all cloudiness and half-knowledge dishearten the learner and cut the nerve for study.

Here I should like to explain why so few persons remember well what they read; but I must limit myself to naming five things which must be done to get a retentive memory: 1. Have a clear apprehension of what you wish to remember. 2. Methodize your acquisitions. In studying a subject you will fix its facts or principles most firmly in the mind by mastering its parts in a natural and orderly sequence, from the easiest to the most difficult, so that each shall be a nucleus or basis for more in an endless series. Study of this kind is like a well-built staircase, by which one can climb to a great height with a minimum of fatigue, lifting the body only a few inches at a time. 3. Attend closely to what you read. Concentrate your mind exclusively upon it; hence, to remember, you must be interested in what you read. Study that which nature has fitted you to learn—that which you delight in learning. Never lash your brain, or force yourself to learn what you have little or no capacity for learning. Study that which is adapted to your nature, and learn it step by step, without hurry, and you will gain a maximum of mental culture with a minimum of cerebral fatigue.

Avoid everything like cram. Value study by the insight it gives you into subjects, not by the number of books you have read. A few thoughtfully read books, forged at the hearts and fashioned by the intellects of great men like Shakespeare, Bacon, Milton, Goethe, Pascal or Dante, will do more to invigorate and enrich the mind than a whole library of third-rate productions. 4. Re-read and review, again and again, what you read. "It is best knocking in the nail overnight," says Dr. Thomas Fuller, "and clinching it in the morning." 5. Keep your body in good condition. The impressions made upon the mental tablet are like those made upon the photographer's plate. If the chemicals are good, and the plate is in a condition to receive the impressions, the picture will be good; otherwise it will be dull, brown or indistinct.

Finally, remember that culture—genuine culture—means hard work, and, therefore, whatever subject you study, make it a rule to master it. Bring all your powers of mind to bear upon it; go round its entire circumference; probe to the bottom of it; pluck out the very heart of it. If you meet a difficulty which menaces your progress, look on it as an athlete with whom you are to wrestle. Face it boldly and resolutely; survey it on all sides; then close and grapple with it till by your prowess you have reduced it to powder. The struggle is the very thing you want; it will invigorate your intellectual muscles. A throw upon your back will do you good. It may leave you for the moment breathless and exhausted; but you will rise up to the next onset with a firmer step and a surer hand.

The Best Shakespeare

NOWADAYS no one asks "Shall I read Shakespeare?" That Shakespeare's plays shall be read if one intends to read at all is a matter on which there can be no discussion. You cannot afford to be ignorant of Shakespeare's Works or to possess a poor edition. A set of Shakespeare—the best and most accurate edition—should be the corner-stone of your library. You can buy the best Shakespeare for what you would have to pay for a poor one, and the best edition has the advantage of being in itself a complete Shakespearean Library. The coupon in the lower right-hand corner will bring you a set of the best edition on approval, and three cents a day will keep it.

Sets in 13 Illustrated Volumes. Size of Volumes 8 x 5½ inches

The International Edition

In accuracy, clearness, convenience of arrangement, and in all that goes to constitute an ideal Shakespeare, the International Edition holds first place. This edition reproduces the famous Cambridge text, which has been for forty years the standard text of Shakespeare. To this text have been added Prefaces giving the history of each play; Critical Comments on the plays and the characters, taken from the works of great Shakespearean scholars; Glossaries following each play and defining every difficult word; Explanatory and Critical Notes, which make clear every obscure passage. There are over 200 Illustrations, many of them being rare woodcuts of Shakespeare's time. There are also numerous full-page chromatic plates in colors and photogravures on Japan vellum. Included with the set is a complete Life of Shakespeare containing the facts actually known about him, by Israel Gollancz, with critical estimates of Shakespeare's genius by Walter Bagehot, Leslie Stephen, and Thomas Spencer Baynes. Shakespeare's Works—everything he wrote—are given complete, including the Sonnets and Poems. A set forms a complete Shakespearean Library.

SETS SENT ON APPROVAL

We have just completed a new and limited edition which will be distributed through our Shakespeare Club at half price and on easy terms of payment. The advantages of ordering through the Club are that you have the entire set shipped to you for leisurely examination without costing you a cent; you can retain it by paying the low Club price, which is just half the regular price, and you may pay in little, easy payments of $1.00 a month. The prices through the Club are $22.00 for a set in half-leather binding and $18.00 for the cloth binding—payable at the rate of $1.00 a month. The regular prices of this edition are $44.00 and $36.00. Cut out the coupon and mail it to us to-day. We will send you a set, express prepaid, for examination, and if it is not satisfactory you may return it at our expense. Don't wait too long before sending the coupon, for the edition may be exhausted before you obtain a set.

FREE Each subscriber for this edition will receive, free, a complete Index of Shakespeare's Works, by means of which the reader can find any passage in any of the Plays or Poems. No Commentary of Shakespeare can be bought for less than $6.00, and this volume is worth more to the reader than a Commentary. We will also give with this edition a Plan for the Study of each play, with Study Questions and Suggestions. No other full and systematic Plan of Study for all the plays can be bought for less than $4.00.

Literary Folk Their Ways and Their Work

GIVE THE PUN A CHANCE — A well-meaning acquaintance of excellent descent who now shows a desire to reform.

¶In this day and generation, should any young person so far forget himself as to emit a pun—he takes his life in his hands. We all know that, and hence are constantly on guard to avoid even the appearance of evil. This is due not so much to any inherent heinousness in the pun itself as to the healthy revolt which followed an unfortunately artificial period in literature and furniture upholstery when every one punned on everything most distressingly.

But that was a long while ago. Surely society and literature are pretty well purged of the pun evil now. It is about time the proper pun came into its own again. The pun is not so bad—provided it isn't a bad pun; there are puns and puns. There are worse jokes. Even if the pun were the lowest form of wit, which is merely one man's opinion—I don't remember whose, clearly not Shakespeare's and probably no humorous person's, else he would not have dogmatized about humor—it is better to have a low form of wit than no wit at all. Did you ever observe a gathering of old companions of the former generation, a family reunion at Christmas or at a wedding of their children? What a lot of fun they get out of it; and the puns they make! But look at the self-conscious younger generation, sitting at the other end of the table thinking about themselves, or at best half whispering their so-called new humor, occasionally turning an ancient apothegm inside out or standing a proverb on its head—which are only perverted puns, after all. But if by chance there should pop out an accidental, old-fashioned, broad-faced, Simon-pure pun, such as produces a hearty haw-haw from the elemental old people, the rest would turn and rend the malefactor with jeers and sneers. And it is noticeable that those who cannot distinguish a pitiful pun from a worthy one always groan the loudest. They have learned that punning is bad form and a pun is to be pounced upon, therefore they pounce with a consistency which might suggest a lack of humor.

Down with the bad pun, and as for the persistent punster—away with him, of course. But the harmless pun—let it pass; it won't hurt you, it may divert some one else, and the habit of tolerance, once established, may in time cure the cursed malady of ingrowing thoughts, make our wits more supple, teach a tongue-tied generation to be less afraid of itself, more prone to use the gift of speech in the hearty, happy, wholesome way of the Elizabethan time, and thus add to the gayety of families, if not of nations. "We've only got one life to live," as a famous punster once remarked, "and we'll be a long time dead." Give the pun a chance.

THE BOOKMAN UP TO DATE — Some instances of the effect of the strenuous life on the peaceful pursuivant of letters.

¶Has the old-fashioned bookman disappeared—the little, snuffy, shambling, near-sighted man, a sort of shop-worn Charles Lamb, whose approval of your purchase spoke in every accent, and whose deprecation of your erring taste frowned from every feature? Possibly he may still linger in out-of-the-way second-hand retreats, far from the cry of the Best Sellers, but the department store knows him not, and even those shops where books only are sold are strangers to his countenance. A young man who applied for a position the other day as clerk in a university book-shop was refused because he confessed, under cross-examination, to a fondness for reading, and in book-shops the business of clerks is to know names, titles and prices, not books.

However, it occasionally happens that not even names and titles are carefully conned. It would grieve the soul of a well-known poet to learn that a customer had been informed by a satisfied and self-sufficient clerk that no

FLORAL BUTTERFLY PLANT

No plant possesses so many good points as do these two glorious new Commelinas. Of graceful trailing habit, superb for carpet bedding or for hanging pots. In pots they bloom every day in the year. In the garden from May until frost, showing daily scores of large winged butterfly-like blossoms. Color (No. 1) the most beautiful blue to be found in any flower. A shade so exquisitely lovely as to baffle description. Thrives in sun or shade, wet or dry, rich or poor soil; as easily raised as a weed from seed or cuttings, grows rapidly, flowers at once, and propagates so easily that plants are very cheap. Blooms in 50 days from seed.

No. 1—Exquisite Blue, like tropical Butterflies.
No. 2—Rosy Pink, in other respects like No. 1.

such person as he, the author, existed, and—— But indeed the story is too good to spoil, and, even at the expense of the author's pride, it must be told.

"Carman, Carman, Bliss Carman. There is no such name. What you are thinking of is Carmen Sylva."

Now in that young man there was a certain sense of justice. What he took from Carman he gave to Carmen. So, too, with another clerk—perhaps his brother—who in response to an inquiry for Dante Gabriel Rosetti's poems produced five rather bulky volumes, three of which on examination proved to be Dante and the other two Christina Rosetti! But what shall be said of the iniquity of this culprit?

Scene: A Broadway book-shop.

(Near-sighted customer holding up a volume): "Is this Number Five John Street?"

(Obliging clerk): "No, you'll find that downtown. Take the car."

Same scene an hour later.

(Second customer): "Do you sell With Edged Tools?"

"No, madam; this is not a hardware shop."

B. WENDELL AND THE BUSY BEE—A study in literary values by the Harvard professor now lecturing at Oxford.

¶He was a clever Frenchman who said that our illusions are like our teeth: we loose our first ones to make way for our second ones, but they, in their turn lost, are replaced only with false ones. One wonders in just what state of recovery Professor Barrett Wendell finds himself from the rude shock they gave him at Oxford; but whatever it may have done to his illusions it left his sense of humor untouched; he tells the story himself.

Mr. Wendell, it should be known, has this year been absent from his chair to give a course of lectures at Oxford. Upon the delivery of his first lecture he was impressed, even inspired, by the quality of rapt attention his audience accorded him. He spoke of it later in gratitude to one of his hearers. Now, whether the answer was only an example of the proverbial English tact or whether it was malice on the instant you must judge for yourself. "Yes," it came, prompt as the beggar's cap, "we were positively hypnotized with fear that bee would sting you. He must have been circling over your head for twenty minutes."

Mr. Wendell is inclined to think that the bee left his sting, after all, and he confesses with wry good nature that it has proved a hard one to draw. In all justice it should be said that Mr. Wendell's lectures are never dull; when they are not enlivening the boys see to it that they shall be enlivened. The story has been told before of how they drove him from the lecture-room of the Fogg Art Museum by detonating a battery of alarm-clocks at intervals of ten minutes each—first one behind the stereopticon screen, then a second one somewhere back of him up under the alto relievo moulding of the ceiling, and finally one in his desk itself. Certainly it was impolite, but it must be admitted that the results were fully up to the expectations of the perpetrators, who never revealed their identity to the class, with whom—as with all his classes—Mr. Wendell is deservedly popular. They were generally execrated by the undergraduates at large, and their impertinence is only recalled here as a tentative explanation of why Mr. Wendell's ears, used to harsher alarums, were not wakened by the warlike buzzing of the busy bee.

THE GENTLE ART OF NODDING—Which contemporary literature would seem to show is not confined to Homer.

¶Some one has claimed that Mr. R. W. Chambers has been taking liberties with the moon. Another critical soul is moved thereby to point out that Rider Haggard in one of his stories places the crescent moon, as well as the glow of sunrise, in the East, and that he also describes a solar eclipse as lasting half an hour, whereas its usual duration is about eight minutes. Stevenson brings up the new moon at two a. m., although as a matter of fact the sun rises first. But these slips are less obvious than two famous examples. In his account of Dotheboy's Hall Dickens describes a boy as weeding the garden in one sentence and presently states that it was freezing weather.

In the good old Swiss Family Robinson the dog Bill, constantly mentioned as Bill, finally produces a litter of puppies. The gentle art of nodding is not confined to Homer alone.

Oddities & Novelties of Every-Day Science

SUBSTANTIAL advantages are expected to accrue from certain investigations which Government chemists are about to undertake respecting the composition of patent foods for infants and invalids, of which there are now so many on the market. The purity of most of them is not seriously suspected, but it is desired to know exactly what they contain and how wholesome they are.

Foods of this kind, ordinarily, are predigested — that is to say, prepared in such a way as to require a minimum of effort on the part of the consumer to assimilate them. An acid may be employed to accomplish the artificial digestion of the starch in a product of the sort, and when such is the case it is worth while to ascertain whether any of the acid, or enough to be injurious, remains in the substance as sold. This, of course, can be found out only by scientific analysis.

Again, protein — the stuff, in a food, that goes to make muscle and blood — is predigested by a ferment. The question is just how the material treated is modified by the ferment used, and whether its wholesomeness is lessened by the process. And finally, it is worth while to inquire whether the nutritious properties of the ingredients have been diminished by the methods of manufacture.

Many will say that this investigation suggests paternalism on the part of Uncle Sam, especially as regards the babies, but the results obtained will be highly appreciated by physicians, as well as by mothers, and will be published a few months hence, with names of manufacturers and of products given.

The Home of the Emerald

THOUGH so impoverished financially, the Republic of Colombia, with which Uncle Sam has just made a bargain for the digging of a canal across the Isthmus of Panama, possesses a great source of wealth in its emerald mines, which produce the finest gems of this kind in the world. The Muzo mine has been famous since the year 1555, and is owned by the Government, which leases the property for periods of five years to the highest bidder at public auction. For reasons not explained, the value of the output has always been kept a secret, but it must represent hundreds of thousands of dollars annually.

The veins in which the emeralds occur run irregularly through a formation of slate rock, and the gems are found usually in pockets. One stone weighing, in the rough, 2330 carats was taken out a few years ago and sent abroad to be cut. Most of them go, for this purpose, to British India, where some of the finest ones are purchased by native rajahs, the others of high grade being shipped to Europe for sale.

To get out the emeralds hydraulic power is used to wash away the top soil, leaving bare the slate rock, which is cut away with long iron bars handled by natives. Powder is employed for blasting where it can be used without danger of injuring the stones. No precautions are taken to prevent stealing, except that the work-people are selected with great care. After extraction the gems are classified and shipped, insured.

In early days the emerald mines at Muzo and elsewhere in Colombia were worked for the King of Spain, who furnished troops to protect the laborers from hostile natives; but, owing to the dishonesty of those in charge, the business did not pay, and in 1792 the work was suspended.

Wine Without Alcohol

UNFERMENTED grape juice, as a beverage and for use in a great variety of other ways, is fast acquiring popularity in this country, and immense quantities of it are now being put up for market. Three hundred thousand gallons of the product represented the output of the Chautauqua (New York) district alone for 1902.

It has come to be realized that unfermented grape juice is exceedingly healthful as well as nutritious, and many physicians are prescribing it for their patients. In Europe sick people are sent to the wine-growing districts at vintage time, with instructions to drink large quantities of the fresh "must" as it flows from the crusher, and they are said to be much benefited. If it can be obtained, unaltered, all the year round, by the help of scientific bottling, an important advantage is gained.

PLENTY of POSITIONS

Thirteen thousand positions were filled by the Remington Employment Departments during the year 1902 in the cities of New York and Chicago alone. Every city in America shows a similar proportion.

INVESTORS

We will send free, on request, our booklet, "First-Mortgage Bond and Trust Company Investment Methods." It explains how our finance committee, composed of five of our directors, considers, discusses, analyzes and if agreed, invests for this company or for individuals, men, women, trustees, guardians, institutions or companies in the highest obtainable grade of Chicago real estate mortgages, or in bonds; how we are organized; how we invest large and small sums. How we care for, advise and protect conservative investors by our organization, which is composed entirely of investors of experience, ability, discretion and determination in making safe investments, who will offer no mortgage or bond which they cannot fully recommend or would be willing to repurchase, charging a small fee for repurchases.

We buy entire bond issues, corporation and municipal. Correspondence invited from parties knowing of contemplated issues of high grade bonds.

We have for distribution a small Russian leather covered security register and card case which can be carried in a vest pocket. You won't have to go to your vault or safe to see when your interest or principal matures if you have one of them. They will be sent upon receipt of twenty cents in stamps to cover cost and mailing.

Responsible parties commanding the confidence of investors can make snug sums by devoting a portion of their leisure time offering such securities as we buy and sell. Only those who favor security before high rate and who are in sympathy with our conservative methods will be selected.

Tints rather than colors, subdued effects rather than pronounced contrasts, these are what constitute the charm of stained shingles, and make even the low cost house a thing of beauty. No house, no matter how cheap or ordinary in architecture, can justly be regarded as commonplace if the shingles are stained to match the woodwork or general color tone of the building.

Shingletint is a scientific combination of linseed oil, coloring matter, creosote oils and the necessary drying agents, and its use produces the most artistic and durable color effects known on Shingles.

The problem of preserving it unfermented in bottles has not yet been wholly solved. Not only must fermentation be prevented, but the product must be bright and clear in order to be marketable. Most of the bottled grape juice lacks clearness, and chemical preservatives will not do, because they are harmful. Electricity has been tried to kill the germs of fermentation, but up to date heat has proved the best agent, though the temperature must not be too high lest the flavor of the wine be injured. It is found that complete sterility can be obtained without damage at 165 to 176 degrees.

The method adopted in California consists in selecting only clean and perfectly sound grapes, not too ripe, running the juice from the presses into sterilized receptacles, allowing it to settle twenty-four hours, then "pasteurizing" it by the application of heat, pouring it into fresh sterilized vessels with sterilized bungs, permitting it to settle for a week, filtering it, bottling it as it flows from the filter, sterilizing the corked bottles, and finally sealing over each cork with wax to keep out possible germs.

the sheathing. A gigantic lumber-jack, "Chanting Jimmy," climbed to the top of the highest pile of joists, and began wildly to wave himself.

"We're Rory's men, Rory's men, Rory, Rory, Rory's men!"

Every man in the flotilla took it up in a last tumultuous burst of raucous exultation. And jammed on the wharves, all Portage, though its multifold throat was by now sorely raw and aching, sent it back in a frenzied roar.

Two dripping figures gnashed and reviled in impotent paroxysms as they passed out of the gate.

The tugs swung off, rocking drunkenly like a pair of shameless pipers at the head of a loot-laden regiment, and with whistles skirling insulting pibrochs and triumphant slogans they took the Channel.

It was the original purpose of this story to tell of that most memorable voyage, and of nothing but that: to tell of a course lost for twenty hours, of scourging nor'easter, of engines that had to be fed with studding and trusses, of semi-starvation, and broken hawsers in the wildest fury of the gale—but the substance of all that would yet have been that the Achilles still held to it! And the Robbie, on the weather flank of that dumb, storm-beaten flock, kept them together and nuzzled them ever onward like the bravest of untiring collies. And so, in the end, they made their haven.

Moreover, by the favor of a Government which has always given every encouragement to all honest immigration, it was a most amazingly short time until the Scotia's "hands" and "oscillating gangs" were eating up their hundred and fifty thousand feet a day of good Ontario pine. "Big Rory" throve thereafter like a green bay tree. And Sanders from Windsor was his junior partner.

As for Mr. Schunk, after a week's chartering of every tug for fifty miles up and down the Channel, and a pursuit the futility of which any of those tug captains, had they really been honorable men, might well have explained to him, he spent the remainder of the year in the even more expensive futility of international litigation. And, before he had had a sufficiency of that, of the two payments which Rory had made him on his now forfeited pine land, there remained no very extensive margin of profit. Nor in this matter did he call in Mr. E. G. Egan as legal adviser.

That once ever-smiling attorney had risen from a month of inflammatory rheumatism to spend a summer attempting to overcrowd the Michigan state prison with such of Rory's men as still rashly remained in their own, their native, land. As yet, however, notwithstanding the intensity of his feelings, in that field, at least, he is a lawyer without convictions.

And if the moral investiture of this story should still seem to require a considerable deal of mending, it can only be said that the tale in the main is a true one; and if a little ethical raggedness cannot be mitigatingly covered by the mantle of Truth, why, Truth is a very poor sort of goddess indeed, and should have no further worship from any discriminating story-teller.

GET THE

Famous Warner Library

It is the only single set of books which comprises every author and the literature of the whole world. It is not only a library of reference, but a library to read. It contains the brightest and best reading from the representative writers of every age.

Do you like poetry? Warner will give you the best, from Chaucer to Tennyson, from Dante to Longfellow.

Do you like humor? Here you find Mark Twain, or Artemus Ward, cracking jokes with Aristophanes.

Do you like fiction? The romances of ancient Egypt are found side by side with Ian Maclaren, or Robert Louis Stevenson.

Do you like history? Herodotus will tell you of battles and campaigns; while Gibbon or Macaulay outlines the rise and fall of nations.

Not only this—but the rank and value of every author is summed up in a series of brilliant essays by foremost authorities.

OFFICIALLY APPROVED BY THE NEW YORK CITY SCHOOLS, AND NEW YORK STATE REGENTS.

Warner is so Complete that the largest public libraries cannot get along without it. Librarians are its most constant consulters. And it is so compact that the smallest home shelf of books finds it a necessary adjunct—for it furnishes a key to every other volume there.

You will find "The World's Best Literature" at once the foundation and

The Capstone of Your Library!

The workmanship on the books themselves keeps pace with their literary quality. It is a set of books we are proud to distribute, and you will be proud to own. You will always point out the Warner Library when showing your books to your friends. It is beautifully bound, finely printed, and contains a wealth of special illustrations. If you had no other books than these you would still have

A Complete Home Library

20,000 Pages In these wonderful forty-six volumes will be found the brightest thoughts of the greatest authors—complete novels and chapters in fiction, humorous sketches, poetry, philosophy, history, travel, science, oratory, letters and essays. Translations from Persian, Hindu, Greek, Latin and all the modern languages are included. In short, the thousands of large pages fairly teem with interest and delight.

7,500 Authors This is the only work containing a complete "Dictionary of Authors," giving the correct pronunciation of the name and relative rank of each writer, his character, the names of his books, and dates of publication. This unique feature is of immense value.

Critical Essays A distinguishing feature of the Warner Library is the series of critical and interpretative essays. Every great author of every land and time is discussed by some one of the foremost living writers, who selects his masterpieces. Thus Dr. Van Dyke writes on Tennyson; W. D. Howells on Tolstoy, etc., etc.

800 Illustrations Photogravures of famous scenes and paintings, portraits, art plates, color reproductions of beautiful manuscripts—all form a wealth of attractive material profusely illustrating the Warner Library.

2,500 Synopses of Books This valuable feature is unique with the Warner Library. Brief descriptions of all the world's great books are given in the space of a few hundred words each. No one has read or can read all the books which come up in the course of conversation. But these synopses will give the busy man a gist of them all; not only novels such as "Robert Elsmere," "Ben Hur," or "Quo Vadis," but poems, dramas and technical works.

Course of Reading A systematic course of reading and study, equal to a four years' university course, has been prepared. It not only gives the system of reading, but furnishes the material itself, through the pages of the Library, and by means of an admirable Index. It is both teacher and text-book.

What Purchasers Say

Dr. E. W. Kellogg (Hartford): "A wonderful conception wonderfully executed."

Rev. Charles James Wood, LL.D.: "The value of such a work as this in the education of the people is beyond computation. If it be generally circulated and read, as I suppose that it will, the Warner Library will prove the force that starts a new epoch in the intellectual life of the American people."

Geo. C. Lorimer, D.D. (New York): "If these lines shall come before the eyes of any with whom I have influence, I do most certainly urge them to enrich their own library and also their own life by giving a prominent place to this magnificent triumph of literature. Not only will the contents more than amply repay for the expenditure, but the clearness of type, the style of printing and the luxuriousness of binding will all combine to render enjoyable their possessions."

Deafness Overcome

Louisville man originates a simple little device that instantly restores the hearing—fits perfectly, comfortably and does not show.

190-page book FREE: tells all about it

Since the discovery of a Louisville man it is no longer necessary for any deaf person to carry a trumpet, a tube or any such old-fashioned device, for it is now possible for any one to hear perfectly by a simple invention that fits in the ear and cannot be detected. The honor belongs to Mr. George H. Wilson, of Louisville, who was himself deaf and now hears as well as any one. He calls it Wilson's Common Sense Ear Drum, is built on the strictest scientific principles, containing no metal of any kind, and is entirely new in every respect. It is so small that no one can see it, but nevertheless it collects all sound waves and diverts them against the drum-head, causing you to hear perfectly. It will do this even when the natural ear drums are partially or entirely destroyed, perforated, scarred, relaxed, or thickened. It fits any ear from childhood to old age, and aside from the fact that it does not show, it never causes the hearer irritation, and can be used with comfort day or night.

It will relieve deafness whether acquired from catarrh, scarlet fever, typhoid or brain fever, measles, whooping cough, gathering in the ear, shocks from artillery or through accidents. It not only relieves, but stays the progress of deafness and all roaring and buzzing noises. It does this in a simple, sure and scientific way. The effect is immediate.

Let every person who needs this at once send to the company for its 190-page book, which you can have free. It describes and illustrates Wilson's Common Sense Ear Drums and contains many bona-fide letters from numerous users in the United States, Canada, Mexico, England, Scotland, Ireland, Wales, Australia, New Zealand, Tasmania, India. These letters are from people in every station of life—clergymen, physicians, lawyers, merchants, society ladies, etc.—and tell the truth about the benefits to be derived from the use of this wonderful little device. You will find among them the names of people in your own town or State, and you are at liberty to write to any of them you wish and secure their opinion as to the merits of the only scientific ear drums for restoring the hearing to its normal condition.

Write to-day and it will not be long before you are again hearing. Address, for the free book and convincing evidence,

The "Governor's" Record

The Exploits of a Dutiful Son Who Took His Father for a Model

By ELLIOTT FLOWER

ELLIS ASHBROOK was about to start for college, and there was more than the customary excitement in the Ashbrook family, due to the fact that Ellis never had been away from home before, except for an occasional visit to friends or relatives. He was not the kind of a boy that is generally described as "goody-goody" or "mother's darling," but it so happened that he always had been under home influences. The excellence of the local preparatory schools had made it unnecessary to send him elsewhere for his preliminary education. And now, not only was he going away, but he was going to the college from which his father had graduated. Naturally, they were all very solicitous.

"Just remember," his sister said to him, "that papa went to that college, and don't disgrace him."

"I hope, Ellis," his mother added, "that you will take your father as a model and endeavor to equal his record. He was one of the earliest graduates, and the college still delights to honor him. You know he was president of the alumni association three times, which shows the regard in which he was held by his former classmates. Emulate him in every respect."

Then John Ashbrook took his son aside for a litttle fatherly advice and encouragement.

"Show them that you are a chip of the old block, Ellis," he said. "My college has seen fit to honor me in many ways, and I have great veneration for it. I am still well known there, for two of my old classmates are now professors, and several others are living in the college town. I want you to show them that you are the same kind of a fellow your father was—indeed, I'd like to have you excel me in every way. Do your best, my boy. I'm more particular than I should be if you were going to any other college in Christendom."

How forgetful men are! At that moment John Ashbrook recollected only one part of his record, which was that he had graduated with honors; if he had happened to be with a little party of the "old boys" he might have recalled some other features.

The idea of going to his father's college had pleased Ellis previously, but now he was discouraged. "Comparisons are odious," and especially so when one knows that one is to be compared constantly with a high-class model.

"I wish to thunder," Ellis muttered to himself, "that the Governor had not made such a rattling fine record. Every old guy in the place will be watching me and judging me by the standard he set. I believe I'd rather go where I just had to make my own record. However, I'll do my best to show that I'm in the same class with the Governor and worthy of his old niche."

Ellis, it will be seen, was a good boy, but still very much of a boy. He had the right spirit, but his home training had not prevented him from learning to call his father "Governor" and to speak with thoughtless disrespect of others of mature judgment. He had the average boy's vitality and love of sports and mischief, but this tendency had not been developed to the exclusion of ambition to do creditable work in the more serious pursuits of life.

He found, as predicted, that his father was still well remembered in the college town. Indeed, almost the first question asked by the college registrar, after getting his name, was: "Are you the son of Jack Ashbrook?"

"Jack" rather grated on Ellis' nerves, but he admitted that he was; whereupon the registrar became reminiscent.

"I was in the class below him," he said, "and to see his son here brings up old times."

"I hope," said Ellis modestly, "to prove myself a worthy descendant, so far as college life goes."

"I hope you will," said the registrar.

"I shall endeavor to emulate him in all ways."

A quizzical smile appeared on the registrar's face.

"Not in all ways," he said.

"Why not?" asked Ellis.

"Well, I recall that he came very near being expelled for running into the mathematics professor and pushing him into the lake. We boys knew it wasn't an accident, but the faculty finally accepted that plea."

Ellis departed thoughtful. Here was a new feature of his father's record, and he began to see what it would really mean to prove himself "a chip of the old block."

"But father told me to do it," he soliloquized.

He was engaged in these reflections when he was stopped on the campus by an undergraduate.

"Somebody told me you are Jack Ashbrook's son?" remarked the undergraduate inquiringly.

"I'm John Ashbrook's son," returned Ellis.

"Oh, he's 'Jack' Ashbrook in the traditions of this college, and don't you forget it," retorted the undergraduate. "But I don't believe you're made of the same stuff. I guess his record is beyond you."

"What do you know about his record?" demanded Ellis.

"Oh, everybody here knows about the time he and some others tied a calf to the chapel bell-rope so that every time the calf moved its head it rang the bell. Say! there was a ghost scare that night that pretty near turned some of the fellows' hair gray. That story will last as long as the college does."

Ellis shook his head doubtfully as he walked along. Then he began to smile. It occurred to him that it might be difficult to excel his father, but that there would be considerable sport in endeavoring to do so.

"Under my instructions," he said to himself, "there is no danger that I shall suffer from ennui while I am here. I wonder what else the Governor did."

He took some letters of introduction from his pocket and noted the addresses. In any event, he would find out at the earliest possible moment just what was in store for him.

The first man to whom he presented a letter was a local lawyer, who shook his hand warmly.

"So you're Jack Ashbrook's son!" exclaimed the lawyer. "By George! how time does fly! It seems only yesterday that Jack and I were suspended for six weeks for giving certain girls in the 'fem. sem.' on the other side of the lake a midnight serenade that scandalized their institution and ours. Oh, those were great times, and your father was king of us all. I'll bet we gave the principal of that female seminary more trouble than she has had in all the rest of her life."

"That will be interesting news to mother," thought Ellis as he went on to present his next letter.

Two days later he thought he had all the evidence he needed, and, with a broad smile on his face, he mailed this communication to his paternal parent:

"Dear Father: Just before I left home I received a fine large assortment of advice that has somewhat troubled and bewildered me in view of recent developments. Sister Helen implored me not to disgrace you; mother asked me to emulate you in every respect, and you expressed a hope that I would show that I am 'a chip of the old block,' and, if possible, excel you in every way. The task promises to be a difficult one, except so far as Helen's advice is concerned. Your old chum, James Markham, assures me facetiously that I cannot possibly disgrace you, unless I get myself expelled, as you suffered every other form of punishment, so I will leave that feature out of consideration. As for the rest I will do my very best.

"At the present moment I am on the lookout for a calf to tie to the chapel bell-rope, but I have not yet found one that can be easily secured in the absence of the owner. Perhaps the knowledge that I am your son has caused them to guard their calves with extra care. However, I hope to be successful in the course of another week.

"The mathematics professor studiously avoids the vicinity of the lake. It may be that he recalls what happened to his predecessor in your day. But please do not condemn me yet. I will surely get him before the end of the term.

"The toolhouse that you pushed over the embankment has been replaced by a more substantial structure, but I have located a storm vestibule that I can easily wreck some dark night. Will that do?

The World's Best Music

If you are a pianist or a singer you are constantly buying sheet music—and paying high prices for it. It lies in ragged piles around the house and becomes scattered and torn. You lose money by buying music in that way, to say nothing of your loss of time and temper when searching for a particular selection. Why not buy your music in volumes, filled with the best selections, and thoroughly indexed? The "Library of the World's Best Music" is designed for your needs. Its eight volumes—sheet music size, but light and easy to handle—are crowded with the best vocal and instrumental music, carefully selected by an experienced corps of music editors.

This Bookcase Free if You Order at Once.

Size of Volumes, 9 x 12 Inches.

A Complete Musical Library

The Library contains 300 instrumental selections by great composers; melodious, not too difficult, including popular and operatic melodies, dances, funeral marches, and classic and romantic piano music. There are 350 best old and new songs, duets, trios, and quartets. The volumes are illustrated with 400 portraits, many of which are handsome chromatic art plates printed in colors. The work contains 500 biographies of musicians, and more than 100 new and copyrighted selections by American composers. It is the most complete collection of music in existence.

2,200 Pages of Sheet Music

There are 2,200 pages of sheet music, which would cost, if purchased one piece at a time, more than $200.00. The volumes are nearly sheet music size, and are specially bound so as to open flat at the piano. In number of pages of sheet music, number of biographies, and in number of illustrations this Musical Library leads all others. In the preparation of the work twenty editors and special contributors assisted. It has been indorsed by music-loving people in every English-speaking country. Four hundred composers are represented, including such world-famous names as Paderewski, Halfe, Liszt, Wagner, Mozart, Gounod, Beethoven, De Kuyen, Strauss, Sullivan, and Handel. There are eight volumes in the set, handsomely bound in half leather or cloth. Size of volumes, 9 x 12 inches—nearly sheet music size.

Half-Price Club Closing!

We are so confident that this Library will please any music lover that we are willing to send complete sets for examination, but the edition at the disposal of our Musical Library Club is being rapidly exhausted, so prompt action is necessary if you wish to obtain a set at the present low prices. The regular publisher's prices for this Library are $40.00 and $35.00, but as long as the sets at the disposal of the Club last they will be distributed at $25.00 for a set in half-leather binding and $21.00 for the cloth binding—payable at the rate of $1.00 a month. Send us the coupon with your name and address filled in and a set will be sent you, express prepaid, for examination—no matter how far from New York your home is. If you do not find the set satisfactory, it may be returned at our expense. Remember that you do not pay a cent until you examine the books.

BOOK-CASE FREE We have a small number of elegant oakwood book-cases that are made especially to hold a set of the "World's Best Music." Their retail price is $4.00 each, but we have decided to offer them as premiums to prompt subscribers. To obtain a book-case free with your set, it will be necessary to send us your order before March 21st. If your order is received after that date, we cannot supply a book-case with the set, unless, of course, you care to pay the retail price of $4.00 for the case. This book-case is a present from us, and does not increase the cost of the music in any manner.

Five Years' Work Might Bring Independence

This opportunity comes to you from the largest real estate firm in the world—a firm whose financial standing is respected and appreciated by the largest banks and financial institutions of this country—a firm whose sales of New York property throughout the United States amounted to over three and a half million dollars during the past year.

The offer which we make is the selling of our New York City lots in your community. Ours is a proposition which stands absolutely alone. As an investment it has few equals in the country, and every agent who has ever taken hold of it with the energy required to successfully carry on any business has made for himself thousands of dollars. A single agent, way down in Alabama, whose name will be furnished on application, made over $10,000 in less than six months; another distant agent made over $5000 in a little town of 3500 inhabitants, and we have many who are now earning at the rate of $2000 a year without interfering with their regular business.

This offer should interest any man of ability and character. Our Alabama agent is one of the most prominent lawyers in his state, and he did not undertake the selling of our properties until he had been to New York and satisfied himself beyond peradventure that all we claimed for our proposition was true, and more than true. We want high-class, capable and energetic representatives in every community—we do not want canvassers. Our business is conducted on a high plane, so that it appeals to the very best class of investors. An opportunity such as this is rare indeed. It enables you to associate yourself with a growing business—a business that is sure to develop into practically a strong national institution—and just as desirable as the great insurance companies.

Your name and address will bring further particulars. References will be required.

"The girl that you took sleighing and upset in a snowdrift when you had been excused from recitations on the plea of sickness is no longer available for that purpose, but when the proper time comes I anticipate no difficulty in finding a suitable substitute.

"I am now working on the odorous combination with which you drove the chemistry class from its room. This may take time, and I think you should allow me the whole first year for it. The opportunities for springing it on the class without detection are few.

"These are the principal features of your record that I have discovered so far. They make my task rather difficult, but I hope to prove myself equal to it if too many other incidents do not come to light. At any rate, I will do my best.

"By the way, might I suggest that my allowance seems to be inadequate? I think I should have at least $500 more for the college year.

"Your affectionate son, ELLIS.

"P. S.—Please ask mother to send me my guitar. I neglected to bring it, and you might tell her that I cannot possibly give the 'fem.-sem.' girls a midnight serenade, as you did, without it. Of course, the girl for whom you got suspended is no longer there, but I already have my eye on one that I think should prove a worthy successor."

John Ashbrook frowned and smiled alternately as he read the letter. Once he laughed and remarked to himself, "That boy is nobody's fool, anyhow." But when he reached the postscript he suddenly sat bolt upright in his chair and whistled softly "That would be a nice story for me to take home to Lucy, wouldn't it?" he commented. Then he laughed again and picked up his pen.

"Never mind my record," he wrote. "It wasn't much of a record, anyway, and I'd a good deal rather you made one of your own. You impress me as being quite capable of it. Of course I will have your guitar sent to you, but I would suggest that you do not use it for that purpose. At any rate, I deem it wise not to mention that feature to your mother. Perhaps you are right about the inadequacy of the allowance. College boys spend more now than they did in my day, so I inclose my check for $500."

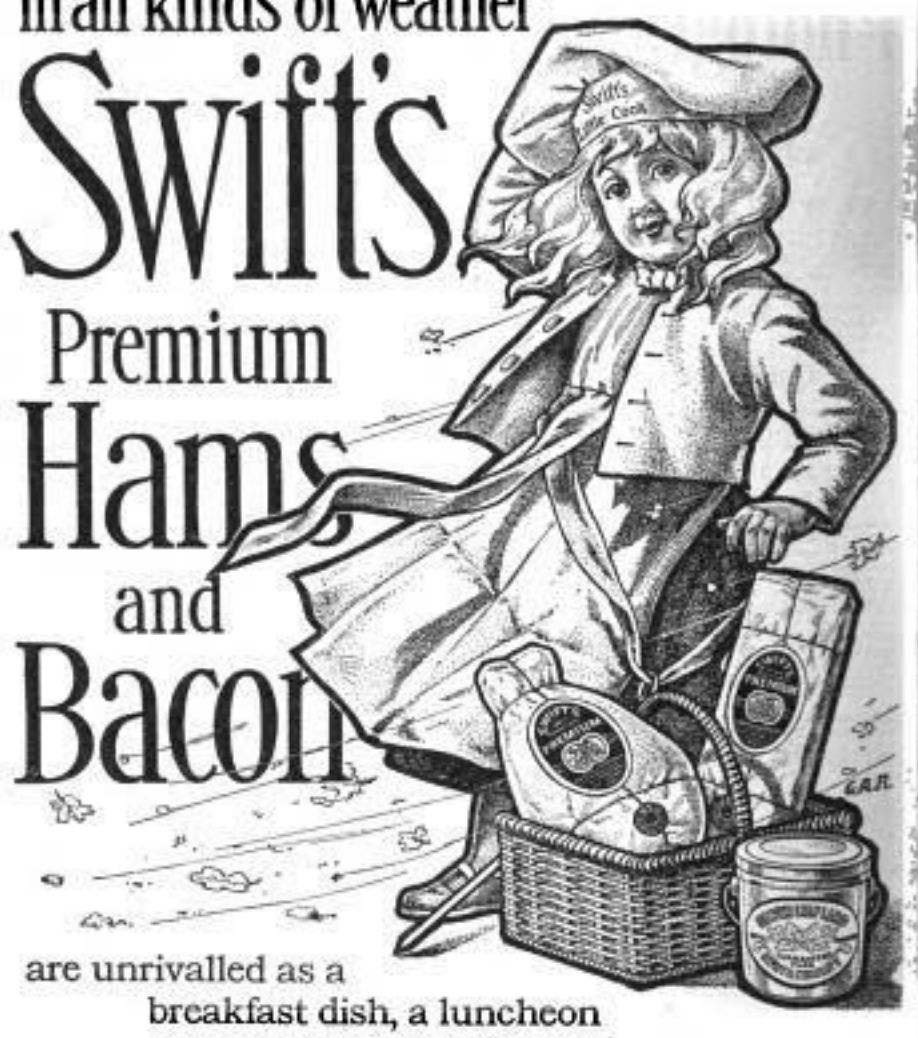
After a moment or two of thought he added this as a postscript: "I am a little undecided, Ellis, whether you are going to be a financier or a confidence man, but, whichever it is, I am satisfied you will be a good one."

Mr. Yerkes' First Venture

WHEN Charles Tyson Yerkes, now busy battling with that antediluvian institution, the London 'bus, was a Quaker lad in Philadelphia, he happened, down on the river front one day, on an auction sale of the contents of a soap-maker's shop. Eighteen dollars had been bid when the young Quaker elbowed his way into the place.

"Going! Go-ing! Going at the insignificant sum of eighteen dollars!" cried the auctioneer.

The lad's eager eye ran over the stock in a hasty appraisal. "Nineteen!"



"Nineteen is bid. Who'll give twenty? Going at nineteen—going!—go-ing! Sold!"

The successful bidder had never had so much money in his possession. He ran home to borrow it of his father, who was reluctant to encourage the lad in such wild speculation. But he got the $19, and a little while after he reappeared at the soap-maker's with a cart. He loaded the cakes of soap on the cart, and then went around selling his stock piece by piece to the Philadelphia housewives. Before the day was over he had emptied the cart, repaid his father's loan, and laid $23 aside.

This was Mr. Yerkes' first business venture. Not many years later he was trading in street railways. He still has the fever for buying things at auction. A little while ago in London he paid £15,000 for a little known canvas by Turner. The walls of his London office are covered with rare paintings he has picked up at Christie's and on the continent. Mr. Yerkes recently received by letter from a prominent resident of London a suggestion that he spend £300,000 in the purchase of a certain well-known collection of paintings, and then present it to East London. His English correspondent naively added that such a generous act would undoubtedly prompt the King to give the railway builder a baronetcy. Mr. Yerkes has not yet made an offer for the collection.

LIFE INSURING AGREEMENT WITHOUT EXTRA COST

A Millionaire's Advice to Young Men

A well-known millionaire, with a national reputation for conservatism, said in conversation the other day:

"If I were a young man anxious for independence, I would invest my savings in a small piece of good real estate. When I had it paid for I would put the deed away and forget I had it. Then I would begin paying on another."

Doubtless every man has felt at some time that he would like to be a land holder. That he would like to have a little piece of this earth—of this great country that he could call his own. This is a worthy sentiment, but to select his piece of land in the heart of a populous community where the mere pressure of population is there to increase the value of his holding, perhaps many fold—this is sentiment combined with business.

It unquestionably strengthens a man's character to own property—it increases his responsibility. If he can tie himself up, and is obliged to make regular payments, he is sure to save. The trouble is that he allows the chance to pass. He is going to begin next month. Rich men talk of the importance of a man's first Thousand Dollars. Why not his first Hundred or his first Ten? The saving of this first $10.00 may be your first step to independence. THE TIME TO DO IT IS NOW.

If you were offered a Government bond guaranteed to increase 25 per cent. in one year, wouldn't you be glad to get the chance to buy it? If a well-known insurance company said you could have a life insurance policy without cost—would it tempt you to write a letter asking for further information? THIS ADVERTISEMENT CONTAINS AN OFFER BETTER THAN EITHER, BECAUSE IT COMBINES THEM BOTH. It will pay every reader of THE POST to read this page—every word of it.

Philadelphia is the third largest city in the United States. It is by far the most solid, thrifty and conservative. Millions have been made here in real estate. There has never been a land bubble or a period of wild speculation in its history. Values have increased steadily for two hundred years. It is the greatest manufacturing centre in America.

The most typical American city. No greater centre of population in the world is growing more rapidly, and its growth is permanent. From the laborer to the capitalist it would seem the aim of every man in Philadelphia is to own his home. The city is populous, crowded; real estate is extremely valuable; rents in town are high. For years people have been pushing towards the suburbs. The working man for his cottage, the millionaire for his mansion.

One after another beautiful suburbs have been bought, and every building lot sold. The suburbs are magnificent. In most of them you cannot buy a building lot to-day for the price of a good forty-acre farm elsewhere. People who buy for a home in Philadelphia do not sell. Many a homestead here has been in the same family for 150 years. Some buy for homes, some to hold as an investment. A man buys several lots, builds on one, holds the others; their advance pays for his home. The steady increase in the price of property here has made thousands of men independent.

Five years ago the suburb of Ogontz Park was put on the market by W. T. B. Roberts; to-day but a few home sites in the entire suburb for sale, and these have doubled in value since the opening.

Now it is Glenside. It is the finest suburban property near Philadelphia. Over Nine Hundred Thousand Dollars has already been spent upon it in improvements. Many times that amount will be spent in its completion. Philadelphians are buying homes in Glenside. It is already thriving; hundreds of houses and stores are already built. More people will profit by the increasing values here than were benefited by Ogontz Park.

Improvements at Glenside are made, not promised. The Philadelphia & Reading, running the entire length of the suburb, has two stations on the property, and three others within a few minutes' walk, 93 trains a day (rapid express service) connecting it with Philadelphia; two trolley lines are now under construction from the property; 90 minutes to New York City; station short walk. A New York business man bought a home in Glenside last month. Values are increasing weekly.

W. T. B. Roberts is the largest real estate operator in Philadelphia. His record is one of unbroken successes. Ogontz Park was his last achievement; Glenside is now receiving his attention. It is said of him here that he has helped to make 10,000 young men independent. Any responsible business man in Philadelphia can tell you about him. Every bank will attest his success. He knows Philadelphia and Philadelphia property as no other man knows it. The firm of W. T. B. Roberts & Son is widely known throughout the country. They are planning business of national scope. They want to make the acquaintance of bright young men in every community. They desire to know prospective investors everywhere; making small but highly profitable investments for them, and establishing business relations that will grow with them and their friends.

$10.00 will secure for you a part interest in this great property

To carry out his plan Mr. Roberts has set aside 300 of the choice home sites in Glenside for small investors of every country. This offer is made exclusively to the readers of THE SATURDAY EVENING POST. The lots range in price from $200 to $1700. Any one of them is, in our opinion, as safe an investment as a United States Bond. Upon the payment of $10.00 we will reserve one of these lots, and send you a marked plan showing its location. If you desire any other than the one selected we will gladly make the change.

Glenside Investment a Saving Fund and Life Insurance

You can pay us each month whatever amount you wish to save. If you would rather pay the full amount within thirty days, we will allow you a cash discount of ten per cent. With the deed of sale we will include an ironclad guarantee that the property will increase in value 25 per cent. within a year from purchase, based upon prices at which the ground is then selling. If it fails to do this we will refund your money at the end of twelve months with 6 per cent. interest added; and in the event of your death the lot will be deeded to your beneficiary without any further payments.

Send in your application for a lot to-day. If you can come to Glenside personally, we will pay a proportionate amount of your expenses, according to the size of your investment. On the higher-priced lots we will pay the entire cost of transportation from any point in the United States.

Recommended by Men of National Fame

"I have known all that part of the country for thirty years and I think it is one of the most beautiful and healthful sections around our city. The improvements that have been made there seem to be very attractive. I do not know of any neighborhood more inviting or likely to be permanently satisfactory to seekers of country homes than that of Glenside and the region thereabout, including Ogontz Park." (Signed) JOHN WANAMAKER.

Wm. R. Nicholson, President of The Land Title and Trust Company of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, one of the largest institutions of its kind in the country, located at the corner of Broad and Chestnut Streets, will gladly answer any questions in regard to Glenside, or its owner. It is endorsed by P. A. B. Widener, the great traction magnate, who knows the section thoroughly, because his palatial home, Lynnewood Hall, is within a short distance of Glenside. Wm. L. Elkins, the famous financier, has also consented to reply to any prospective investor who desires his opinion as to the value of Glenside home sites as investments. Either of these gentlemen will answer any inquiry as to the financial ability and standing of the owner of Glenside, also his willingness to perform every obligation made.

The Greatest Test of Power

in an automobile, as in mankind, is the ability to climb to higher levels. There would not be so much enjoyment in automobile touring if you were obliged to feel a little doubtful about the way your car would respond when called upon to conquer steep and rugged grades. Doubts are cast to the wind when you drive the

Winton

It will not only master any grades open to traffic, but do it with the pleasing dash possible only where there is an abundance of power always available. The Winton Touring Car has won quite as many laurels for hill climbing as for speed and endurance, and, of course, there are reasons for it. One is that it has more horse-power for each hundred pounds of weight than any other car upon the market. Again, all of its power is available, not being absorbed by a cumbersome transmission.

The new 20 horse-power, double opposed cylinder, Winton Touring Car, with one filling of gasoline, lubricating oil and water, will travel, at a 30 to 40 mile per hour clip if desired, over 150 miles. There are a great many other features about this 1903 automobile triumph to interest those contemplating the purchase of a high grade car.

The price complete with detachable tonneau, two full brass side lamps, tools, etc., is $2,500. Visit any of our branch or agency depots in all principal cities and the many features of Winton excellence will be fully demonstrated.

THE POLITICIANS

Our "Hired Men" at Washington—By WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE

IN THE average American community any respectable citizen who cares enough for politics to attend his ward caucus may attend the county convention of his party. If he attends the caucus regularly, and acts in the county convention with that sense and consideration for the feelings of others that he would use in a committee meeting of a church or a meeting of a board of directors in any humble enterprise, the average American citizen may become a member of the county central committee of his party, from his precinct, if he so desires, and will use reasonable activity in making his desire known. The county central committeeman of any party is a small but powerful cog in the machinery of this American government. He has more to say than any one else in his ward about what persons shall attend the succeeding convention of his party. He can, if he chooses and is a strong man, come nearer throwing his ward for or against any candidate before the convention than any other man can come.

After a man has demonstrated his ability to control the delegation from his ward to the county convention he is looked upon as a natural subject for political promotion. His temperament will decide in which direction he shall go. He may go into the executive committee of his county committee, be promoted to chairman or to congressional or judicial district committeeman, from that to state central committeeman, and on upward in the party organization till they call him a boss. Or if he cares more for place and pomp than for power he will run for a county office or for the legislature, and will be promoted, if he proves much stronger than his fellows, to the state senate.

At this stage of his advancement the politician has proved that he has fight in him. He has trampled some men under, he has helped some others up who have pulled him up. His head and shoulders are above the crowd. In his home town and county he is what they call a "prominent man." To the twenty thousand or so of his fellow-citizens below him his outlook seems wide, and if not boundless, at least satisfying. But for him the horizon is narrowed and marred by the looming vision of the big bump-backed Capitol at Washington. The vision grows as he grows, till it seems towering above him almost within his reach. But the shadow of the Capitol covers many other state senators and judges near him. And a time comes when they all reach out to touch the substance. Then there is a fight and to the people of the district it seems a battle of the "champions." The winner, who is suddenly boosted not only above the heads of the masses, but above the heads of those who overshadow the masses, seems to be a great man indeed, and a Congressman epitomizes all that the popular mind conceives of political greatness, excepting three other officers: Governor, Senator and President of the United States. And in the minds of the people the Congressman, the Governor and the Senator are correlative officers. There is not much distinction in their importance. So in the average American mind to be a Congressman is the end of all ordinarily attainable greatness—for the average man has now given up the idea that he may be President. The country is too large and the chances are too small.

Among the people there is an acceptance of Reed's cynicism that the United States Senate is a place where politicians go when they are dead. The people do not know that to all intents and purposes the Constitution of the United States was amended by the Reed rules, and that to be a member of the House in Washington is altogether a different thing from being a member of Congress at home. The House of Representatives of the American Congress has become a large advisory committee to the Senate. The House suggests possible laws; the Senate passes them; the House is the hopper; the Senate is the mill that makes the grist.

The new Congressman upon arriving at Washington takes a header into oblivion. No matter how much fame he may have at home, no matter what may be his achievements in other than political work, no matter how much or how little money he may have, and no matter what may be his family, the new Congressman in Washington is unknown. Department clerks drawing a hundred dollars a month sniff at the new millionaire member of the House of Representatives, and refer to him as "a little old dinky Congressman." His wife, who may be a Van Rensselear, a Pierpont or a Jones, has to make the first call on the wives of other members and the wives of Senators and the wives of members of the Cabinet before the family can have the slightest official recognition! The new Congressman can't second a motion or move to adjourn without getting some one's consent; his bills are buried, and his resolutions come to naught. He is the parasite on the flea on the end of the hair of the tip of the tail of the dog of the boy of the wife of the Wild Man of Borneo! It is barely possible that he may agitate the flea, and ruffle the hair, and wag the tail, and animate the dog, and attract the boy, and startle the mother, and move the old man and get something done, but it is highly improbable. The Congressman is at the bottom of the ladder; and the only way he can climb up is by hard, well-directed work. The great danger threatening the new member is that he may spend his time looking for some other kind of work than that which lies before him. There are sixty-two committees in the organization of the House. About twenty of them are important committees. They are the Committees on Ways and Means, Appropriations, Judiciary, Banking and Currency, Interstate and Foreign Commerce, River and Harbors, Merchant Marine and Fisheries, Agriculture, Foreign Affairs, Military Affairs, Naval Affairs, Post-Office and Post-Roads, Indian Affairs, Insular Affairs, Public Buildings and Grounds, Pensions, District of Columbia, Rules, Public Lands and Territories. Of course a new member is not put on any of these committees—except in rare cases. If he lands on the Committee on Elections or on Ventilation and Acoustics he is doing well. And because his committee is unimportant the new member is tempted to shirk his work. If he yields to temptation he joins the great majority—members who come back to Washington year after year and never get any place in the organization of the House. For work even in humble places is recognized, and a worker moves up. There are not over two dozen effective workers in the House, and they run it. These two dozen men are Henderson, Cannon, Payne, Dalzell, Grosvenor, Littlefield, Babcock, Hepburn, Richardson, John S. Williams, DeArmond, Sherman, Hitt, Hull, Burton of Ohio, Tawney, Jenkins, McCall, Foss, Grow, Cooper, Hemenway, Overstreet and Underwood. Long, Loud and Hopkins might be included in this list, but they leave the House with this session. Clarke, Cushman, Landis, Curtis, Lacey, Littauer, Dick and half a dozen other especially active members may move into the first rank next year. These House leaders form an autocracy. They are the House of Representatives. The other members seem to be merely a Greek chorus, coming on the stage at times, chanting the praises or bewailing the iniquities of the real actors in the drama.

How One Congressman Got to the Surface

AND even though a man may work he cannot expect to get more than his nose above the waters of oblivion by his third term. Payne, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, has been in Congress eighteen years. The average reader of THE SATURDAY EVENING POST hadn't heard of Mr. Payne four years ago; yet Payne was on his seventh term then, and he has always been a hard worker. He had considerable power four years ago, and was a man to be consulted; but there is a wide difference between power and fame. Indeed, though a dozen or so men have much power, less than a dozen have much fame. For the kind of effort that wins power in the House of Representatives is not the kind that makes men famous.

Take the case of Congressman Long, who came out of the West in '94. He landed on the Elections Committee. He went over the evidence in election contest cases, and the chairman of the committee found him a reliable young man to lean upon. Long stayed up nights with trivial details of his work. When he made a report as member of a subcommittee on a branch of a case the members of the committee found that he had the right of the matter. They put him on the Ways and Means Committee—the most important one in the House—in his second term. He gorged himself with statistics and became fat with facts—the most uninteresting facts, that could by no possibility have anything to do with brilliant oratory; he helped the more experienced members of the committee to form their judgments by furnishing them with facts. At the end of his second term they gave him a chance to make a speech on the Porto Rican tariff; it was not a speech that will ever appear in the school readers. When it was printed it looked like a State Auditor's report; it was bristly with statistics. But the members of Congress said it was the best presentation of the Republican position on the Porto Rican tariff that the session brought out; and the Republican National Committee used the speech as its textbook on the subject. The next term the young man devoted himself to Cuban reciprocity. General Wood, who was Governor-General of Cuba at the time when Long was studying the Cuban tariff, said in a public speech recently that Long's requests for information kept coming from the War Department to Cuba until his name used to make the Cuban clerks groan. They knew it meant work for them. But Long mastered his subject, and when the Ways and Means Committee began to work on the subject of Cuban reciprocity they turned naturally to Long for information. On that branch of legislation he became one of the leaders of the House. And last month his State promoted him to the Senate. The case of Long is used because it is typical of successful work in the House of Representatives. The reader can see that rhetorical eloquence had nothing to do with it. Nothing but hard digging—the thing that students call "boning"—wins in the House. The district that sends an orator to the House might as well send a basswood man. A modern Robert Ingersoll, if he depended on his oratorical powers, would be unknown in the House to-day. Debate has ceased virtually in the National House of Representatives. It has become a laboratory and not a forum. A deaf and dumb leader of the House is much more probable now than "an orator as Brutus is."

The Beauties of the Cloture Rule

AND this brings us fairly to the core of the case, which is the cloture rule. The cloture rule simplified is this: That the time devoted to debate upon any subject may be governed by a majority of the members of the House. The individual member may not talk to his heart's content. By surrendering this right to the floor the individual member gives to the majority of the House—which is, of course, the majority party, and it in turn is governed by the small group of its caucus leaders—the right to say what bills shall be discussed, and who shall discuss those bills, and how long each member shall talk. When four hundred members divest themselves of this power, each putting his quota of power into the hands of the leaders of his party caucus, an irresistible force in directing legislation passes into the hands of these caucus leaders. And, by the same token, the individual member, who does not happen to regain any of his surrendered power by reason of his place in the organization of the House, is as powerless as a page, so far as legislation goes. He can't talk, and he can't make signs, and about all he can do is to feel the iron props of official dignity gouging the back of his head, while he sits around looking pleasant, waiting for the operator to squeeze the bulb and get the ordeal over. Scores and scores of members come to Washington term after term and never make even a bubble on the surface of the utter oblivion that engulfs them. The cloture is at their throats and they do not know how to throw it off. If the impotent member belongs to the minority party it would seem as though he might as well go home. For not only are his vote and his voice useless, but he cannot in the nature of things be remembered when the House distributes its prize packages. These gifts—garden seeds, public documents, river and harbor appropriations, monuments to great men who are dead, and public buildings—are the inconsequential members' last gasping protest against obscurity. When a member can get a river and harbor appropriation or a public building or a monument for his constituents, and supply the libraries of the towns with a few hundred pounds of the uncensored and often grotesquely incorrect publications of the Government printing office, the member feels that his constituents cannot prove—whatever they may say—that he is absolutely useless. It is curious to note that with the rising standard of living, garden seeds, which were the life-preservers of many a Congressman in the eighties, are now considered insufficient to support the Congressional corporosity! So the garden-seed statesman is going out with the undertow of the incoming tide of prosperity. And, sad as it may seem to those who deplore the passing of that patriotism ever tangibly in evidence for drill and guard-mount, the garden-seed statesman is not going alone. A military escort is with him in the person of that peppery statesman who advertised himself noisily as "the friend of the old soldier." The old soldier has as many sincere friends in the House to-day as ever, but it has become fashionable to do rather more and talk less: because talk on any subject is under the ban.

The Best Brand of Moral Fibre

THE throttling of the individual has had the effect of giving the House a kind of mechanical moral uplift. The majority of the members of the House are honest whether they care to be or not, for actual votes on any measure before the House are rarely marketable quantities. Men seeking to influence House legislation now do their work in the committees. And the committees, which represent the average sense of honesty of the party in power, are for the most part honest. For it is impossible to assemble ten Americans from ten callings of life and not find seven of them honest. So in the House of Representatives, where the selection of members has been after a sifting process from the ward, through the county, and in the district, the membership is of a rather higher standard of honesty than would be found in any other American gathering of its size, not excepting a church synod or scientific society. For the honesty that one acquires in practical life, by finding through miserable experience that dishonesty is a fatal policy, is the best grade of moral fibre—much better than that which accepts a moral intelligence precept without trying the other way once or twice. So the Congressmen who come here schooled in life, with burned marks on their fingers, rarely play with the fire of political corruption, and live by honest means. Theoretically a Congressman gets five thousand dollars a year, but scores of Congressmen make their wives their secretaries, and by saving their mileage by riding on passes and husbanding their stationery allowance manage to get seventy-five hundred a year. By living as simply as possible, without being niggardly, a Congressman and his wife can get along and save a little money on this. But they cannot go even into the outer fringe of what is called official society. They must not expect to dine out frequently or to entertain even their visiting constituents. And there is no doubt that social influence is interlocked with political influence in Congress, and the member who saves anything from his salary must be content to sacrifice some of his prestige; if he has none to sacrifice, and no reasonable hope of any, he is justified in saving what money he can save. It will do no good to raise the Congressman's salary, for that would merely raise the standard of living. Nothing can help the unknown member. He is the man with the five talents. No system of government was ever devised and no scheme of living can be adopted which is based on consideration for the incompetents. And yet they are in the vast and hopeless majority. And in the House of Representatives, where the majority is supposed to rule, it doesn't.

The majority accommodates itself to the minority—that knows how to get things done. In other days the minority was called the nobility, lords and dukes and what not; now, if the members of the minority are on our side we call them leaders, and if they are on the other side we call them bosses.

The Dancing Bears in the House

AND yet the leaders of the House of Representatives have short chains, as leaders have elsewhere. The House leaders must move within the limits of not merely the race sense of fairness and honesty, but they must move within the circle of approval of the unknown members. The leaders are bears chained to a pole; they dance, they win much applause, they cut curious capers; but it is the humble gentleman with the past due whiskers who owns the chain and furnishes the power that turns the crank and makes the music. Leadership is an agency held only on good behavior. In the House of Representatives utterly bad leaders are impossible; for they could not lead. No one would follow. There are about as many known scoundrels in the House as there are recognized leaders. If they should combine and try to force an issue they would make no headway, for their very reputations would bar them, because instinctively the membership of the House would not find these bad men representative. When a man surrenders his power to other men—and that is the only way leaders can get it—he must feel instinctively that they are "his kind of people." The judgments of men in forming a human crystal, which we call organization, are generally as infallible as is the force that draws the inanimate elements together in their chemical unions. And so the two dozen leaders of the House of Representatives are as truly representative of the House as the members of the House are representative of all the people of the American nation. It matters not how small the leadership is of any American body if it is chosen after the American fashion. It is customary to revile legislatures, municipal, State and national. Because a few members of a legislature or a Congress are bad, and hence inevitably prominent—like the black sheep in the white flock—constituencies are prone to condemn whole law-making bodies out of hand. Yet the laws passed by such bodies are generally fair laws; they are rarely foolish laws, and never tyrannical. And of the American House of Representatives it may be said without fear of contradiction that it reflects the American sense of justice and integrity and frugality with scientific accuracy. No better answer was ever made to a criticism than that which retorted to the cry of a Billion-Dollar Congress that this is a "billion-dollar country."

The National Congress is representative.

The representative character of the House of Representatives is a hopeful sign in American politics. The American people are becoming complex; the simplicity and unity of American life are gone from the surface of things. The influx of millions of illiterate foreigners, apparently indigestible by our political organs, the rise of great fortunes, the growth of new and intricate forms of business, the tightening of class lines by labor unions, the acquisition of foreign territory and alien peoples, the release and political endowment of a race of slaves, the introduction of machinery crowding craftsmen from their benches, all these things and scores of other forms of industrial and civil progress have changed the pastoral democracy of the early nineteenth century almost beyond recognition. Every social and economic condition that the fathers feared is here: great wealth, deep poverty; greed, tethered by elastic legal red tape, a shoddy aristocracy lacking only noble titles, free land gone, and the struggle for sheer creature comforts growing keener—no goblin from the nightmare of the Conscript Fathers of the Republic is absent from the reality to-day. And yet here sits the Representative part of the American Congress, a sturdy, hard-headed set of average Americans, going about from day to day, working under a cloture rule which theoretically might permit a few men to lead the whole body astray into the currents of contemporary license and iniquity, and the product of this representative body is wholesome and fair, and more sane and equitable and righteous on the whole and in the long run than the enactments of any other legislative body that ever sat in the world.

Persons who have a hankering for psychical problems and things that make the head ache might find it profitable to figure out how in the process of political crystallization Nature rejects the impurities and draws together by almost divine prescience those things that are clean and of good report, and makes them the ultimate legal expression of the American spirit. The man who shall find and proclaim the law that makes for righteousness in the trend of American affairs will be known among men as a great scientist. In other days such a man would have been venerated as a prophet!

The Shrewd Laird of Skibo

THE American tourist in the north of Scotland, who happens along the shores of Dornoch Firth, hears many tales of the "laird" of Skibo Castle—tales of his generosity, his shrewdness, his kindly humor.

One day, while walking along the main road, Mr. Carnegie found a crofter thatching a dilapidated cottage roof.

"Why don't you slate it?" asked Mr. Carnegie.

"Weel, sir, it wad cost ower much siller," replied the crofter craftily.

"What would it cost?" asked the ironmaster.

"About fufty punds."

Mr. Carnegie took a check-book from his pocket, signed a check for the amount, handed it to the amazed crofter, and smilingly went on his way. "An honest man," mused he.

Now the crofter had a wife, who on hearing of the windfall to the family exclaimed: "Ye auld fule, that ye didna ax him for mair! Awa' tae Skibo, an' tell the laird ye wis mistaken, an' that it wad cost seventy."

Thus commanded, the crofter wended his way to the castle where he was shown into the library.

"Well," said Mr. Carnegie, "what now?"

The man explained.

"Have you that check?" asked Mr. Carnegie.

The expectant Scotchman handed the check to Mr. Carnegie, who tore it up, gave the crofter a look of angry contempt, and pointed to the door.

While steaming out of Dornoch Firth one day on his yacht, Sea Breeze, Mr. Carnegie was disturbed to hear an uproar in the engine-room, followed by the sudden stopping of the machinery. The engine had broken down. The chief engineer reported to the owner that the repairs could not be made without the help of a skilled machinist.

"What are you going to do?" asked Mr. Carnegie.

"Well, sir, there's an engineer at Inverness."

"Yes, but that costs money."

Mr. Carnegie set to work in the engine-room, and, with one man's assistance, set the engine to rights in half an hour.

Another time he took a party of friends from America across the Firth on the Sea Breeze to Port Mahomach, a little fishing village, christened by Mr. Carnegie "The Venice of the North." Upon landing, the "laird" asked a laborer working in a field to lead the way over to Tarbet Ness Lighthouse, where they were to have luncheon on the rocky coast. The laborer had not gone far when he asked if he might go back to his work because he should not be seen walking with gentlefolk without his coat.

"Oh, is that all?" said Mr. Carnegie, pulling off his own coat. "There's mine; put it on."

As the laborer stood six feet, and was proportionately large of girth, his futile efforts to get inside Mr. Carnegie's coat created great amusement.

"It's nae fit," said the laborer.

"Never mind," chuckled the ironmaster, "carry it on your arm, and people will think it belongs to you, and that you are carrying it because you're warm."

THE CONNEMARA MARE

The Story of a Horse that Led a Double Life

By E. Œ. Somerville and Martin Ross

Copyright in Great Britain

PART I

THE gray mare, which had been one of the last, if not the very last, of the sales at the Dublin Horse Show was not at all happy in her mind.

Still less so was the dealer's under-strapper, to whom fell the task of escorting her through the streets of Dublin. Her late owner's groom had assured him that she would "folly him out of his hands, and that whatever she'd see she wouldn't care for it nor ask to look at it!"

It cannot be denied, however, that when an electric tram swept past her like a terrace under way, closely followed by a cart laden with a clanking and horrific reaping-machine, she showed that she possessed powers of observation. The incident passed off with credit to the under-strapper, but when an animal has to be played like a salmon down the length of Lower Mount Street, and when it barn-dances obliquely along the north side of Merrion Square, the worst may be looked for in Nassau Street.

And it was indeed in Nassau Street, and, moreover, in full view of the bow window of the Kildare Street Club, that the cup of the under-strapper's misfortunes brimmed over. To be sure he could not know that the new owner of the gray mare was in that window; it was enough for him that a quiescent and unsuspected piano-organ broke with three majestic chords into Mascagni's Intermezzo at his very ear, and that, without any apparent interval of time, he was surmounting a heap composed of a newspaper boy, a sandwich man and a hospital nurse, while his hands held nothing save a red-hot memory of where the rope had been. The smashing of glass and the clatter of hoofs on the pavement filled in what space was left in his mind for other impressions.

"She's into the hat shop!" said Mr. Rupert Gunning to himself in the window of the club, recognizing his recent purchase and the full measure of the calamity in one and the same moment.

He also recognized in its perfection the fact, already suspected by him, that he had been a fool.

Upheld by this soothing reflection he went out into the street, where awaited him the privileges of proprietorship. These began with the dispatching of the mare, badly cut and apparently lame on every leg, in charge of the remains of the under-strapper, to her destination. They continued with the consolation of the hospital nurse, and embraced in varying pecuniary degrees the compensation of the sandwich man, the newspaper boy, and the proprietor of the hat shop. During all this time he enjoyed the unfaltering attention of a fair-sized crowd, liberal in comment, prolific of imbecile suggestion. And all these things were only the beginning of the trouble.

Mr. Gunning proceeded to his room and to the packing of his portmanteau for that evening's mail-boat to Holyhead in a mood of considerable sourness. It may be conceded to him that circumstances had been of a souring character. He had bought Miss Fanny Fitzroy's gray mare at the Horse Show for reasons of an undeniably sentimental sort. Therefore, having no good cause to show for the purchase, he had paid secretly the sum of sixty pounds for an animal that he had consistently crabbed, amounting in the eyes of the world in general to a rather advanced love-token, if not a formal declaration. He had planned no future for the gray mare, but he had cherished a trembling hope that some day he might be in a position to restore her to her late owner without considering the expression in any eyes save those which had recalled to him the play of lights in a Connemara trout stream.

Now, it appeared, this pleasing vision must go the way of many others.

The August sunlight illumined Mr. Gunning's folly and his bulging portmanteau, packed as brutally as only a man in a passion can pack; when he reached the hall it also irradiated the short figure and seedy tidiness of the dealer who had been his confederate in the purchase of the mare.

"What did the vet say, Brennan?" said Mr. Gunning with the brevity of ill-humor.

Mr. Brennan paused before replying, a pause laden with the promise of evil tidings. His short, silvery hair glistened respectably in the sunshine; he had preserved unblemished from some earlier phase of his career the air of a family coachman out of place. It veiled, though it could not conceal, the dissolute twinkle in his eye as he replied:

"He said, sir, if it wasn't that she was something out of condition, he'd recommend you to send her out to the lions at the Zoo!"

"THE COB I BOUGHT AT THE HORSE SHOW? OH, YES—I GOT RID OF IT"

This specimen of veterinary humor had hardly the success that had been hoped for it. Rupert Gunning's face was so remarkably void of appreciation that Mr. Brennan abruptly relapsed into gloom.

"He said he'd only be wasting his time with her, sir; he might as well go stitch a bog-hole as them wounds the window gave her; the tendon of the near fore is the same as in two halves with it, let alone the shoulder, that's worse again with her pitching out on the point of it."

"Was that all he had to say?" demanded the mare's owner.

"Well, beyond those remarks he passed about the Zoo, I should say it was, sir," admitted Mr. Brennan.

There was another pause, during which Rupert asked himself what the deuce he was to do with the mare, and Mr. Brennan, thoroughly aware that he was doing so, decorously thumbed the brim of his hat.

"Maybe we might let her get the night, sir," he said, after a respectful interval, "and you might see her yourself in the morning——"

"I don't want to see her. I know well enough what she looks like," interrupted his client irritably. "Anyhow, I'm crossing to England to-night, and I don't choose to miss the boat for the fun of looking at an unfortunate brute that's cut half to pieces!"

Mr. Brennan cleared his throat. "If you were thinking to leave her in my stables, sir," he said firmly, "I'd sooner be quit of her. I've only a small place, and I'd lose too much time with her if I had to keep her the way she is. She might be on my hands three months and die at the end of it."

The clock here struck the quarter at which Mr. Gunning ought to start for his train at Westland Row.

"You see, sir——" recommenced Brennan. It was precisely at this point that Mr. Gunning lost his temper.

"I suppose you can find time to shoot her," he said with a very red face. "Kindly do so to-night!"

Mr. Brennan's arid countenance revealed no emotion. He was accustomed to understanding his clients a trifle better than they understood themselves, and inscrutable though Mr.

Gunning's original motive in buying the mare had been, he had during this interview yielded to treatment and followed a prepared path.

That night, in the domestic circle, he went so far as to lay the matter before Mrs. Brennan.

"He picked out a mare that was as poor as a raven—though she's a good-enough stamp if she was in condition—and tells me to buy her. 'What price will I give, sir?' says I. 'Ye'll give what they're askin',' says he, 'and that's sixty sovereigns!' I'm thirty years buying horses, and such a disgrace was never put on me, to be made a fool of before all Dublin! Going giving the first price for a mare that wasn't value for the half of it! Well, he sees the mare then, cut into garters below in Nassau Street. Divil a hair he cares! Nor never came down to the stable to put an eye on her! 'Shoot her!' says he, leppin' up on a car. 'Westland Row!' says he to the fella'. 'Drive like blazes!'—and away with him! Well, no matter; I earned my money easy, an' I got the mare cheap!"

Mrs. Brennan added another spoonful of brown sugar to the porter that she was mulling in a saucepan on the range.

"Didn't ye say it was a young lady that owned the mare, James?" she asked in a colorless voice.

"Well, you're the divil, Mary!" replied Mr. Brennan in sincere admiration.

The mail-boat was as crowded as is usual on the last night of the Horse Show week. Overhead flowed the smoke river from the funnels, behind flowed the foam river of wake; the Hill of Howth receded apace into the west, its lighthouse glowing like a planet in the twilight. Men with cigars, aggressively fit and dinner-full, strode the deck in couples, and thrashed out the Horse Show and Leopardstown to their uttermost husks.

Rupert Gunning was also, but with excessive reluctance, discussing the Horse Show. As he had given himself a good deal of trouble in order to cross on this particular evening, and as any one who was even slightly acquainted with Miss Fitzroy must have been aware that she would decline to talk of anything else, sympathy for him is not altogether deserved. The boat swung softly in a trance of speed, and Miss Fitzroy, better known to a larger circle of intimates as Fanny Fitz, tried to think the motion was pleasant. She had made a good many migrations to England by various routes and classes. There had indeed been times of stress when she had crossed unostentatiously third class, trusting that luck and a thick veil might save her from her friends, but the day after she had sold a horse for sixty pounds was not the day for a daughter of Ireland to study economics. The breeze brought warm and subtle wafts from the machinery; it also blew wisps of hair into Fanny Fitz's eyes and over her nose, in a manner much revered in fiction, but in real life usually unbecoming and always exasperating. She leaned back on the bench and wondered whether the satisfaction of crowing over Mr. Gunning compensated her for abandoning the tranquil security of the ladies' cabin.

Mr. Gunning, though less contradictious than his wont, was certainly one of the most deliberately unsympathetic men she knew. None the less he was a man, and some one to talk to, both points in his favor, and she stayed on.

"I just missed meeting the man who bought my mare," she said, recurring to the subject for the fourth time; "apparently he didn't think her 'a leggy, long-backed brute,' as other people did, or said they did!"

"Did many people say it?" asked Mr. Gunning, beginning to make a cigarette.

"Oh, no one whose opinion signified!" retorted Fanny Fitz with a glance from her charming, changeful eyes that suggested that she did not always mean quite what she said. "I believe the dealer bought her for a Leicestershire man. What she really wants is a big country where she can extend herself."

Mr. Gunning reflected that by this time the gray mare had extended herself once for all in Brennan's back yard: he had done nothing to be ashamed of, but he felt abjectly guilty.

"If I go with Maudie to Connemara again next year," continued Fanny, "I must look out for another. You'll come, too, I hope? A little opposition is such a help in making up one's mind! I don't know what I should have done without you at Leenane last June!"

Perhaps it was the vision of early summer that the words called up; perhaps it was the smile, half-seen in the semi-dark, that curved her provoking lips; perhaps it was compunction for his share in the tragedy of the Connemara mare; but possibly without any of these explanations Rupert would have done as he did, which was to place his hand on Fanny Fitz's as it lay on the bench beside him.

She was so amazed that for a moment she wildly thought he had mistaken it in the darkness for his tobacco pouch. Then, jumping with a shock to the conclusion that even the unsympathetic Mr. Gunning shared most men's views about not wasting an opportunity, she removed her hand with a jerk.

"Oh! I beg your pardon!" said Rupert pusillanimously. Miss Fitzroy fell back again on the tobacco-pouch theory.

At this moment the glowing end of a cigar deviated from its orbit on the deck and approached them.

"HE SAID, SIR, HE'D RECOMMEND YOU TO SEND HER OUT TO THE LIONS AT THE ZOO!"

"Is that you, Gunning? I thought it was your voice," said the owner of the cigar.

"Yes, it is," said Mr. Gunning in a tone singularly lacking in encouragement. "Thought I saw you at dinner, but couldn't be sure."

As a matter of fact, no one could have been more thoroughly aware than he of Captain Carteret's presence in the saloon.

"I thought so, too!" said Fanny Fitz from the darkness, "but Captain Carteret wouldn't look my way!"

Captain Carteret gave a somewhat exaggerated start of discovery and threw his cigar over the side. He had evidently come to stay.

"How was it I didn't see you at the Horse Show?" he said.

"The only people one ever sees there are the people one doesn't want to see," said Fanny. "I could meet no one except the auctioneer from Craffroe, and he always said the same thing. 'Fearful sultry, Miss Fitzroy! Have ye a purchaser yet for your animal, Miss Fitzroy? Ye have not! Oh, fie, fie!' It was rather funny at first, but it palled."

"I was there only one day," said Captain Carteret; "I wish I'd known you had a horse up; I might have helped you to sell."

"Thanks! I sold all right," said Fanny Fitz magnificently. "Did rather well, too!"

"Capital!" said Captain Carteret vaguely. His acquaintance with Fanny extended over a three-day shooting party in Kildare, and a dance given by the detachment of his regiment at Enniscar, for which he had come down from the depot. It was not sufficient to enlighten him as to what it meant to her to own and sell a horse for the first time in her life.

"By the by, Gunning," he went on, "you seemed to be having a lively time in Nassau Street yesterday! My wife and I were driving in from the polo, and we saw you in the thick of what looked like a street row. Some one in the club afterward told me it was a horse you had bought at the show that had come to grief. I hope it wasn't much hurt?"

There was a moment of silence—astonished, inquisitive silence on the part of Miss Fitzroy; temporary cessation of the faculty of speech on that of Mr. Gunning. It was the moment, as he reflected afterward, for a clean, decisive lie, a denial of all ownership; either that or the instant flinging of Captain Carteret overboard.

Unfortunately for him, he did neither; he lied partially, timorously, and with that clinging to the skirts of the truth that marks the novice.

"Oh, she was all right," he said, his face purpling heavily in the kindly darkness. "What was the polo like, Carteret?"

"But I had no idea that you had bought a horse!" broke in Fanny Fitz in high excitement. "Why didn't you tell Maudie and me? What is it like?"

"Oh, it's—she's just a cob—a gray cob—I just picked her up at the end of the show."

"What sort of a cob? Can she jump? Are you going to ride her with Freddy's hounds?" continued the implacably interested Fanny.

"I bought her as—as a trapper, and to do a bit of carting," replied Rupert, beginning suddenly to feel his powers of invention awakening. "She's quite a common brute. She doesn't jump."

"She seems to have jumped pretty well in Nassau Street," remarked Captain Carteret; "as well as I could see in the crowd, she didn't strike me as if she'd take kindly to carting."

"Well, I do think you might have told us about it!" reiterated Fanny Fitz. "Men are so ridiculously mysterious about buying or selling horses. I simply named my price and got it. I see nothing to make a mystery about in a deal; do you, Captain Carteret?"

"Well, that depends on whether you are buying or selling," replied Captain Carteret.

But Fate, in the shape of a turning tide and a consequent roll, played for once into the hands of Rupert Gunning. The boat swayed slowly, but deeply, and a waft of steam blew across Miss Fitzroy's face. It was not mere steam; it had been among hot, oily things, stealing and giving odor. Fanny Fitz was not sick, but she knew that she had her limits, and that conversation, save of the usual rudimentary kind with the stewardess, were best abandoned.

PART II

MR. WILLIAM TENNESSY, lately returned from America, at present publican in Enniscar and proprietor of a small farm on its outskirts, had taken a gray mare to the forge.

It was now November, and the mare had been out at grass for nearly three months, somewhat to the detriment of her figure, but very much to her general advantage. Even in the southwest of Ireland it is not usual to keep horses out quite so late in the year, but Mr. Tennessy, having begun his varied career as a traveling tinker, was not the man to be bound by convention. He had provided the mare with the society of a donkey and two sheep, and with the shelter of a filthy and ruinous cow-shed. Taking into consideration the fact that he had paid only seven pounds ten shillings for her, he thought this accommodation was as much as she was entitled to.

She was now drooping and dozing in a dark corner of the forge, waiting her turn to be shod, as shaggy and as dirty a creature as had ever stood there.

"Where did ye get that one?" inquired the owner of a car with a broken spring, in the course of much lengthy conversation.

"I got her from a cousin of my own that died down in the County Limerick," said Mr. Tennessy in his most agreeable manner. "'Twas himself bred her, and she was near deshtroyed fallin' back on a harra' with him. It's for postin' I have her."

"She's shlack enough yet," said the carman.

"Ah, wait a while!" said Mr. Tennessy easily; "in a week's time when I'll have her clipped out she'll be as clean as amber."

The conversation flowed on to other themes.

It was nearly dark when the carman took his departure, and the smith, a silent youth with sore eyes, caught hold of one of the gray mare's fetlocks and told her to "lift!" He examined each hoof in succession by the light of a candle stuck in a bottle, raked his fire together, and then, turning to Mr. Tennessy, remarked:

"Ye'd laugh if ye were here the day I put a slipper on this one, an' she afther comin' out o' the thrain—last June it was. 'Twas one Connolly back from Craffroeside was taking her from the station; him that thrained her for Miss Fitzroy. She gave him the two heels in the face." The glow from the fire illumined the smith's sardonic grin of remembrance. "She had a sand-crack in the near fore that time, and there's the sign of it yet."

The Cinderella-like episode of the slipper had naturally not entered into Mr. Tennessy's calculations, but he took the unforeseen without a change of countenance.

"Well, now," he said deliberately, "I was sayin' to meself on the road a while ago, if there was one this side o' the counthry would know her it'd be yerself."

The smith took the compliment with a blink of his sore eyes.

"Any one'd be hard set to know her now," he said.

There was a pause, during which a leap of sparks answered each thump of the hammer on the white-hot iron, and Mr. Tennessy arranged his course of action.

"Well, Larry," he said, "I'll tell ye now what no one in this counthry knows but meself and Patsey Crimmeen. Sure I know it's as good to tell a thing to the ground as to tell it to yerself!"

He lowered his voice.

"'Twas Mr. Gunning, of Streamstown, bought that one from Miss Fitzroy at the Dublin Show, and a hundhred pound he gave for her!"

The smith mentally docked this sum by seventy pounds, but said "By dam!" in polite convention.

"'Twasn't a week afther that I got her for twinty-five pound!"

The smith made a further mental deduction equally justified by the facts; the long snore and wheeze of the bellows filled the silence, and the dirty walls flushed and glowed with the steady crescendo and diminuendo of the glow.

The ex-tinker picked up the bottle with the candle. "Look at that!" he said, lowering the light and displaying a long transverse scar beginning at the mare's knee and ending in an enlarged fetlock.

"I seen that," said the smith.

"And look at that!" continued Mr. Tennessy, putting back the shaggy hair on her shoulder. A wide and shiny patch of black skin showed where the hatter's plate glass had flayed the shoulder. "She played the divil' goin' through the streets, and made flitthers of herself this way in a shop window. Gunning give the word to shoot her. The dealer's boy told Patsey Crimmeen. 'Twas Patsey was careing her at the show for Miss Fitzroy. Sbtan', will ye!"—this to the mare, whose eyes glinted white as she flung away her head from the light of the candle.

"Whatever fright she got she didn't forget it," said the smith.

"I was up in Dublin meself the same time," pursued Mr. Tennessy. "Afther seein' Patsey I took a sbtroll down to Brennan's yard. The leg was in two halves, barrin' the shkin, and the showldher swoll up as big as a sack o' male. I was three or four days goin' down to look at her this way, and I seen she wasn't as bad as what they thought. I come in one morning, and the boy says to me, 'The boss has three horses comin' in to-day an' I dunno where'll we put this one.' I goes to Brennan, and he sitting down to his breakfast, and the wife with him. 'Sir,' says I, 'for the honor of God sell me that mare!' We had hard strugglin' then. In the latther end the wife says, 'It's as good for ye to part with her, James,' say she, 'and Mr. Gunning'll never know what way she went. This honest man'll never say where he got her.' 'I will not, ma'am,' says I. 'I have a brother in the postin' line in Belfast, and it's for him I'm buyin' her.'"

The process of making nail-holes in the shoe seemed to engross the taciturn young smith's attention for the next minute or two.

"There was a man over from Craffroe in town yesterday," he observed presently, "that said Mr. Gunning was lookin' out for a cob, and he'd fancy one that would lep."

He eyed his work sedulously as he spoke.

Something, it might have been the light of the candle, woke a flicker in Mr. Tennessy's eye. He passed his hand gently down the mare's quarter.

"Supposing now that the mane was off her, and something about six inches of a dock took off her tail, what sort of a cob d'ye think she'd make, Larry?"

The smith, with a sudden falsetto cackle of laughter, plunged the shoe into a tub of water, in which it gurgled and spluttered as if in appreciation of the jest.

PART III

DOTTED at intervals throughout society are the people endowed with the faculty for "getting up things." They are dauntless people, filled with the power of driving lesser and deeper reluctant spirits before them.

Of such was Mrs. Carteret, with powers matured in hill-stations in India, mellowed by much voyaging in P. and O. steamers. Not even an environment as unpromising as that of Enniscar in its winter torpor had power to dismay her. A public whose artistic tastes had hitherto been nourished upon traveling circuses, Nationalist meetings, and missionary magic lanterns in the Wesleyan schoolhouse was, she argued, practically virgin soil, and would ecstatically respond to any form of cultivation.

"I know there's not much talent to be had," she said combatively to her husband, "but we'll just black our faces and call ourselves the Green Coons or something, and it will be all right!"

"Dashed if I'll black my face again," said Captain Carteret. "I call it rot trying to get up anything here. There's no one to do anything."

"Well, there's ourselves and little Taylour" ("little Taylour," it may be explained, was Captain Carteret's subaltern), "that's two banjos and a bones, anyhow; and Freddy Alexander, and there's your dear friend Fanny Fitz—she'll be home in a few days, and those two big Hamilton girls——"

"Oh, Heavens!" ejaculated Captain Carteret.

"Oh, yes!" continued Mrs. Carteret, unheedingly, "and there's Mr. Gunning; he'll come if Fanny Fitz does."

"He'll not be much advantage when he does come," said Captain Carteret spitefully.

"Oh, he sings," said Mrs. Carteret, arranging her neat small fringe at the glass—"rather a good voice. You needn't be afraid, my dear; I'll arrange that the fascinating Fanny shall sit next you!"

Upon this somewhat unstable basis the formation of the troupe of Green Coons was undertaken. Mrs. Carteret took off her coat to the work, or rather, to be accurate, she put on a fur-lined one, and attended a Nationalist meeting in the Town Hall to judge for herself how the voices carried. She returned rejoicing—she had sat at the back of the hall and had not lost a syllable of the oratory, even during sundry heated episodes, discreetly summarized by the local paper as "interruption." The Town Hall was chartered, superficially cleansed, and in a week the posters had gone forth.

By what means it was accomplished that Rupert Gunning should attend the first rehearsal he did not exactly understand: he found himself enmeshed in a promise to meet every one else at the Town Hall, with tea at the Carterets' later.

The rehearsal progressed after the manner of amateur rehearsals. The troupe, with the exception of Mr. Gunning, who remained wrapped in silence, talked irrepressibly, and quite inappropriately to their rôle as Green Coons. Fanny Fitz and Captain Carteret finally removed themselves to a grimy corner behind the proscenium, and there practiced, sotto voce, the song with banjo accompaniment that was to culminate in the hornpipe. Freddy Alexander had gone forth to purchase a pack of cards in the futile hope that he could prevail upon Mrs. Carteret to allow him to inflict conjuring tricks upon the audience.

"As if there were anything on earth that bored people as much as card tricks!" said that experienced lady to Rupert Gunning. "Look here, would you mind reading over these riddles to see which you'd like to have to answer? Now, here's a local one. I'll ask it—'Why am dis room like de Enniscar Demesne?' And then you'll say, 'Because dere am so many pretty little deers in it!'"

"Oh, I couldn't possibly do that!" said Rupert hastily, alarmed as well as indignant; "I'm afraid I really must go now——"

He had to pass by Fanny Fitz on his way out of the hall. There was something vexed and forlorn about him, and being sympathetic she perceived it, though not its cause.

"You're deserting us!" she said, looking up at him.

"I have an appointment," he said stiffly, his glance evading hers and resting on Captain Carteret's well-clipped little black head.

Some of Fanny's worst scrapes had been brought about by her incapacity to allow any one to part from her on bad terms, and, moreover, she liked Rupert Gunning. She cast about in her mind for something conciliatory to say to him.

"When are you going to show me the cob that you bought at the Horse Show?"

The olive branch thus confidently tendered had a somewhat withering reception.

"The cob I bought at the Horse Show?" Mr. Gunning repeated with an increase of rigidity—"Oh, yes—I got rid of it."

He paused; the twangling of Captain Carteret's banjo bridged the interval imperturbably.

"Why had you to get rid of it?" asked Fanny, still sympathetic.

"She was a failure!" said Rupert vindictively; "I made a fool of myself in buying her!"

Fanny looked at him sideways from under her lashes.

"And I had counted on your giving me a mount on her now and then!"

Rupert forgot his wrath, forgot even the twangling banjo.

"I've just got another cob," he said quickly; "she jumps very well, and if you'd like to hunt her next Tuesday——"

"Oh, thanks awfully, but Captain Carteret has promised me a mount for next Tuesday!" said the perfidious Fanny.

Mrs. Carteret, on her knees by a refractory footlight, watched with anxiety Mr. Gunning's abrupt departure.

"Fanny!" she said severely, "what have you been doing to that man?"

"Oh, nothing!" said Fanny.

"If you've put him off singing I'll never forgive you!" continued Mrs. Carteret, advancing on her knees to the next footlight.

"I tell you I've done nothing to him," said Fanny Fitz guiltily.

In the mean time the object of this discussion was driving his ten Irish miles home by the light of a frosty full moon. Between the shafts of his cart a trim-looking mare of about fifteen hands trotted lazily, forging, shying, and generally comporting herself in a way only possible to a grass-fed animal who has been in the hands of such as Mr. William Tennessy. The thick and dingy mane that had hung impartially on each side of her neck, now, together with the major portion of her voluminous tail, adorned the manure heap in the rear of the Tennessy public-house. The pallid fleece in which she had been muffled had given place to a polished coat of iron-gray, that looked black in the moonlight. A week of overabundant oats had made her opinionated, but had not, so far, restored to her the fine-lady nervousness that had landed her in the window of the hat shop.

Rupert laid the whip along her fat sides with bitter disfavor. She was a brute in harness, he said to himself; her blemished fetlock was uglier than he had at first thought, and even though she had yesterday schooled over two miles of country like an old stager, she was too small to carry him, and she was not, apparently, wanted to carry any one else. Here the purchase received a very disagreeable cut on the neck that interrupted her speculations as to the nature of the shadows of telegraph-posts. To have bought two useless horses in four months was pretty average bad luck. It was also pretty bad luck to have been born a fool. Reflection here became merged in the shapeless and futile fumings of a man badly in love and preposterously jealous.

THE CUP OF THE UNDER-STRAPPER'S MISFORTUNES BRIMMED OVER

For Fanny Fitz the memory of the performance was a nightmare of blinding heat and glare, made actual only by poignant anxiety as to the length of her green skirt. The hope that she might be unrecognizable was shattered by the yell of "More power, Miss Fanny!" that crested the thunderous encore, evoked by her hornpipe with Captain Carteret, and the question of the skirt was decided by the fact that her aunts, in the front row, firmly perused their programs from the beginning of her dance to its conclusion.

The entertainment went with varying success, after the manner of its kind. The local hits and personal allusions, tollfully compiled and ardently believed in, were received in damping silence, while Rupert Gunning's song, of the truculent order dedicated to basses, and sung by him with a face

FREAKS AND FORTUNES IN ADVERTISING

By Paul Latzke

THE NANNY-GOAT'S $20,000,000 LUNCHEON, AND OTHER SUBSTANTIAL WONDERS OF THE NEWEST BUSINESS

ON HARLEM HEIGHTS, where Washington fought, a goat was browsing. It was apparently most unpromising feeding-ground. But the goat was a wise goat and knew her business.

Surrounding her bare pasture on three sides were towering flat houses, the back windows of which overlooked the goat's preserve. It is strictly forbidden in New York, "under penalty of the law," to throw refuse out of one's window, but the Harlem goats have long since learned that there is nothing pleases New Yorkers more than to violate the law, if they can do so with comfort and safety.

This psychological fact known to few men, but understood by all animals on Manhattan Island that have to hustle for a living, makes this particular spot one of the choicest pastures known to the predatory kingdom, and the wise goat had only been able to possess herself of it after several sharp encounters with invaders. I had watched these encounters with warm interest, and it may have been in response to my prayers for the reward of the valiant Nanny that a window in one of the flats was opened, and a basket of refuse thrown out by a neat [illegible]e. Haynes, who years ago did the Harlem Police [illegible] for the Associated Press, insisted that my prayers had [illegible]ing to do with it.

"It is simply the criminal instinct of the Harlemite asserting itself," declared Haynes.

"You're a pessimist," I chided mildly. "Whatever the cause, the act has brought joy to the goat. See her expression of rapt satisfaction."

"And no wonder," said Haynes with a cheerful grin. "She's just had a $20,000,000 luncheon."

The change from melancholy pessimism was so pleasant that I let the imbecile remark go without comment. But Haynes wouldn't have it so.

"It's a fact; she's had a $20,000,000 meal. See that red paper disappearing down her throat?"

"Yes," I said kindly, watching him suspiciously for further symptoms.

"Well, sir, that paper—it has all disappeared now—was worth $20,000,000. That is, the right to reproduce it is."

I turned my attention again to the goat as the more promising subject of the two.

"You don't believe it?" persevered Haynes.

"I'm polite, Haynes, always."

"Well, it's true just the same. That thing the goat swallowed was a label off a baking-powder can. The company that owns that brand of baking powder is incorporated for $20,000,000; its stock is worth much more. And the main asset behind that immense capitalization is the right to use the red label of which you just saw the finish."

Haynes has imagination, but lacks depth. That is why he never got on as a newspaper man, and has to content himself with a paltry forty or fifty thousand a year in Wall Street, where he's now a broker. With proper mental balance, having gone so far as to see $20,000,000 in a tin-can label, he would have pursued the idea until he found behind it something far more wonderful—the power that made this label worth all these millions.

An analysis of this power makes the most fascinating study I know. In it lies everything the ambitious man craves—money, fame, adventure, wit and humor. The story of the baking-powder label makes an interesting study.

The "Sympathetic" Way to Wealth

SHORTLY after the war, one Doctor Price rode what might be called a "medical circuit" around the small towns lying near Chicago. He had various healing nostrums which he distributed. He announced his arrival in the various towns by advance advertising in the local newspapers, and gave further publicity to his works by distributing handbills that proclaimed the merits of his medicines. A regular physician would have called this quackery, but Doctor Price was content; he was building up a very good practice. He established regular dates in each town, and always found a satisfactory company of patients awaiting him. The doctor was a particular favorite with the women, for he not only brought them good advice and plenty of medicine, but he gave what was worth even more—intelligent sympathy. And out of this sympathy grew the $20,000,000 label that furnished a luncheon to the Harlem goat. In the course of his travels Doctor Price heard much of the troubles of bread and cake making. The housewives, and especially the housewives on farms, were always full of the difficulties that beset them in providing fresh yeast. The recitals on this subject were so frequent, and the trouble apparently so serious, that the doctor, ever a resourceful man, finally concluded that he would find his patients a substitute. He was, among other things, an excellent chemist, and he set about his task with system. After many trials he finally found a combination that worked—cream of tartar and soda, with a mixture of potato starch.

Editor's Note—This is the first of a series by Mr. Latzke. The next paper will appear in an early number.

The First Battle of the Ink-Slingers

WHEN he was satisfied that his "baking powder," as he called it, would do the work, the doctor took a package out on his circuit. Whenever he could he traded off small lots of it for board and lodging. To put it up commercially had not at this time occurred to him. But the housewives who used the powder reported so rapturously the results that it did not take him long to determine that here was something better than country doctoring, if he could only advise womenkind generally of this new boon. As to the method, the doctor had no doubt that advertising would do the work. His small experience with his medicines convinced him of that. But advertising cost money, and of money the doctor had precious little. He went as far as his slight capital would warrant. Then he induced a country banker of Waukegan, Illinois, to buy a half-interest in his "baking powder."

Headquarters were established in Chicago and a systematic, though modest, advertising campaign was begun. Not many years afterward Doctor Price bought out his partner's interest. The exact purchase price has never become known, but one item was the transfer of $400,000 worth of high-class Chicago real estate. Persons in a position to know say that the partner received about $1,000,000 for his half-interest in the "baking powder."

At the time this sale was effected there was no longer anything secret about the compounding of baking powder. Doctor Price's simple preparation had been analyzed by scores of chemists, and there were dozens of similar mixtures on the market. But only one other was strongly advertised. Its owners were Dr. C. N. Hoagland, his brother, J. C. Hoagland, and William Ziegler. The Hoaglands had come originally from Fort Wayne, Indiana, where they owned a drug store. They were among the first to learn of Price's formula, having put up the baking powder for the doctor while it was still manufactured on a small scale. They moved afterward to Chicago and then to New York, where they joined forces with Mr. Ziegler, who was a manufacturer of flavoring extracts. It was said of the Hoaglands, both of whom are now dead, that they were in many respects the most daring advertisers ever known. At the start they went often without the necessaries of life in order to devote every penny they could rake and scrape to newspaper and magazine publicity. For years after their sales reached into the hundred thousands they continued to live in the smallest way, using all their income to enlarge their advertising. So aggressive did their work finally become, especially after they joined hands with Ziegler, that the business of their competitors was grievously menaced. It was because Price's partner, who never could quite fight down the conservatism that comes with country banking, would not consent to meet the Hoaglands on their own ground that Doctor Price bought him out. In the year following his purchase Doctor Price spent $280,000 for printer's ink and his competitors probably half as much again. This was considered enormous for those times. But worse was to come. The Hoaglands and Ziegler fell out, and the latter sold his interest to his partners. Within a few months Doctor Hoagland retired. Mr. Ziegler then bought an interest in the Price Company, and Doctor Hoagland, with Charles O. Gates and others, bought out the Cleveland Brothers, who were putting up baking powder in a small way at Albany, New York.

Then ensued a fight that brought joy to the publishers and, though no one expected it at the time, enormous gains to the combatants. Millions were spent by the rivals in advertising, and every one prophesied ultimate ruin. But so well did they all do their work that the aggregate sales were stimulated beyond anything that had been deemed possible, and the money poured out returned almost at once. Besides, there was built up a business for all three of the powders that has never since lost its impetus.

The death of Doctor Hoagland brought about a cessation of hostilities and the three companies were combined under one charter.

Doctor Price retired with a fortune estimated at $5,000,000. Mr. Ziegler also retired and is ranked among the important millionaires of New York, with a hobby for $250,000 Polar expeditions and other diversions that take the place of business with him.

The two Hoaglands left estates worth millions. No one knows how rich are Mr. Gates and the others now at the head of the resulting company, but it is known that the output of the combination is greater than ever. Its stock pays an average dividend of a million and a half a year. Its cash surplus is as high as the Eiffel Tower.

And all this vast wealth was created by advertising.

The Gold Mine in the Printer's Ink-Pot

THE joys of gold mining have been sung in all times, and "Better than a gold mine" has come to be an accepted phrase for describing the superlative in money-making. But for dazzling results gold mining is not in the same class with this other mining in the printer's ink-pot.

The gold production of the entire world for 1901 was $252,095,600. To produce this sum about $200,000,000 was paid out for labor, supplies, transportation, reduction, etc. This left a net profit of $50,000,000 in round numbers on the year's gold mining. In the United States alone $250,000,000 was spent last year for advertising. On this there was an estimated profit of $75,000,000, or $25,000,000 more than was cleared by gold mining throughout the whole world. A considerable sum of money was lost in advertising because of inexpert work, but these losses do not compare with the enormous sums lost by unfortunate prospectors and operators in gold mining. It has been said with some authority that more money in the shape of labor and supplies is put into the ground each year by miners than is taken out. The comparatively small number of men who have grown rich out of mining would seem to give this saying force. Of men who have grown rich through advertising there are scores to be found in every city, almost in every town. With few exceptions, almost every industry in the land is dependent on proper advertising for success. And this is getting to be the case to a greater extent every year. Even the Standard Oil Company, notorious for its antiquated methods, is going into the field

Not long ago the company spent over $200,000 advertising the virtues of oil stoves for cooking and heating, to stimulate the demand for kerosene.

The coal strike last year taxed the petroleum supply to such an extent that the Standard did not repeat the experiment, which, it is said, was found very satisfactory. Some of its by-products, like paraffine wax and candles, axle grease, lubricating oil, and so forth, are advertised regularly, but in a small way compared to the advertising of some of the other big trusts. It is confidently prophesied, however, that the time is in sight when the Standard Oil will spend a million dollars a year to push its products, as some of the other great combinations are doing.

The United States Steel Company since its organization has spent probably three times as much for advertising as was spent before consolidation by its constituent companies. One of its branches, the American Steel and Wire Company, has gone into practically every agricultural paper in the country advertising its wire fencing. The National Biscuit Company last year spent in the neighborhood of a million and a quarter dollars, and the American Tobacco Company about as much.

Railroad advertising has grown by successive stages until to-day it ranks among the most important in the land. The fifteen leading railroads of the country spent in 1901 over $2,000,000, and it is expected that the annual reports for 1902 will show a very large increase over this. A comparatively few years ago there was little or no railroad advertising in the ordinary sense. The New York Central led the way when George H. Daniels became its general passenger agent, and the other great roads were not slow to follow suit.

The entire industrial system of the country is being modified by the power of advertising. The middle man, the jobber, is being more and more eliminated, and the producer is going direct to the consumer. This would have been practically impossible without the modern use of printer's ink. The story of P. D. Armour's first venture in advertising illustrates this fact very aptly. In the days before food staples were advertised in the public prints, and that was only about twenty years ago, Lord & Thomas, the Chicago advertising agents, began a campaign against Mr. Armour. They kept at it for years without success, putting up in the mean time with some very pretty brushes of temper, for Mr. Armour was not soft spoken when he wished to be rid of any one. But one day Mr. Lord found his opportunity and made the most of it. Mr. Armour was in his private office when Mr. Lord was shown in. His reception was not particularly warm, but an advertising agent is used to perseverance in the face of discouragement, buoyed up by the knowledge that he is the advance agent of prosperity for all who will listen to his counsel and follow his instructions. There was the usual argument between Mr. Armour and Mr. Lord which was about to end in the usual way, when the packer incautiously went beyond his depth by saying:

How P. D. Armour was Converted

"ARMOUR & CO. don't have to advertise. Our goods are known and appreciated by every man in the trade."

"So they are, Mr. Armour. But they are not known by the consumers."

"What difference does that make as long as the jobber and retailer know and sell them?"

"It makes this difference: A woman comes into a grocery store to buy beef extract. You make good beef extract, but she never heard of it because you've not advertised it. She has heard of some other extract which has been advertised, and she naturally asks for it. The grocer at first may try to push your product, but he'll soon grow tired of that, for the woman doesn't know it and doesn't want it. Do you think that grocer is going to wear out his gray matter for you? Not much. He's going to give that woman and all his other customers what they want. Your extract is going to lie on his shelf until the wrappers are soiled and the stuff is unsalable. Then you have to replace it. What you want to do is to educate the women into asking for Armour's extract. That you can only do by advertising."

Mr. Armour, whose figure was large and rotund, had a peculiar way of sticking out his stomach and putting his thumbs in his trousers pocket when he became interested. He struck this attitude soon after Mr. Lord got his new lead, and remained perfectly quiet until the advertising agent had finished. Then he said:

"Young man, I believe you're right. It's never been put to me in that light before."

Mr. Lord walked out of the office with a contract for $10,000, the first money ever spent by Armour & Co. for printer's ink. Last year the firm spent in the neighborhood of $200,000.

This is often the course of advertising—it has fairly to be forced down the throat of the man who afterward makes millions out of it and who comes in the end to count it as the greatest money-making machine under his control. At times, however, it is the other way about, the new advertiser having hard work to get into print, because the experts consider him reckless. The best story in illustration of this is told of a man who, starting without a penny, died a millionaire.

An Ingenious Young Man of Augusta

IN 1870 the firm of George P. Rowell & Co., New York advertising agents, received an inquiry from Augusta, Maine, that, Mr. Rowell remarked to his partner, must have come "from either a fool or a knave." The preposterous thing this man wanted was to place an inch advertisement in all the principal publications throughout the country. To-day such a proposition would not cause even a ripple in the least important advertising concern. But in 1870 such a thing had never been heard of. There were then no general lists of publications in existence. The few advertising agencies that were in business knew all about the papers in their immediate vicinities, but beyond that their knowledge was limited, both as to the class of publications and the rates charged for advertising. Nothing better illustrates the enormous strides that have been made in advertising within the last twenty-five years than this fact. The Augusta man was put off with an evasive answer. But he came back again as soon as the mails would carry, reiterating his demand. After several exchanges, Mr. Rowell finally wrote his correspondent that he evidently didn't know what he was asking; that the lists and estimates he required involved the expenditure of considerable time and money, and that the outlay required for such an undertaking was beyond the means of any man who did not have command of a very large fortune.

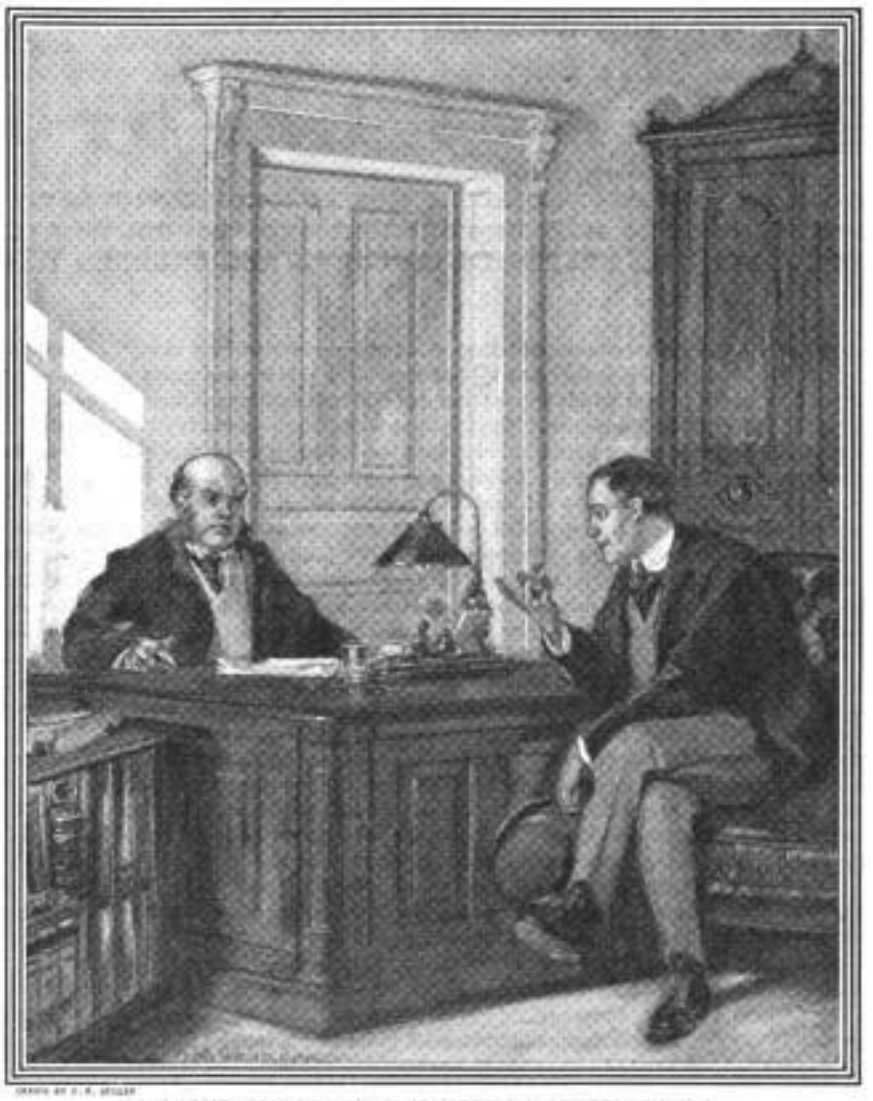
In response to this information there came a letter from Augusta couched in very clean-cut terms. Whatever might be the state of mind in New York, the writer said, up in Augusta people always knew what they wanted before they asked for it, and he was no exception to this rule. In desperation, Mr. Rowell made up a partial list of papers whose rates he knew. Then he sent his Augusta friend a note that he felt would end the business. He told him that if he intended carrying out the "huge" project he had written about, the list submitted would of necessity have to be included. To cover this list would involve the expenditure of $1800. If the Maine man was in earnest he could show his good faith in the matter by sending check by return mail for this sum. Upon receipt of such a check, Mr Rowell said, he should feel justified in going further, though that would require a personal interview. As promptly as the mails could travel there came a return letter and in this was a certified check for the amount asked. Also a curt request for the personal interview. The writer said he was too busy to come to New York, but having shown his good faith it was now up to Mr. Rowell to come to Augusta.

It was February, and particularly nasty weather. But under the circumstances there was nothing for the advertising agent to do but journey to Maine, where the thermometer ranged in the neighborhood of zero. Arriving in Augusta he put up his grip-sack at a hotel and then hunted up the address of the ambitious advertiser. He found a great barren room in which were seated a beardless boy of eighteen and three young women. There was no furniture in the room except an old desk, a couple of tables and some weather-beaten chairs. In one corner of the room was an alcove which had been transformed into a bin by means of some rough boards that ran half-way to the ceiling. Overflowing this bin were thousands of letters that had been opened. The young man and the girls were at work opening more letters. Mr. Rowell asked for his correspondent, and almost fainted when the boy said:

"That's my name."

When he had recovered his breath the advertising agent introduced himself, adding:

"I don't think that you're quite aware of the size of the contract you expect to undertake."



"Maybe not," snapped the youth. "But if there is anything in plain-spoken English I've tried to make myself reasonably clear. I've told you just what I want, and all I've had up to date in reply has been evasion."

That settled the argument. Mr. Rowell said he would return to his hotel and make out the list and estimates. He worked all that night and early next morning returned with his documents.

"What you want," he told his customer, "will cost $11,000. If you conclude to carry out the contract you will have to pay me $3200 cash in addition to the $1800 already sent, and undertake to send me $500 a week regularly until the contract is completed."

"All right. Just sit down. I'll be back in a few minutes."

In less than five minutes the youth was back and presented the astonished New Yorker with a certified check for $3200. "Now," said he, "go ahead for goodness' sake."

AN ADVERTISING AGENT IS USED TO PERSEVERANCE

The Washing-Powder Scheme

GREAT as had been Mr. Rowell's surprise up to this time, what followed was still more remarkable. The advertisement the young man desired him to place called for agents to sell a washing-compound recipe. This recipe, in the shape of a printed slip, was sent to those who responded for one dollar. There was nothing to prevent the agent to whom the recipe was sent from having any number of copies printed, except an implied contract which the advertiser sent when he accepted the agent's services. Under the terms of this contract the agent was told that he bound himself not to use this recipe on his own account, but to buy such copies of it as he could sell from the Augusta man, who on his part agreed to furnish the slips in lots of one hundred at twenty-five cents apiece. Apparently a more reckless and absurd proposition was never launched. Yet that it paid was made evident when the young man walked into Mr. Rowell's office the following summer and executed another contract, this time for $30,000, on which he paid $10,000 in cash on the spot.

Afterward this man and his washing-compound recipe became known in every publication office in the country. He was the pioneer in the enormous publication business that has for many years flourished in Augusta. The business which he founded has come to be one of the main industries of the place, and out of the rank of the men whom he trained and who followed in his footsteps have come Governors, Senators and Representatives. He went from washing recipes to pictures, and from pictures to almost everything else, extending the scope of his advertising every year. He died while still a very young man, at the Parker House, in Boston, leaving an estate valued at more than a million dollars.

He also left as a legacy an endless series of troubles for the post-office authorities. The papers that he founded and those founded by his imitators, had for their main object the sale of the goods handled by the publishers. They were circulated by the million, but as their paid subscriptions were generally less than half the number sent out, the post-office authorities were kept constantly on the jump to see that the regulations governing this class of matter were enforced.

OUR AMERICAN SNOBS

THE CHILDREN HAVE FOUND OUT WHO WE ARE AND THE LITTLE BOYS WON'T DANCE WITH HER"

By James L. Ford

THE FOLLY OF PRETTY LITTLE MRS. FOXGLOVE, WHO SAVED AND SCRIMPED TO SEND HER DAUGHTER TO A SCHOOL WHERE, OF COURSE, THE DESIRABLE CHILDREN ALL SNUBBED HER

WHEN, moved to virtuous indignation by her recital of little Alice's sufferings, I told Mrs. Foxglove that I wondered why an all-wise God should see fit to send children to a woman capable of defiling their few years of joyous innocence with the foul rites of brazen-calf worship, she burst into a flood of tears and buried her head in the cushions of Mrs. Catnip's principal drawing-room sofa.

Now, it is a great mistake to imagine that women's tears flow readily on slight provocation. It is true that they frequently accompany sudden or unexpected or apparently causeless bursts of emotion, but in every case these are called forth by something deeper and of longer standing than the hasty word or harsh reproof which serves as the ostensible cause of grief. Therefore I regarded this tempestuous manifestation of woe with conscience undisturbed, knowing perfectly well that my words, so far from causing grief, had merely given welcome release to the pent-up flood of feeling that had been accumulating ever since the real cause began.

As a general thing, Mrs. Foxglove's tears are quickly dried, but this time she wept so long and violently that in order to beguile the time I took up a pack of cards and entered upon an absorbing game of solitaire. Just as I had reached an almost hopeless point, at which nothing but the miraculous appearance of the ten of spades would save the game, Mrs. Foxglove lifted her head from the sofa cushion and exclaimed: "You men are all alike, every one of you! You call yourselves our friends and there's not one of you can understand or appreciate the sacrifices we have to make for our children. Oh, you're all just the same. It's not the first time I've had such a thing as that said to me."

"In that case, my dear Mrs. Foxglove," I said soothingly, "permit me to felicitate you on the unusual good fortune which has put you in possession of another friend besides myself who is capable of telling you the cold truth."

At this conciliatory remark she rose and left the room and I heard her running upstairs at the top of her speed, while I went on with my game—a hopeless one now, I feared, for the ten of spades had not even yet appeared—and wondered who her other friend might be. There is a tall, grave-looking man who comes to see Mrs. Foxglove now and then, and is a notable figure in our little household by reason of the lofty courtesy of his manner and his pronounced Southern accent—Mrs. Foxglove seems to have lost nearly all of hers. Possibly he was the honest friend—and just then the tardy ten of spades, the Grouchy of the pack, showed its welcome face and I forgot the tall Southerner in the fascination of solitaire.

That very afternoon I related the story of little Alice Foxglove to a woman of my acquaintance who is looked upon at our table with wholesome awe as a leader of the Four Hundred—and little do Mrs. Taffeta and Mrs. Grinders suspect that the name of the modest and observant philosopher who pens these lines has a place on her list. This woman expressed no surprise at the behavior of the children—among whom is her own snarling, blotchy-faced daughter—but she did say that in her opinion the school was a poor one.

"My Marie is the quickest child at figures you ever saw," she said, beginning her tale of woe. "I'll bet there ain't a child in that whole school that can add and subtract and multiply like Marie, and yet the first week she was there they only gave her seven in mathematics instead of ten that she ought to have had. I didn't say anything about it, but the next week she got six and the next seven again, and so on until it got down to five. Then I got mad and drove down there and said to the principal, 'Now look here, Mr. Man, I'll bet you haven't a child in your school that's as smart at figures as my little Marie, and I want to know what's the reason she only gets five and six and seven instead of ten.'

"He got scared right away the minute he saw I was in earnest, and he went off and looked into some account books and talked to one of the other teachers, and then he came back and said it was all a mistake, that Marie should have had ten every week, and so I made him give me some new reports with ten in mathematics marked on each one. At first I thought that would make it all right, but when I came to read the reports all over again and found how the poor little thing had only got five and six and sometimes even four or three in history and French and the other studies, I said to myself: 'How do I know but what they've been making mistakes in those studies, too?'

"I guess I'll take her out anyway and have a governess teach her at home. There's all sorts of young ones going to that school now they've got a reputation, and Heaven only knows who she's associating with there day after day."

I am certain to be asked for the real name and address of the school which I have designated as the Nickel-Plush, but I shall not give it because I do not wish it to gain the patronage of any more women like the one who is deliberately teaching her child to turn her back on the genuine society of a Southern city and scratch for "desirable" acquaintances among the riffraff pitchforked together by Park Row.

The words of my friend of the Four Hundred made a deep impression on me, and late that afternoon as I sat before my open-grate fire waiting for the supper bell to ring I wondered how many women in the country were sending their children to such schools as the Nickel-Plush in the silly belief that they would there acquire a desirable circle of friends or even an education. Contemplation of this sorrowful subject suggested to my mind an idea that has since taken permanent root there, and which one of these days I may be able to carry out in practical fashion. I wondered whether a college for the education of parents is not more seriously needed in this country than new endowments for the instruction of youth.

That there is great need in this country for such a college—or, better still, for some reformatory institution for the benefit of parents who are confirmed worshipers of the brazen calf—is amply proved by the manner in which these idolaters, who are numbered by the hundreds of thousands if not by the millions, deliberately bring up their children in the worship of this loathsome brassy image.

From their very earliest years the children of the calf worshipers are duly impressed with the importance of that august body, the Four Hundred, whose comings and goings are discussed in their presence at every hour of the day. If there is a fashionable ball or assembly of any kind, it is certain to be the one topic of conversation at the breakfast-table the next morning; if Mrs. de Peyster-Berwick leaves Newport for a short business trip to Oklahoma the matter is thoroughly threshed out at the breakfast-table by the adults of the family, and in case of an extensive or imposing exodus of fashionables I have no doubt that the youngsters are kept home from school in order that they may thoroughly master this important branch of learning. I am sure that the loving, calf-worshiping mother knows of no more beautiful spectacle than that of her innocent child lifting its curly head from the crib and cooing over the list of guests at the Vanasterbilt masquerade ball, to which not one member of the family has been bidden.

In deciding to what school her offspring shall be sent the prudent mother writes for half a dozen school catalogues and studies the list of pupils and parents before looking at the curriculum. That schoolmasters are thoroughly aware of this practice is plainly evidenced by the manner in which most of these catalogues are prepared.

And when the hour of parting comes the modern mother sheds no tears, invokes no blessing, and wastes no time in bidding her children study hard and be good, as was the fashion in an elder day. On the contrary, the infants flutter away from the home nest with their little minds filled with the importance of cultivating the friendship of such of their fellow-pupils as can boast of names that enjoy an honored place in the chronicles of contemporary society, and, so long as they become dutiful little snobs, their delinquencies are likely to be viewed by their parents with amiable tolerance.

There are some who will smile at the absurdity of all this, but I feel more like weeping than laughing at this hideous spectacle of desecrated childhood. It is not funny, according to my sense of humor, to see a boy who ought to be sliding downhill or playing baseball endeavoring to build up what his mother calls "a desirable acquaintance" on the playground, while little girls of nine get names for their dolls out of the Social Register.

The mere thought of all the vileness that must come in later years as an aftermath to this custom of initiating infants into the mysteries of brazen-calf worship brings back to my mind the idea of a parents' college; and yet I doubt if any course of study that could be devised would convince the average calf worshiper that she cannot select fit companions for her child simply by comparing the names on the catalogue with those on the society page. The woman who once abandons herself to a belief in the potency of the sacrificial rites of brazen-calf worship will go down into her grave reaffirming her faith in the school-catalogue scheme of friendships.

Editor's Note—This is the second paper in Mr. Ford's series. The next will appear in an early number.

I know of more than one school of high reputation that has degenerated into a perfect hotbed of snobbery and caddishness through the influence of calf-worshiping parents, and fully ninety-nine school catalogues out of one hundred fairly reek of it. Moreover, I honestly believe that if Miss Birdfood were to advertise, "Snobbery taught in all its branches," "The catechism of the Four Hundred recited every morning," "Special course in how to get into society," and the whole adorned with an effigy of a calf in gleaming brass, she would have even more pupils on her waiting list than she has now.

But what can be expected of children whose parents are not ashamed to fill their little heads with Park Row's sensational garbage about millionairedom? I myself have heard a mother read aloud in the presence of her own children one of those disgusting and idiotic millionaire articles with which our Sunday papers are overloaded. This one was from my own paper, the Planet, and was entitled, "Cradles in which the Children of the Four Hundred Sleep"; it was illustrated with pictures of cradles taken from the convenient pages of a furniture catalogue, and purporting to be those in which the various infantile members of our aristocracy found nightly rest. This silly woman read the article aloud from beginning to end, and directed the attention of her little ones to the different cradles with such idiotic remarks as "My, Katie! Just look at where the little Vanastorbilt baby sleeps. Ain't that grand? Don't you wish your papa would get one like that for little sister Emily?" or, "Jest look at that, children! that cradle cost two thousand dollars, and that's real lace it's got on to it. That's the way they do things in gilt-edged society. I suppose every one of those young ones has a servant to follow her around and pick up everything she drops. My, but that's the way I'd like to live once."

And the mother who will sit gawking over the millionaire stories in the Sunday paper will not hesitate to drag the joys of Christmas Day, that most delightful of domestic feasts, down to the same wretchedly sordid level by continually prating about the cost of things. A very little imbecile talk of this kind will suffice to rob the children's Christmas gifts of their chief charm, and to instil into the mind of one who has been made happy with a new toy the poison of discontent because it did not cost as much as the gold watch that the Sunday paper says—backing up its assertion with a reproduction from a jeweler's catalogue—was found in the toe of the silken stocking—see picture taken from hosiery catalogue—of little Gertie Vanastorbilt.

Is it not a crime to strip from the Christmas token every particle of the love and self-sacrifice which makes it beautiful and leave bare to the gaze of childhood the dross of which it is made? There are even those to whom the tradesman's countersign is a matter of greater moment than anything else, and who will tell you that "John gave me an elegant watch from Squiffany's," and "the flowers that Charley sent were from Quorley's," and "that night we were invited to an elegant dinner to the Nickel-Plush." There must be something innately vulgar and sordid in the mind that forgets the affection that prompted the gift in contemplation of the glamour of a trade-mark.

There are certain phases of child life in the ranks of the Four Hundred which I am happy to say are not discussed in the columns of the press as freely as if they were matters that related merely to the cost of things. Now and then I hear stories of the "fast pace" set by certain favored youngsters of well-advertised society, and whenever I hear of a parcel of boys of thirteen dining in evening dress and befuddling themselves with champagne, or of the supposedly humorous but really pathetic story of the little girls who "collected old silver" instead of seashells, or of some pampered child of fourteen who loses a hundred dollars at bridge, I feel like asking why it is that the brazen calf can make no better return for all our adoration than to beckon Time on and call upon Old Age to quicken his lagging steps.

And with this deliberate perversion of the infant mind going on year after year in all parts of the land, with parents teaching their progeny to prostrate themselves in open idolatry before the brazen calf, with the instructors of youth deliberately pandering to all this vileness and turning their schools into hotbeds of snobbery, it is a blessed relief to know that in our colleges and universities there are other gods besides this one of baser metal. It makes the heart glad to learn that in Harvard, Yale, Princeton and Williams the most sought-after men are not those whom the social philosopher would place in the ranks of the "desirable," and that in the eyes of the average undergraduate it is a much greater and nobler thing to pull stroke, even on a losing crew, or to be pounded into insensibility by the victorious eleven, than to be numbered among the gods of a false and silly worship.

Just before supper Mrs. Foxglove came into the drawing-room where I was warming my hands and said timidly: "I was foolish this afternoon, but I was feeling badly about something that Alice told me. You see, I've been saving up for so long to send her to the Nickel-Plush Dancing School, and this winter she started in and thought she was going to have a splendid time. It's the very best school in the city, you know, and only the very nicest children are taken there. They didn't want to take Alice at first because we're not society people, but when they found I was writing fashions they consented. Well, yesterday she came to me and wanted me to take her out, although she's only been to four classes and I paid in advance for twelve. The children have found out who we are and the little boys won't dance with her. It was never that way in the South. There the child had just as many partners as she wanted and everybody knew we were poor. Why, Alice says that one of the little boys told her he'd ask her to dance if he dared, but his mother was there watching him and he had to dance with the children whose fathers were rich and belonged to the Four Hundred."

"In the name of Heaven——" I began, and then stopped short, realizing that it would be easier to convince a Brahmin priest of the worthlessness of his faith than to destroy this sweet, trusting woman's belief in "desirable" people.

"What were you about to say?" she inquired in the tone of a martyr at the stake who hopes to be asked to recant in order that she may for the last time declare her faith before all men. Before I could frame a reply she went on:

"If you had a child to bring up wouldn't you like to have her associate with refined, well-bred people?"

"I certainly should," I replied, "and that is precisely why I should keep her out of the Nickel-Plush Dancing Academy and the Nickel-Plush School."

"I should think," she said reproachfully, "that as a New Yorker you would be ashamed to speak in such a way of the best society of your own city."

"Best society!" I cried, as the light broke in upon my brain; "I hope that you as an American have not been deluded into the belief that this city of wealth and progress and education and achievement, this lodestar of the Western Hemisphere, can offer nothing better in a social way than Mr. Tommy Timpson and the rest of the notorieties that we manufacture in the Planet office."

"Why, the papers all say that these people lead society——" And just then the supper bell rang and I went down to the table wondering if it would be a possible thing for me to open the eyes of this woman to the absurdity of her beliefs, and rescue poor, sensitive, gentle little Alice, whose pitiful story made me cry whenever I thought of it, from the clutches of the "desirable" young imps who were making her childhood a miserable instead of a happy one.

The American Adventures of a Fortune-Hunting Earl

AT CHICAGO Barney came down the platform to meet Frothingham. "Here you are!" he exclaimed. "Six months in the country but not a bit changed. And if an American goes over to your side and stays a week he has to learn the language all over again when he gets back."

It was still daylight and Barney told his coachman to drive home by way of "the store"—the great "Barney and Company Emporium—seventy stores and a bank, three restaurants, a nursery and an emergency hospital, all under one roof." Frothingham watched the throngs pouring torrentlike through the cañons made by the towering buildings. "Don't it remind you of New York?" asked Barney.

"Yes—and no," he replied. It seemed to him in the comparison that New York was a titanic triumph, Chicago a titanic struggle; New York a finished or at least definite creation, Chicago a chaos in convulsion. There was in the look and the noise of it an indefinable menace which oppressed him, filled him with vague uneasiness. When Barney told him the site of it was a swamp a few years before, he thought of a fairy story his nurse had told him—of a magic city that used to rise from an enchanted morass at dusk, live a single night and vanish with the dawn. And as the daylight waned, he wondered whether this inchoate, volcanic unreality of a city would not soon be again engulfed in the bosom of the swamp. But he began to note here and there traces of form, civilized form, peering from the chaos to indicate the trend of the convulsion—that it was upward, not downward.

"It is—tremendous," said Frothingham. "Is it bigger than New York?"

"No," Barney reluctantly answered. Then he added with curious, defiant energy: "But it will be! And it's American, which New York ain't. It's full of people that think for themselves and do as they d——n please. We ain't got many apes out here. We run more to humans."

They were now driving past Barney and Company's—a barracklike structure, towering story on story from a huge base bounded by four streets, where surged a seemingly insane confusion of men, women, children, horses, vans, automobiles, articulate in the demoniac voices of boys shrieking extras and drivers bawling oaths. And the sky blackened suddenly and from the direction of the lake came a storm, cruelly cold, bitter as hate, seizing the struggling, swearing, shouting mass of men and animals, lashing them with whips of icy rain and pelting them with bullets of hail.

"That's my little place," said Barney.

"It's—tremendous," was all Frothingham could say. The "Emporium" and its surroundings dazed him. He muttered under his breath, "And it's hell."

Barney told the story of creation as it read for him. He had been a drummer for a suspender house—eighteen hundred a year for touring the cities and towns of northern Indiana and Illinois; four thousand dollars put by after twelve years of toil; eyes ever alert for a chance to go into business on his own account. One of his towns was Terre Haute—he called it Terry Hut. In it was a dry-goods shop kept by a man named Meakim. Barney found that, of all the retailers he visited, Meakim was by far the shrewdest, the most energetic, and, above all, that he had an amazing talent for "dressing" his show windows and show cases. He persuaded Meakim to sell out and adventure Chicago with him. They set up in a small way and in an obscure corner. But both toiled; Barney was shrewd and almost sleepless, and Meakim "dressed" the windows and displayed the goods on and over the counters. They prospered, spread too rapidly for their capital, failed, gathered themselves together, prospered again. "I've built three stores in fourteen years," said Barney. "This last one was finished only five years ago—the year Meakim died. And already it's too small—we're moving our wholesale department to another building."

"I ALWAYS FEEL LIKE A STRANDED FISH IN THESE TOGS"

Presently they were in Michigan Avenue and at Barney's house. It was a mass of Indiana limestone which he—with the assistance of a builder, audaciously "branched out" as an architect—had fashioned into a fantastic combination of German mediæval fortress and Italian renaissance villa. "Here's where I live," said Barney as the carriage stopped before the huge doors studded with enormous bronze nails. "And don't you dare back up Nelly when she jeers about it. She says she can't look at it without laughing or come into it without blushing. I suppose it is no good, in the way of art. But it keeps out the rain, and that's the main point in a house, ain't it?"

As he was getting out his keys the door was opened by a maid in a black dress, a white apron and cap. "Jessie," said he, in a tone which suggested that she might be his daughter, "this is the Earl of Frothingham, and I want you to take good care of him and of the young man who's coming with his trunks."

Frothingham took off his hat and bowed vaguely to the maid, who smiled cordially. "I'll show you your room," she said.

"Never mind, Jessie," interrupted Barney. "You needn't bother. I'll take him up myself. But I know everything's all right—Nelly looked after that."

Frothingham was impressed by the astonishing difference between the exterior and the interior of the house. He felt at home at once in this interior—handsome, cheerful, the absurd splendors of the architect-builder's devising softened into comfort and good taste. "We thought you'd like your young man near you," explained Barney, "so we put a bed in the dressing-room."

"Thank you," replied Frothingham. "This is charming."

"Nelly knows her business." Barney's good-natured face with its many dignifying scars from his wars with destiny beamed paternal enthusiasm. "You needn't dress for dinner unless you want to," he went on. "I never do unless we have company or I go out somewhere to something swell and formal. Wickham sometimes does and sometimes don't."

"I think I'll dress, if you don't mind," said Frothingham diplomatically.

"Suit yourself. This is Liberty Hall. We ain't got any rules." He looked at his watch. "That clock on the mantel there is four minutes fast. It's seven minutes to seven by the right time. We're having dinner at half-past seven, but you can come down just as soon as you feel like it."

Frothingham descended at five minutes before the dinner hour and found Nelly alone in the front parlor. Superficially she was like the women he had met in the Eastern cities. Like them she was dressed in a gown obviously imported from Paris; like them she wore it as only American and French women wear their clothes. He saw instantly that she was a well-bred girl of a most attractive American type. She was tall and long of limb—her arms were almost too long. She had a great deal of dark brown hair shading fascinatingly into black here and there. She had dark eyes—not brown, as he at first glance thought, but dark gray—a humor-loving mouth, a serious brow, a clear, delicate, olive skin. As she and Frothingham were shaking hands, her father and her brother entered—the brother, Wickham, a huge fellow, topping his father by several inches and having his father's keen, good-natured dark gray eyes and his father's features, except that the outline was more refined without being less strong.

Barney put his arm round his daughter and, with a foolish-fond expression, said: "Didn't I tell you, Frothingham? Wasn't I right?"

If Frothingham had been new to "the States" he would have thought this the strongest kind of a bid for him to enter the family. But he understood the American character in its obvious phases now. "The old chap's mad about her," was all Barney's speech suggested to him. "And," he admitted to himself, "I think he has reason to be. She's got the look I like." He noted the humorous comment on her father's flattery in Nelly's dark eyes, as he examined her through his eyeglass with ostentatiously critical minuteness. "Quite up to the mark, I should say," he replied with polite audacity, adding, "though I don't pretend to be an expert."

"You see, I did put on my dress suit, after all," said Barney, looking down at his old-fashioned, ill-fitting evening clothes. "The children would have it. I always feel like a stranded fish in these togs. You see, I never wore 'em in my life till I was past forty."

Wickham looked a little nervously at Frothingham; Nelly was smiling with frank amusement. Then Wickham looked ashamed of himself—but he carefully observed the peculiar stripes down the legs of Frothingham's trousers and the curious cut of his waistcoat and coat—"I must find out who's his tailor," he thought. "Poole don't send me over the real thing. I wish I dared wear a monocle. It's a whole outfit of brains and manners by itself. I don't believe he takes it out, even at night."

A maid announced dinner—not "Dinner is served," but "Dinner, Mr. Barney." And Barney jumped up with, "I'm glad to hear it. I'm hungry as a wolf." The dining-room was done in old English fashion—and the dinner, too, though an American would have called it the American fashion. The feature of its four courses was a huge roast, set before Barney on a great platter, with a mighty carving-knife like a simitar and a fork like a two-pronged spit. Barney himself carved—an energetic performance, lacking in grace perhaps, but swift and sure. On the table between him and the platter was a pile of plates. He put a slice of the roast into the top plate and the waitress removed it, carried it to Nelly's place and set it down. This was repeated until all were served.

Frothingham watched Barney's movements attentively, surprised that any of the American upper classes condescended to eat in such simplicity. He was almost startled when a bottle of wine was brought, for he had not forgotten Barney's denunciation of drink and drinkers. He had seen so many concessions of real or reputed principle for his benefit since he had been moving about in American "high life" that he was somewhat cynical as to principle in America. But he had not expected to find this degree, or even kind, of weakness in Barney. "He told me he wouldn't permit the stuff to come into his house," he thought, laughing to himself. Then he noticed that none of the family drank it. One taste was enough for him—"No wonder he's opposed to wine," he said to himself. Then aloud: "If you don't mind, I'll just take whisky—a little Scotch."

Barney showed amused embarrassment; Nelly and Wickham laughed. "We don't have anything to drink," she explained. "Father doesn't approve. But he told us you'd been brought up differently—that you must have wine. So we've got wine, but there isn't any whisky."

Frothingham looked vague—he was relieved to find that his friend Barney was not quite so weak as he had feared. "It doesn't in the least matter," he replied. "I shall get on famously with this."

"I'll take you down to the club after a while," said Wickham, "and you can have all you want. And to-morrow—eh, father?"

"Yes—yes—of course," answered Barney. "I never do try to put on style that I don't get left."

He winked at one of the maids significantly and when she drew near and bent her head, whispered to her. She left the dining-room; in about five minutes she reappeared with a decanter of Scotch, a tall glass, a bowl of ice and a bottle of mineral water on her tray.

"Why, father!" exclaimed Nelly, "where did that come from?"

Barney beamed, triumphant. "We've got neighbors, haven't we?"

"But what will they think of you?" she asked, pretending to be shocked.

"I don't know—and I don't care," he answered. "I never did spend much time in worrying about what my neighbors thought of me. Probably that's why we're here, and not in the poorhouse."

After dinner Frothingham stayed with Nelly in the parlor instead of going to the club with Wickham. He had found many girls in America who thought they were natural or who affected naturalness as a pose; but here was the first girl, it so happened, who was really natural, without thinking anything about it. She had all the charm of the girls of his own country for him—he liked ingenuousness; and in addition she had the charm of knowledge. She knew the world, but she looked at it with ingenuous eyes—and he would not have believed this a possible combination. "How do these Americans manage it?" he said to himself. "Her father comes from well down in the lower classes, yet he has all the assurance of an aristocrat. And as for the girl, she reminds me of Evelyn—and Gwen."

"Do you know," he said to her, "you don't suggest an American girl at all—that is, you do and you don't. You women over here are cleverer than ours, but a good many of 'em lack a certain something—a—I don't know just what to call it. It seems to me that—well, they are ladies, of course. But many of 'em—not all—but a great many of those I've chanced to meet—make me feel as if they were not exactly sure of themselves, as if they were trying to live up to something they'd read about or seen somewhere. I don't know that I make myself clear."

"Perfectly," replied Nelly. "You mean that they act as if they weren't satisfied with being the kind of lady they were born, and are trying to be some other kind—and don't succeed at it especially well."

"Exactly," said Frothingham. "I feel like saying to them, 'Oh, come now, chuck it, won't you, and let's see what you're really like!' But you—you remind me of our women, except that you're not ghastly dull as most of 'em are. Gad, they sit about in the country until they're feeble-minded. After a certain age, about all there is left of 'em is the match-making instinct. You'd understand if you'd been over there."

"I have been there," answered Nelly. "I spent more than a year in Europe—nearly half of it in your country. I liked it, but—well, one likes one's own country best, of course."

"I thought you American women preferred the other side."

"Oh, a few of us do—those who aren't happy unless they have somebody bowing and scraping to them, or are bowing and scraping to somebody. You know, the poor we have always with us—the poor in spirit as well as the other kind of poor."

Before they had talked an hour Frothingham felt that the outlook for his campaign in the Barney house was not promising. Nelly was frank and friendly, and he saw that she liked him. But there was something in her atmosphere which made him know that she cared little for the things which were everything to him and which must be everything to the woman he might hope to win. He feared that she was not for him. "She ain't in my class—or, perhaps I'd better say, I ain't in hers."

When Wickham came, at half-past ten, she left them. After suppressing yawns for fifteen minutes he said: "I'm off to bed. I was at a dance last night and owe myself five hours' sleep. You see, father and I get up at half-past six. We have to be at the store at eight."

At the store! At eight! "And he hasn't in the least the look of that sort of chap," thought Frothingham. As for rising at half-past six, one might do it to hunt or shoot. But to do it morning after morning "merely to set a lot of bounders to selling a lot of cloth"—preposterous!

XVII

AFTER a few days of Chicago Frothingham felt utterly out of place. There were no idlers, no idling places. To idle meant to sit in lonely boredom.

Barney and his son were busy all day—they grudged the half-hour of that precious time of theirs which they spent at luncheon. Nelly, too, had her work—some sort of a school she was running, away off somewhere in the poorer part of the town. He was sensitive enough soon to discover, in spite of her courtesy, that he was interrupting her routine seriously and was in the way to becoming a burden. He saw as much of her as he dared—she had for him a charm that became the more difficult to resist as his hope of winning her decreased. He relieved her of himself during her busy hours so tactfully that she did not suspect him of penetrating what she honestly tried to conceal.

He betook himself to the club. It was usually deserted; if a man did enter, he raced through and away as if pursued by demons; at luncheon all ate as if struggling for a prize offered to him who should chew the least, swallow the fastest and finish the soonest. He called on the women he met—they were out or just going out, or just coming in to busy themselves at home.

In New York, Boston, Washington he had thought the leisure class a lame imitation of the European class of industrious, experienced idlers, had found it small and peculiarly unsatisfactory because its men were inferior to its women in numbers and especially in brains. But here—there wasn't a pretense of a leisure class except the loungers in the parks. "This is a howling wilderness," he said to himself. "I should be better off in a desert. These lunatics make my head swim."

Wherever he went, all seemed possessed of and pursued by fever-demons. If it was a dinner, the diners were eager to dispatch it. The courses were served swiftly, the waiters snatching one's plate if he for a second ceased the machine-like lifting of food; the conversation was nervous and in the shrill tones of acute mental excitement. Words were cut short and slapped together almost incoherently. Sentences were left unfinished, the speaker leaping on to another sentence or submerged by the breaking of the flimsy speech-dam of the person he was addressing. Often all were talking at the same time. "Surely you can listen as you talk," said a woman to whom he complained. "Think how much time it saves!"

If it was a dance, the orchestra detonated the notes like cartridges from a Maxim gun; the dancers whirled or raced furiously. "Why this hurry?" he gasped to a handsome, powerful girl who had dragged him round a ballroom twice, had flung him into a chair and was dashing away with another man to finish the waltz.

"I've got to catch the train for the millennium," she screamed back over her shoulder and disappeared in the maelstrom.

Even at the play the audience shuffled uneasily while the players sped through their lines or the orchestra rattled off the between-the-acts music; and afterward all rushed from the theatre as if it were afire. The blank expression habitual to Frothingham's face was no longer a disguise; it was a reflection of his internal state.

"I must get out of this," he said to himself at the end of two weeks. "The disease may be catching. Now I understand that fellow who went from here to tear London up by the roots and put in his tuppenny tubes. A Chicagoan should be barred from a country like any other plague." And he wrote his sister that he was "beginning to twitch with the Chicago disease."

Evelyn had written him regularly—a letter by each Wednesday's steamer. She had put a brave face upon their affairs, had tried to make him picture life at Beauvais House as smooth, almost happy. But he had more than suspected that a far different story ran between the lines; and when she wrote that she had engaged herself to Charley Sidney he understood.

Seven months before he would have grumbled and cursed, and would have accepted the sacrifice. Now, it roused in him a fierce protest, a feeling of abhorrence of which he would not have been capable before he visited America—and the Barneys. "She sha'n't sell herself to that creeping cad," he said, and on impulse he cabled: "Sidney impossible and unnecessary. You must break it. Answer."

The answer came later: "Shall do as you wish."

Instead of being relieved he repented his impulse, wondered where it had come from, fell into a profound depression. Seven months of stalking; nothing to show for it but three ridiculous, sickening misses. And here he was with an empty bag; and what little heart he once had for the game was gone; in its place a disgust for it and for himself. "How Nelly Barney would scorn me if she knew what a creature I am!" he said. He was now thinking a great deal on the subject of Nelly Barney's standards for men and also on the subject of Nelly Barney as a standard for women. In neither direction did he find any encouragement. He knew her through being in the same house with her day after day, through seeing her at all hours and in all moods—and she never made the slightest attempt to conceal her real self. He felt that such a woman could not be attracted by his title, would not be likely to be attracted by himself; he felt that she was at the same time more worth the winning than any other woman he knew in America—"Yes, or in England," he confessed to himself at last.

"What a pity, what a beastly, frightful shame," he thought. "She's got everything that I must have, and everything that I want, too."

But he had only twelve hundred dollars left, including the thousand from Wallingford. "I must have gone clean mad," he exclaimed whenever he wasn't with her and was alone with his affairs. Finally he was able to goad himself into dashing feverishly about in Chicago society. He sought the set she avoided—it was to him an additional charm in her that she did avoid it, for he had at bottom the extra-prim ideas of women which have never lost their hold upon Englishmen. There was, however, no alternative to seeking this set. He thought it the only one in which he was likely to succeed—those among the fashionable young women of the rich families who carried the "free and easy" pose in speech and manner to the point where it looked far worse to a foreigner than it really was, who laughed and talked noisily in public, who wore very loud and very clinging dresses, very big hats and very light shoes.

The newspapers gave him columns of free advertising and, with the Barneys vouching for him and "Wick" Barney pushing him, he immediately became a figure. Some of the young women of the "lively" set pursued him with an ardor which he would have mistaken when he first landed for evidence of serious attachment or intentions. But he had learned something of the ways of American flirts, married and single, and he had had experience of that American curiosity as to foreigners of rank which he had at first regarded as the frankest kind of title-worship.

Presently he found a girl he thought he could not be mistaken in fancying he could get—Jane or Jenny (Jeanne, she wrote it) Hooper, the daughter of that famous Amzi Hooper whose "Hooper's High-class Hams" and "Hooper's Excelsior Dressed Beef and Beef Extract" are trumpeted from newspaper, bill-board and blank wall throughout the land.

Her older sister had married a Papal duke under the impression that he was a noble of ancient and proud family. To her horror, to her family's humiliation and to her friends' hilarity it came out that the Duke of Valdonomia was the son of a Swiss hog-packer of as humble origin as Amzi Hooper and of less than one-fifth his wealth. The family longed to possess a genuine nobleman, and Jane—a devourer of the English novels which are written by the middle classes for the middle classes about the upper classes—seemed to be in sympathy with her father's and mother's ambition and keenly eager to become a "real lady." It was assumed by her set that Frothingham had come for her—the newspapers hinted as much several times each week.

But Frothingham, grown extraordinarily sensitive, shied at the amazing high heels on which she tottered like a cripple, at the skinlike fit of her clothes, at the suspicious brilliance of her cheeks and blackness of her brows and lashes. Whenever she spoke to him suddenly in her shrill dialect he felt as if a file had been drawn across his pneumogastric nerve. And she constantly used a slang expression which seemed to him—in her—the essence of vulgarity. She could not speak ten sentences without saying that she or somebody or everybody had nearly or quite "thrown a fit."

It struck him as a biting irony of Fate that the woman whom of all he knew well in America he least approved should be the one who was frankly throwing herself at his head in his hour of desperation. When he learned that her father was an Englishman born and bred in the "lower middle class," he felt that he had solved the problem of the family's eagerness to get him. "That's why the old beggar almost cringes as he talks to me," he said to himself. "Confound their impudence!" And the next time he met Hooper he treated him not as an American and an equal, but as an Englishman and an inferior. And Amzi at once fell into his "place," just as a car horse, though elevated to be a coach horse, will halt at one ring of a bell. "It's in the blood," thought Frothingham. "It can't be hid or got out." But—he didn't venture the experiment with the daughter.

The climax came one morning when he met her by chance in the Lake Park Drive. She was perched high on a red and black dog-cart in which she was driving a bay and a gray tandem. Her hat was the biggest he had seen her wear, and she was swathed in a silver gray dust-coat with a red embroidered collar. She stopped and invited him to join her.

"I needed you to complete my turnout," she said, when they were under way. Her dazzling smile took part of the edge off her unconscious insolence—or was it conscious? He found her a puzzle, with her flashes of good taste and flashes of good sense, with her wit that seemed accidental and her folly that seemed her real self.

He set his teeth and tried to think only of how much "I need her to complete my turnout," and of how pretty she was—for there was no denying her beauty, or her style for that matter, in spite of its efflorescence. He saw that every one was looking at them, but he did not appreciate that his own striking costume and his eyeglass were as magnetic as were her hat, her bright skin and her dust-coat with its gaudy collar. She was supremely happy. The most conspicuous girl in Chicago, driving with the most conspicuous man, in the most conspicuous trap and on the most conspicuous highway—what more could a young woman ask?

HERE WAS THE FIRST GIRL WHO WAS REALLY NATURAL

"Wonder why every one stares so?" she said with deliberate intent to provide an opening for compliment. She wished to hear him say the flattering things she was thinking about herself.

"I fancy they're staring at what I can't take my eyes off of," he replied. "You do look swift this morning."

"Swift! I don't like that." She was frowning. "You Englishmen come over here and think you can say what you please."

"I can't see where's the harm in telling a girl she's pretty and well got up, and looks a stunner."

"That isn't what 'swift' means in Chicago."

"Really! You don't say! That's what it means in London."

"But you're not in London."

"No." His tone strongly suggested a wish that he were.

"Wouldn't it be jolly if this were Hyde Park!" she exclaimed.

He did not show enthusiasm at this—but then his face was made to suppress, not to express, emotion.

"I simply adore London," she went on.

"It ain't bad—for a while, now and then."

"There's so much atmosphere about London—I don't mean the fog and soot. Here, they're all crazy about making money and working and all those kind of things. Whereas, over there, everybody's for having a good time and—and all those kind of things. Sometimes I think I'll throw a fit if I don't get away from here."

He looked gloom, then brightened—yes, she was tremendously pretty, and her mouth was like a red ripe cherry; yes, she might be toned down into a fairly decent countess. "They're quick to adapt themselves, these American girls. The minute she sees Evelyn she'll begin to learn."

"I don't see how you stand it," she continued. "When are you going away? Not that I sha'n't be sorry—you've been awfully nice to me, and I like to see a really well-dressed man once in a while."

"Ah, I don't mind it here." He paused for full a minute, then said: "And I'd like it, you know, if I could take you with me when I go." He followed this speech with a slow turning of the head until his eyeglass was full upon her. "By Jove, her color's genuine," he said to himself.

She had been happy a few minutes before; now she was all thrills and palings and flushings of ecstasy. She glanced at her conquest with sparkling eyes and laughing lips. She made him forget what "bad form" he had been thinking her. "Is that a joke?" she asked, as if she were assuming that it was.

"We don't go in for joking about that sort of thing where I come from," he drawled.

"But you oughtn't to have said it here." She was radiant, but her hands were trembling—it seemed most romantic to her, quite like a chapter out of a novel. Genuine aristocracy, that not only recognized itself but also was recognized by everybody, seemed to her as dreamlike as fairyland.

"If you'll drive home I'll ask you again there," he continued.

And he did, and she accepted him; and he was half-way to Barney's before he came from the spell of her fresh young beauty and her frank admiration of him, and began to think of Nelly and to see Jeanne from Nelly's standpoint again. At that moment Jeanne was busily telephoning her engagement to her intimates, her head full of castles and coronets and crests and peeresses' robes. It seemed to her that she could not wait to begin her triumph—the congratulations of friends, the receptions, dinners, dances in honor of her and her fiancé, the flare of newspaper brasses, the big wedding, and the crescendo of her gorgeous entry into English society as Countess of Frothingham. Cinderella was no more enraptured when the prince lifted her from the ashes than was Jenny Hooper with her ill-fed and extravagant imagination, her ill-directed and energetic ambition, her ill-informed and earnest misconception of life and of "being somebody."

"And he's coming to see you to-morrow, Pa," she said to Amzi Hooper, after delighting his ears with the great news. "He says your consent is necessary before it's announced."

"I guess he and I won't quarrel over it, Jenny," replied her father. "If he suits you, I can stand him."

Frothingham came the next afternoon and made his formal request. Mr. Hooper shook hands with him cordially. "I guess my girl knows what she's about," said he. "I'm pleased to have you as a son."

"Thanks," replied Frothingham—he could not altogether banish from his manner the instinctive haughtiness of English upper class for English lower class. "When could you receive my representative? Or shall I send him to some one who represents you?"

Mr. Hooper looked embarrassed and rubbed his jawbone vigorously with his thumb and forefinger. "Yes—yes—certainly—any time you say. I'll talk to him myself. Can he come to-morrow? I don't think it'll take him long to satisfy me you're all right."

Frothingham stared, thinking "Blast his impudence!" He said only, "To-morrow, at eleven, then."

The Autobiography of a Beggar

BY I. K. FRIEDMAN

Author of By Bread Alone, Etc.

The Honoluler Queen

I KIN tell yer I was mighty happy de day I struck orff de main road, an' found a gent in swimmin' an' his clothes in a lonely pile on shore. I takes 'em out ef pity an' leaves meh own rags an' a note sayin':

"Dese clothes has seen better days.
So will yourn.
"Yourn fer clothes, MOLLBUZZER."

I looks so respectuble, de clothes fittin' ez ef dey was jist waitin' dere fer meh, dat I goes ter de first farmhouse I seen an' tells how I missed meh train an' lost meh purse, an' axes fer ter be trusted fer a meal an' a bed.

"All right," says de farmer; "yer looks strong."

"I am strong," answers I, "most de time, only now an' den on hot days I'm subjicted ter heart disease."

"Nothin' like work fer heart trouble," says he, pattin' his bulldorg on de back, "an' it's cool ter-day. Yer kin saw wood fer yer supper an' yer lodgin'."

I looks at de pile ef wood an' turns pale, an' I says, "Mr. Farmer, dat pile looks like six suppers an' a breakfust an' lodgin' ter match, so s'posen yer gives meh three dollars down an'——"

"Yer a cool one," says he.

"Well," I says, "yer needn't ef yer don't like. But I'll bet yer ten dollars agin yer cow an' de dorg an' a supper an' lodgin' dat I kin saw all ef de wood en thirty-four minutes by de clock."

"Impossible!" says he.

I takes orff meh coat an' vest an' throws 'em on de ground an' shouts, "Ef I ain't done in thirty-four minutes by de clock yer kin keep meh coat an' vest."

"How kin yer do it?" he axes. "Moses an' Aaron! it ain't possible!"

"I kin do it," I says, "by a continuerous flow ef 'lectric fluid dat pours from meh right skyeratiker nerve inter de steel ef de saw an' forms a congloumerous circuit wid de hypnertized wood."

"I never heard ef dat afore," says he; "it must be new."

"It is," I says. "I'm de inwentor." An' I rubs meh right arm, pickin' up de saw an' droppin' it lightnin' quick.

"Ouch!" I screams, "I got a 'lectric shock."

He looks at meh an' thinks an' scratches his head.

"Come," says I, "I'll bet de ten dollars agin de dorg an' de cow an' supper an' lodgin' fer ter-night an' breakfust in de mornin'."

"You put up de ten first," says he.

"I jist told yer, Mr. Farmer," says I, "dat I lost meh purse."

"Den how kin yer pay meh ef yer loses?" he axes.

"I'll work it out," says I.

"But what fer does yer want de cow an' de dorg?" he axes, pullin' his long white whiskers an' lookin' serspicous, like farmers allus is.

"I kin ride home on de cow," I says, "an' keep de dorg busy a-keepin' de cow on de jump. Er maybe I kin sell 'em both back ter you."

"Yer a cool one," says he. "Go on an' saw."

Den I grabs de saw an' I sawed wid all meh might an' main fer five minutes, an' I kin tell yer dat I makes de fur fly. When de farmer seen what I done in dose five minutes he quits his grinnin' an' looks skeered. I was glad on it, fer I couldn't a-kep' it up three minutes longer. Den de blade cracks agin a nail, an' I stops an' yells:

"Did yer see dat?"

"I did," says he; "what was it?"

"It was de 'lectric fluid," I says, "dat pours from meh right skyeratiker nerve inter de steel ef de saw an' forms a congloumerous circuit wid de hypnertized wood. It's beginnin' agin; I feels it comin' on full force. Maybe yer'd better stand back a piece."

"Hold on," he says; "maybe us had better call de bet orff; 'cause come ter think on it I don't need no help 'round here, an' yer ain't got de ten dollars, an' de cow might kill yer, an' de dorg wouldn't go away from here, anyways!"

"Yer ought ter have told meh," I says, "afore I went to de pain an' de trouble ef workin' up de 'lectric fluid."

"Well," says he, "yer kin have yer supper an' breakfust an' lodgin' free."

"I am goin' ter law," I says, "fer de cow an' de dorg, 'cause I'd have won de bet. An' I'm goin' ter print a piece in de papers dat——"

"Moses an' Aaron!" shouts he, "keep it out ef de papers. I'll give yer four dollars an' den yer kin ride home on de cars, 'stead ef on de cow, which is quicker an' safer."

"Good," says I, a-shakin' hands; "we'll call her square."

"Don't tell meh wife," he says, givin' meh de four.

"I won't," I says, takin' it an' goin' inter de house fer supper. An' I eats enough fer a week, not takin' no chances on breakfust.

"Does yer eat by de 'lectric fluid?" he whispers.

"Yes," says I, a-pilin' in; "it takes some time fer it ter git disconnected."

An' he don't say no more, only a-lookin' an' pullin' his long white beard. After supper he took meh inter de room where I was ter sleep, an' I was glad ter see dat it was on de ground floor an' handy in case ef trouble. I looks 'round, an' dere bein' nothin' ter take but de bed I starts ter git ready fer meh snooze. Den I hears some one a-knockin' on de door, an' I sticks meh head outer de winder an' I hears some one say ter de farmer:

"I was in swimmin' ter-day an' a hobo comes along an' grabs meh clothes from de beach an'——"

Dat was all I wants ter hear, knowin' de end ef de same old story; so afore gittin' ready ter make meh leap fer life an' liburty I writes in big letters on a brown piece ef paper what I finds in de room an' pins to de door dese lines ef po'try:

"Mr. Farmer:
Just tell de cove yer saw meh, but
De cove he didn't seen me saw.
"Yourn, MOLLBUZZER."

A DARK LADY CROSSES MEH PATH

HAVIN' good clothes, de next thing I done was ter foller de circus fer a time, 'cause de circus is a mighty good thing fer hobos an' children. In de fust place, it kind ef makes peepul good-natchered, an' in de second place, it takes de familees away from home, which gives us a chancet ter take away from home what dey leaves dere, an' in de third place dere's usually somethin' doin' 'bout de circus itself.

After joinin' de circus, de first foolish thing I done was ter pay a dime ter see de Honoluler Queen, which I was allus anxious ter see; but I allus got ketched slippin' under de tent ef de side-show an' licked most terribul. De pictshures showed de dusky queen dancin' on top ef waves ef real water, singin' an' actin' an' swallowin' swords, all ef which I was dyin' ter peep at, 'specially de sword swallowin'.

It hurt me must terribul when I got inside de tent ter find dat beautiful queen not accordin' ter de pictshures, but only a fat old nigger woman; an' when it come ter swallowin' a sword she only slipped a tin knife up her sleeve, which it don't need no queen ter do. It made meh mad ter be cheated out ef meh dime, an' I yelled out, "She ain't no queen, an' she didn't swaller no sword!" 'count ef yellin' which dey kicked meh outside ef de tent an' stamped on meh.

Sich is de world; ef a beggar gits caught playin' a trick he gits wallerped most awful, but ef he ketches another feller playin' tricks de other feller wallerps him. It made meh mad agin de Honoluler Queen anyways, an' it made meh still madder agin de boss ef de side-show. What kind ef a game is dat ter promise de publick ter see a nigger swaller a tin knife fer a dime, an' den ter have 'em slip de knives up deir sleves?

De loss ef meh good dime rankled in meh bosom so I couldn't sleep, an' de next day I went 'round an' axed de man fer it back agin; at which he only laffed, which made meh madder still. Wouldn't it you, dear reader? An' so when I seed de Honoluler Queen a-shakin' her spear outside de tent fer ter coax de poor harmless farmers inside ef it, I called her a name, an' she thrung dat spear at meh head an' it hit meh a awful whack, which I didn't think she could do, an' which made meh ter berlieve she was a real queen an' not a black nigger ater all.

It was dat same night dat I met four hobos near de circus tents, all of which I knowed in de city, an' I was ez glad ter see 'em ez ef dey all had milk an' honey in deir pockets. Dey was Crutch McAllister, an' Foxy Baskit (de one an' only, like de circus says), an' Squint-eye, an' One-armed Jake. Dey hardly knowed meh 'count ef de new clothes what I wore an' 'count ef de swelled head which de Honoluler Queen give meh wid her spear.

Dey took meh across de bridge, jist over de river from where de circus was playin', an' we went a piece in de woods where dey had a tent. I guess dey stole it from de gypsies, which was fair enuff, de gypsies havin' stole it from somebody else, maybe from de Injuns. Almost everything had ter be stoled oncet, I guess, fer ter start things goin'.

It was Foxy's idee ter open a little circus ef our own, 'count ef us havin' de tent, an' he said we could push it along near de road what de farmers had ter take ter cross de bridge ter go over ter de circus in Williamstown. It was meh ez said ter call our show De Five Jolly Beggars, er Real Life Among de Hobos, but Foxy says dat would be no good fer a circus, 'count ef de farmers all knowin' what beggars an' hobos was, an' peepul only go'n' ter a circus ter see what didn't grow ter home—like elerphunts er tigers, fer instunce.

"Now," says Foxy, "ef yer could only ketch a lion er a elerphunt."

"Bulldorgs is all de wild animuls what ever I wants ter know," says Squint-eye.

An' den Foxy says, "Ef yer can't ketch a wild animul we might ketch a wild man in de woods, an' a wild man is jist ez good fer a circus ez a wild animal."

"Dere ain't no more wild men, Foxy," I says. "I read it in de histree books."

"Dat shows all de histree books knows," says Foxy, "fer wild animuls allus draws 'em 'round, an' de circus bein' near dese woods, I'll bet dere's wild men hidin' 'round."

An' sure enuff, while Foxy was a-sayin' dis what should come along but a nigger tramp, a great big feller, lookin' pretty wild an' dodgin' 'round like ez ef he was a Zuler. Foxy was mighty skeered an' he says, "What did I tell yer, Mollbuzzer?" An' de others was fer gittin' up an' runnin', but I toled 'em quick it was only a nigger tramp what I knowed, havin' runned agin him in de countree.

So I called de nigger tramp an' I axed him ef he wouldn't stop an' have a bite ter eat an' a drop ter drink, which he said he would. Sure dat didn't look much like bein' wild, an' I calls Foxy out ef de tent an' I says ter him:

"Foxy, dat would be de scheme, ter dress up dis nigger tramp an' coax him inter playin' de Honoluler

"DE 'LECTRIC FLUID DAT POURS FROM MEH RIGHT SKYERATIKER NERVE"

King. De Honoluler Queen is drawin' immense in de side-show ef de circus, an' dere ain't nothin' she does de Honoluler King can't do in a hour."

"It sounds mighty good, Mollbuzzer," says Foxy, an' we goes back in de tent an' tells de others what our scheme was an' dey all was fer it in a minute. So we showed de coon our tent inside an' axed him ef he would like ter join our gang an' work along wid us, an' de coon said ez he would fust-rate, only he couldn't stay 'round dis part ef de countree fer long; an' when we axed him why dat was he wouldn't give us no reasons. I guessed he had runned out ef jail er stoled somethin' near where we was, which I told Foxy.

"Dat's nothin' agin bein' a Honoluler King, Mollbuzzer," says Foxy; "a king what won't steal an' kill ain't born fer his job."

De next mornin' we got up early an' tied de big coon up wid ropes so he couldn't git loose, an' Crutch McAllister went ter town fer ter buy a pail ef red an' blue paint, an' also ter steal shells from some farmer's fountain fer a necklace, an' a rooster fer its feathers, ter stick in a ring 'round de nigger's head, 'count ef de Honoluler Queen havin' one.

We took orff dat poor coon's clothes first an' we begun ter brush him wid de red paint like ez ef he was a wall ef a house. He was most awful mad when he waked up an' seen what we was a-doin' ter him. An' I toled him dere was no use ter git mad, 'cause we was a-goin' ter make him a Honoluler King fer his own good.

"I don't want ter be no king," he says; "all I wants is fer yer ter untie meh ropes an' let meh git 'way from here."

Dat coon was too pertickler fer a nigger altergither, anyways, an' when he seen meh cut orff his pants at de knees he swore he'd kill meh sure when de ropes was orff him, but we fixed him up a skirt out of pink tissher paper an' I explained it was de fashun fer Honoluler Kings ter wear deir pants short, but it didn't make de coon feel none better until I toled him we cut 'em orff in sich a way dat he could sew 'em on agin easy.

What troubled us most was how ter make him a long pigtail like de one which I seen on de head ef de Honoluler Queen, but Foxy said ater a while dat he knowed it was de style fer kings ter go baldheaded when queens wore deir hair long. "'Sides," says Foxy, "ef we shaved de coon's head ez bald ez a billiard ball de feathers'll look more kingy."

An' we took de razor out ef de coon's pocket an' Foxy shaved his head, only not havin' eny soap an' Foxy not bein' a barber by trade dat nigger set up sich a yell dat we was erbliged ter let one-half ef his head go, which was still more odd an' kingy. Next we made de coon a spear out ef a stick an' a shield out ef a barrul-top, an' we toled him ef he yelled an' danced all de time an' played de king like he orter we'd give him three per cent. ef all dat was left over from de profits an' de expinses, 'sides a yaller shirt an' a plug hat, an' I don't know what else. We left Crutch an' Squint-eye an' One-armed Jake inside de tent ter stick a pin in de coon if he should git sleepy an' fergit ter dance lively, an' meh an' Foxy wint outside an' hung up de sign, which read:

COUGH UP A DIME AN' SEE DE HONOLULER KING
BLACK WATKINS.
DE STRONGEST MAN IN DE WURLD!
DE LOUDEST SINGER!
DE WILDEST DANCER!
EATS SPEARS FER HIS DINNER.
DE ONLY HONOLULER KING AWAY FROM HIS HOME IN DE WHOLE WURLD.

Price one dime. Chil'ren one cent. De King will give each lady a handsome presint free—seuvenirs which he brung wid him from his own Honoluler Land.

"What fer a presint kin King Watkins give de ladies, Foxy?" I axed him.

"A kiss," says Foxy; "a handsome Honoluler kiss from his own kingy lips;" an' Foxy begins ter yell 'round an' hit de sign wid his stick, an' Squint-eye an' Crutch stirred de coon up inside an' de show comminced. It skeered meh cold ter see de way de dimes begins ter tumble in. An' we was mad 'cause we didn't build a bigger tent, an' Squint-eye comin' runnin' out an' yellin' dat it might be a good idee ter pull de tent down an' charge de peepul a dime fer steppin' inside ef a rope, fer which Foxy called him a fool.

An' de coon seemed ter like bein' a king ater he got used ter it, fer de peepul was all lookin' at him an' wonderin' at him, which is agreerbul ter coons somehow, de same ez ter white men. An' he made lots ef fun by wantin' ter kiss de ladies in earnest fer a presint ter hisself, dey not wantin' it at all, an' him wantin' it mighty bad, which is human natcher, too.

But late in de aternoon King Watkins got tired ef singin' an' dancin', him sayin' his legs an' lungs was givin' out an' wantin' ter take a nap; but we had ter keep de show up while de dimes was rollin' in, so Crutch stuck pins inter his kingy legs, an' de blame coon got mad, which he had no right ter do, an' he hit Crutch on de head wid de barrul-top, an' Crutch grabbed him an' got hisself all covered over wid red an' blue paint, an' de king's feathers comes orff an' de crowd laffs an' howls, an' anudder nigger what jist give a dime ter see de Honoluler King yells out:

"Ha! Ha! Ha! Dat ain't no Honoluler King. He ain't no more a king en meh. Dat's Abraham Linkin Smith—jist a plain, eviry-day, no-account nigger what lived over here in Rock Haven an' runned away from his wife an' chil'ren last year."

An' when de Honoluler King heard dat he gave a most awful yell, an' he turned white under his blue an' red paint an' his black skin, an' he thrung his spear an' his shield on de floor an' tore orff his paper skirt an' made a leap for de door, but I grapped him wid Squint-eye an' we thrung him down, an' Crutch McAllister hit de other nigger what made all de trouble an' chased him out ef de tent.

"I'm a-goin' ter tell his wife at Rock Haven ater I see de circus," says de nigger. "She'll Honoluler King Abraham Linkin Smith, she will. I'll git even wid youse fellers fer hittin' meh an' cheatin' meh out ef a dime."

An' when de Honoluler King heard dat nigger carry on 'bout tellin' his wife he jist laid down an' cried an' begged us ter let him go, sayin' his wife was a most terribul woman, an' dat she would kill every one ef us sure ez could be. No sooner said en I looked up an' seen a big crowd runnin' double quick acrost de bridge.

"What's up, Foxy?" I axed, pointin' at de crowd.

"I don't know," says he; "maybe de tiger got out ef his cage. It would be a fine chancet ter swipe it an' put it in de tent wid our coon."

"Don't talk like a fool," I says, worried; "a tiger ain't no moskeeter what yer kin lead 'round wid a string! An' look at dat crowd! I never seen sich a crowd in de countree afore! An' see what dey're follerin'. It's de Honoluler Queen, her a-shakin' her spear an' dancin' de war dance. What'll we do?"

DE SAME EZ EF DEY HAD NIVER BEEN KING ER QUEEN AT ALL

I TAKES 'EM OUT EF PITY

"What'll we do?" says Foxy. "Let 'em chase de Honoluler Queen till she gits tired er dey gits tired. What's it ter us?"

"She's headed dis way," I says, "an' de circus man is tryin' ter throw a rope 'round her head."

An' dat great big Honoluler Queen comes on toward our tent a-swingin' her spear, de circus man still tryin' ter ketch her 'round de neck wid a rope, an' de crowd behint her laughin' an' howlin' an' screamin', an' more peepul leavin' de circus concert an' chasin' de mob all de time.

"Foxy," I whispers, gittin' skeered, "I knows what's up now. De Honoluler Queen is jealous ef de Honoluler King, him not bein' genuine, an' she comin' ter kill us."

"She certainly does look mad," says Foxy. "Mollbuzzer, yer kin watch de tent a bit an'——"

"No, Foxy," I says, "we dies er we thrives tergither."

"All right," says Foxy, "but we orter let dat poor nigger know so's he kin run away afore he gits kilt fer bein' a king."

"No," I says, "we kin keep de Honoluler Queen outside, an' bizness'll be better a'count ef de crowd."

An' afore we knows what is up, er who, er when, dat Honoluler Queen runs up wid her club fer our tent.

"Even de Honoluler Queen herself," yells Foxy out loud an' quick ez kin be, "is payin' ten cents er one dime ter see de real an' only lively Watkins, King ef Honoluler!"

But she didn't pay no dime, I'm a-tellin' yer; she jist reached out an' grabbed Foxy by de ear an' throwed him on de ground, an' runned inside de tent ez ef she was de owner ef de Honoluler King an' all de rest.

An' den meh an' Foxy hears dat Honoluler King a-yellin' louder en ef Crutch an' Squint-eye was a-makin' him inter a paper fer pins, an' we hears de Honoluler Queen a-screamin: "Yer lazy, good-fer-nothin' Abraham Linkin Smith, I got yer at last. I'm goin' ter show yer how ter lazy orff away from yer wife ter play king an' let meh play Honoluler Queen ter feed yer kids," an' I hears him a-beggin' her ter let him go, an' I raises meh voice an' yells:

"Ladies an' Gents, fer de oncet an' only time de Honoluler King an' Queen tergither under one tent! Price of admission twinty cents, er a dime fer each! Up an' be quick fer it'll only last fer a little while! De Honoluler King an' de Honoluler Queen in deir most touchin' act, De Happy Honoluler Fireside at Night!"

An' de crowd, bein' curious ter see what was up, comes along so quick wid deir twinty-cent pieces dat we didn't even have time ter make change, an' some ef 'em got in fer a dollar an' some ef 'em got in fer nothin'.

Den Squint-eye an' Crutch McAllister an' One-armed Jake comes runnin' out ef de tent fer help, Crutch yellin':

"De Honoluler Queen is got de Honoluler King on de floor an' she'll club him ter death ez sure ez kin be. We can't do nothin'. Come quick."

"An' leave all dis good money here?" I says. "Not meh. Let her club. Only I hope she ain't in no hurry."

An' when de crowd heard what was up dey pushes an' shoves so dat dey knocks de tent down, an' den der was de awfullest mix-up ever I seen, us tryin' ter fling out de peepul what hadn't paid ter see de King an' Queen, an' de peepul refusin' ter git out, an' de Honoluler Queen a-poundin' de Honoluler King wid her spear, an' de circus man a-tryin' ter jerk de Honoluler Queen back ter her tent by de arm, an' de Honoluler King gittin' mad at him, an' he hitted de circus man acrost de head, which made de Honoluler Queen proud ef her warrior husband, an' she says, "Dat's right, Abraham Linkin Smith, stand by yer wife an' she'll stand by yer." An' both ef 'em goes fer de circus man right an' left, ef which I was glad 'cause he was de feller what beated meh out ef de dime ter see de Honoluler Queen.

Poor Richard Junior's Philosophy

¶ Lovers differ; husbands are all alike.

¶ Extravagance is your neighbor's method of spending money.

¶ Overlooking an opportunity is different from looking it over.

¶ The lazy man always extends a welcome to the spring-fever microbe.

¶ Many appreciate the greatness of the past; few, the greatness of the present.

¶ An optimist is a man who keeps a drug store and does not become a pessimist.

¶ Sometimes the son of a rich man is small enough to get through the eye of the needle.

¶ Many a man who is the architect of his own fortune finds that the structure has an imposing entrance but no way to get upstairs.

An Outburst of Mistaken Modesty

OUR new Ambassador to Germany, a Mr. Charlemagne Tower, is paying a quaint but a most impressive tribute to his predecessor.

He succeeds the learned and able Dr. Andrew D. White, who, all the world knows, was made Ambassador to Germany because he had earned an international reputation as an educator and as a diplomat. Naturally the German people eagerly seized the opportunity to show their admiration for Doctor White and their satisfaction in the honor done them by his appointment. He was made much of and proved himself worthy of his fame; and, with his simple manners and harmonizingly simple dress, he became a marked, and everywhere recognized, figure. Germans saw this man of elevated mien and simple attire among the throng of gaudily uniformed and therefore necessarily monotonous and commonplace representatives of the other powers and dominions, and they looked a second time and turned away only to look again. The disadvantage of uniform is that, though it dignifies those who would otherwise be obscure, it levels to mere clothes-horses those who would otherwise stand out for their superior personalities. The advantage of civilian dress is that, though it mercilessly bares the mediocre to the public gaze and the public disregard, it assists the man of individuality to assert himself to every eye.

When Mr. Tower reached Berlin he found himself in much the same situation in which Thomas Jefferson professed to find himself when he succeeded Dr. Benjamin Franklin at the Court of France. Some one said to Jefferson, "You take Doctor Franklin's place?" Jefferson replied, "No one could do that. I merely succeed him." Mr. Tower apparently felt that he must do something to continue the high reputation of the American Ambassadorship and to make the German people less sensible of the wide gap, as he modestly regarded it, between himself and Doctor White. Apparently he despaired of accomplishing this. So, after several months, he has hit upon a way of hiding himself in public and so sparing his office and himself what he probably regarded as the humiliation involved in being pointed out in his plain civilian attire as "Doctor White's successor." He has ventured to depart from the ancient custom of the American diplomatic corps and has put himself in a uniform described as "similar to the diplomatic uniforms of other countries" and "consisting of navy-blue cloth trousers with gold stripes about two inches wide down the sides, and a swallow-tail coat buttoning to the chin, with a straight military collar embroidered with gold heads of wheat; the cuffs and coattails gold-embroidered and the buttons of gold; a straight diplomatic sword, a hat cocked with white feathers lying close to the crown."

Thus, if by chance any one inquires, "Where is Doctor White's successor?" he is discovered only after long search among the similarly-dressed crowd.

From time to time there have been outbursts of this kind of modesty in our diplomatic service; but recently the disease has become epidemic. Several of our Ministers, notably certain "sons of somebodies," appointed because their parents had influence, have gone to such lengths in their self-abasement, in their modest sense of their unworthiness fitly to represent the great American people, that they have hidden themselves in militia, or band, or fraternal order uniforms, in any begilded and beplumed what-not that will reduce them to the level of the monarchic throng. And the worst of it is that their motives have been wholly misunderstood. Instead of applauding this self-deprecatory retiracy Europeans jeer at the decay of America's vaunted simplicity and freedom from peacockery, and Americans cry out that the silly tailor-vanity of their diplomats is destroying abroad our credit for democracy and manhood stripped of pretense.

The mistake is not unnatural. Extremes meet—and modesty and vanity are extremes. Perhaps everybody might be satisfied by the State Department's ordering these over-modest diplomats into the peace uniform of this republic of peace-loving and peace-advocating civilians. Then no one could say that they were trying to make themselves conspicuous or that they thought themselves able to look distinguished without the aid of barbaric plumage.

Let none of them fear that he will be slighted anywhere if he dresses as the representative of the American people. There was a time when a man in the plain toga of a Roman citizen was received by distant emperors and kings "with all the respect that would have been shown a messenger from the immortal gods." And there is now a time when a representative of another republic dressed in the plain, unpretentious garb of its citizenship has equal respect shown him. Nor will that respect be enhanced by decorations of gold lace, no, not even were he to get himself up in all the glory of the drum-major of the Jinestown band or of the carriage-opener of a fashionable New York shop.

Nationality above Grammar

AT LAST the irresistible sentiment of American nationality has won its final victory over the obstructive dogmas of grammar. The Congressional Committee on the Revision of the Laws has decided that hereafter our national statutes must say "the United States is" instead of "the United States are," as they have been doing hitherto.

It has been a long pull. The point did not occur to the founders of the Constitution. They spoke of the United States in the plural as a matter of course. "Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort." This form of speech remained universal until within very recent memory. "The United States of America," said Bancroft, "are not only a republic, they are a 'society of societies,' 'a federal republic.'"

It was the Civil War that brought the rules of grammar to the dust. But, at first, even the victors in the struggle for national union did not realize that they had subjugated the agreement of nouns and verbs along with slavery and secession. They put into the Thirteenth Amendment of the Constitution the decree: "Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction."

But it became evident soon after the war that the principle of national union was going to take possession of the language. The purpose of words is to express thoughts. The grammarians follow humbly in the wake of the philosophers. They build their rules on the observed facts of language; the facts are not made to fit the rules. The fathers of the Republic had thought of the Union as a group of States. They spoke of it in the plural, not merely to obey the technical rules of verbal agreement, but because they had a plural conception of the thing itself. But now people think of the nation as a unit. They say "the Nation is," "the Republic is," "the Union is," and naturally they say "the United States is." United States, in fact, has ceased to be a plural noun. It is a singular noun with a plural ending, like "politics" and "ethics."

Grammarians in future will have to make a note of this and amend their rule accordingly. They can either recognize United States as a singular noun, or they can note an exception to the general rule that a plural noun takes a plural verb. That ought to be easy, for a nation with four hundred and seventy-three universities and colleges is certainly more than a match for a little thing like grammar. In one respect, however, the process of evolution is still incomplete. If United States has become a national proper name like Germany or England, it ought to have a convenient derivative like German or Englishman to describe its citizens. Shall we say "United Stateser," "United Statesian," or "United Statesman"?

The Triumph of Commercialism

THE day when society rested on brute force, when nations were only powerful according to the number of mailed men they could put in the field, has gone never to return. And with the disappearance of that day disappeared the feudal lord. His place has been taken by the lord of commerce, who is not born to his title but wins it by the force of intellect, his courage, and his capacity. Nations to-day are only great that are great commercially. The factory, the mine, the shop are the things that count; they exercise a much more dominating influence on the world than ever did men in mail or archers with their cloth-yard shafts—and those were the forces that propped up tottering thrones or tore down proud crowns.

The age of a Machiavelli, of a Richelieu, of a Wolsey has been engulfed in history. A Napoleon no longer fits in with the scheme of things. What the world needs, what the world rewards most lavishly, is constructive, not destructive, ability; the master mind that eliminates friction, not he who increases the resistance.

These men are found to-day in commerce and in finance. It is there that their genius finds full play. They make millions for themselves, but they can only make them when they add to the comfort of all mankind, when they raise the general scale of civilization. We were told in our younger days that the man who made two blades of grass grow where before there was only one was a benefactor; to-day these men are not content with two poor little blades; nothing less than an entire field will suit them, a field rich with its ears of golden corn; a field that feeds the white man in the temperate zone as well as the yellow man in the tropics; a field that puts wealth in the pockets of hundreds.

A Rope of Sand?

ONE of our contemporaries during last year was busy in publishing a symposium of opinions on divorce in this country, its uses and abuses, the virtues in it, the crimes in it.

Sociologists, reformers, some twenty well-known bishops and doctors of divinity, authors and society men and women came to the front to anathematize or uphold it, to describe it as a cancer upon the body politic, or a safe issue for the poisonous humors of our domestic life. They all agreed in but one point—the frightful extent to which American society was affected by our lax marriage ties.

The bond which since the birth of the race has held the man and woman together in the most vital and lasting of partnerships was described by them as being now as rotten in this country as a rope of sand. If we are to believe these witnesses our homes are filled with husbands and wives who hate each other and children who are neglected and disowned.

These vague statements about us are naturally accepted in foreign countries without question. Americans abroad are accustomed to the complacency with which our English kinsfolk characterize our domestic life as rotten to the core.

Now, how much truth is there in all this outcry?

It is true that in certain professions, and in certain half-educated, would-be fashionable classes, marriages are contracted with no basis of endurance. The habits and circumstances of the lives of these men and women give to their minds a desire for change as strong as the longing of the body may be for whisky. They divorce and remarry as they would fit on a new suit of clothes.

We are too apt to take the newspaper accounts of these people as a picture of American life. To the great mass of our country people marriage is as sacred a relation as it was in the days of Abraham and Sarah. The fire which burns on the hearth of the poor carpenter in yon back alley is the same and as sacred as that which warmed the home of the Great Queen and lighted the whole world with its pure shining.

Who ever heard, too, of a divorce among our Southern brethren?

Let us take heart o' grace. In the great, decent, honest, unpublished masses marriage is still binding and holy.

The real danger is that in the mad struggle for fortune and place our young people may forget to marry at all.

THE WASTE OF THE WORLD

By René Bache

WHAT AN INGENIOUS AND PERSEVERANT CIVILIZATION DOES WITH THE ODDS AND ENDS YOU THROW AWAY AND NEVER THINK OF AGAIN

LITTLE things count for more in the year 1903 A. D. than ever before in the history of the world. Nothing is so unimportant as not to have some value in the market of to-day, and much of what was formerly thrown away as worthless is now converted into precious commercial products. The refuse of yesterday is the wealth of to-day.

Mankind no longer depends wholly upon flowers for the perfumes which are required for toilet purposes and in the manufacture of confectionery and fancy soaps. Many of the most delicious scents are procured from more humble and much less attractive sources, such as fusel oil (a waste product of distilleries), from which are obtained oil of apples, oil of grapes and oil of pears. Putrid cheese is not the kind of substance from which one would expect to get an agreeable odor, and yet it is the principal substance employed in making the commercial oil of pineapple. In the same way oil of bitter almonds, which is utilized so widely by perfumers and candy makers, is derived from gas tar, a by-product of the gas factory.

Pearl buttons and other articles of mother-of-pearl are cut from various kinds of marine and fresh-water shells, the finest quality of raw material being furnished by the so-called pearl oyster, and until recently the residue of the nacreous valves was thrown away. To-day, however, all remnants of the shells are carefully preserved, and the pearly part of them is ground to a glittering powder, which, under the trade name of "pearl silver," is used in making artificial flowers and as a coating for wall-paper. The residue of the shell is separately ground, affording a powder of silky, metallic lustre, which, being colorable in any tint or shade, can be employed in many ways.

Not long ago the late P. D. Armour, of the great packing firm, gave an interesting account of the disposal of refuse under the modern system of wholesale butchering. A 1200-pound steer, live weight, he said, yields from 650 to 700 pounds of dressed beef; the remainder, nearly all of it, used to be thrown away; and to get rid of it cost money. The blood was allowed to run into the river, and the head, feet and "innards" were hauled out to a vacant place and buried in trenches.

There came a time when enterprising persons were found willing to accept such material and remove it for their own purposes, and the packing companies were glad to get rid of it so cheaply. Later, however, they discovered that they could sell it, and to-day much of the profit derivable from a steer comes from the parts which were rejected as waste a few years ago.

What They Do to the Frisky Steer

THE horns are cut off close to the head and the pith is removed, to be sent to the glue-pot, while the horns themselves are dried, sorted into various grades, and eventually converted into combs and buttons. Most of the so-called tortoise shell on the market is a really beautiful and very accurate imitation made from cattle-horns, which are reduced to flat sheets with the help of steam and afterward colored. The tips of the horns are converted into mouthpieces for pipes, and the scraps left over are sold to the florist as a superior kind of fertilizer.

The bones are utilized in a variety of ways, the knuckles from the feet and shanks being transformed into knife handles, toothbrushes and buttons. The hard bone takes a high polish and is hardly distinguishable from ivory; the scraps are used by manufacturers of bicycles for case-hardening steel, as well as for poultry food. As for the hoofs, they go to make buttons, glue and gelatine.

From the blood, albumen is extracted for calico-printing and for finishing leathers. Such portions of the hide as are not utilized for leather, furnish isinglass, and such of the fat as will not saponify is converted into glycerine and nitro-glycerine. From the fat also is obtained oil for oleomargarine and butterine; the feet yield neat's-foot oil, and the tails afford material for curled-hair mattresses. The rest of the hair is transformed into felt, cheaper grades of which are used for insulating refrigerator cars and ice-boxes, as well as for under-carpeting, while the better qualities are employed for horse-blankets, saddlery and hats.

Glycerine, which is now so important a by-product of the packing-house, and for which so many valuable uses have been found, was formerly a waste substance evolved incidentally to the manufacture of candles from palm oil. It was thrown away in quantities. But to-day the problem of utilizing every portion of the slaughtered animal has been solved so completely that absolutely nothing is lost. Even the gray brain-stuff of the calf furnishes a substance valuable in the treatment of neurasthenia and other nervous diseases, and the stomach of the pig yields pepsin for the benefit of persons with weak digestions. All parts of the beast that are not utilized for food or manufacture find their way back to the farm as fertilizer.

The profitable utilization of the waste of cities has been one of the most difficult puzzles in these modern days. Though it has not yet reached its final solution, much has already been accomplished in this direction. In New York, which in this respect is ahead of any other centre of population in the United States, all of the kitchen refuse collected from house to house is thrown into great iron receptacles and "digested" by steam, after which the cooked material is separated into greases and fertilizer stuff. The greases are shipped to Germany, where the art of treating them is better understood than in this country, and are refined and converted into lard-oil, glycerine, and other valuable commercial substances. The fertilizer stuff is dried and ground, after which it is put up in bags for market, much of it being sent to the Southern States, where it seems to find a special adaptation to the requirements of cotton-planters.

The Enterprising Experiment of Munich

IN RESPECT to the profitable employment of town waste, other than food refuse, the city of Munich, in Bavaria, is a model. All such material, amounting to five hundred tons per diem, is first passed through huge sieves, which rid it of the fine dust. The coarse residue is then poured upon an endless belt, from which it is sorted by women, the process producing a tolerable amount of valuable material. Unbroken bottles are washed by machinery and returned to the brewers and wine merchants. Broken glass is likewise washed and goes to the glass-works. The rags are beaten in a rag-beater, disinfected and sorted for sale. Old iron is saved for conversion into vitriol. Finally, the fine dust previously separated is mixed with dried blood, saltpetre and phosphoric acid, and packed in sacks for fertilizer. Old shoes are ground and mixed with the fertilizer. What remains is burned.

In this country the disposal of such refuse has not been reduced to such scientific principles, and it is the general practice of our communities to rely upon the facilities of the ash dump for getting rid of all waste of the kind. One might say that there was nothing in this world more completely emblematic of worthlessness than an ash dump, which produces nothing and is composed wholly of what people have thrown away; nevertheless, in its own way it is a mine of wealth, affording a livelihood to many persons and supplying much that is of subsequent use.

Anybody who will take the trouble to watch an ash dump day after day will learn some interesting facts. All day long women go to and from the refuse heap with baskets on their heads filled with broken bricks and crockery, which they carry to contractors who are building in the neighborhood and are glad to buy the stuff at the rate of one dollar for as much of it as suffices to fill a tip-cart. It does not take so very many basketfuls to fill a cart, and the women make better wages by this sort of labor than they could easily earn at anything else. Many of them devote to basket-carrying only such leisure as they have incidentally to other occupation. The bricks, which are mostly refuse from new buildings, carted to the dump to get rid of it, are broken up fine by the contractors and made into a mixture for concrete.

The women get many things besides broken bricks that have value. For old medicine bottles they receive twelve to fifteen cents a dozen at the apothecary's. Old shoes are treasures, too. If they are not good enough to wear as they are, they are either sold to the junk man or taken to a cobbler. The business of reorganizing old and apparently worn-out shoes is a very considerable one, though so little is known of it. It is indeed a far-gone shoe that is not worth something. In the worst case there is almost sure to be some part of the leather that is perfectly good; it may be only the heel-piece or a portion of the upper, but the shoe has a value, though it be only two or three cents. Cobbling on footwear of this class is somewhat different from ordinary work of the kind, partaking more of the nature of what surgeons call heroic treatment. For example, the renovator of such articles thinks nothing of slicing off the rear half of a shoe that is gone in front and attaching it to the front half of a shoe that is gone behind; or the remade shoe that he produces may be composed of a dozen unrelated parts. There is a regular market for renovated shoes in New York City, and tens of thousands of pairs are sent in the crude state from other centres of population to the metropolis every year.

Picking is always good on the ash dump, because the carts are continually making fresh deposits. If this supply were shut off the pile would cease within twenty-four hours to be productive. Each day whatever is of value is taken away, and thus only the surface affords anything of worth to the searcher for stray findings. Only on the surface does the small boy browse for good coals, filling a tin kettle or paper bag with the "cinders," as he calls them, and taking them home for the kitchen fire. The extent to which such refuse from the ranges and furnaces of the well-to-do is utilized by the poor people would excite astonishment were accurate data on the subject obtainable.

The Fate of Tomato Cans and Old Shoes

OLD rags and paper are gathered up by the women on the ash dump and sold to the junk man. All sorts of rags there are, from silk to calico, and all kinds of paper, from cream-laid note to waste stuff that has been taken from under carpets and thrown away. The junk men buy it all; there is nothing they will not pay something for. And in the spring contractors come and dig in the great heap for ashes, of which they cart away vast quantities for use, in a mixture with asphalt and water, in cementing cellar and basement floors.

The tin cans consigned to the ash dumps in such great numbers are collected and rolled out into sheets for roofing shanties. This, however, is only one of many ways in which they are utilized. Great quantities of cans are converted into sheet tin for covering parts of trunks, the inside of them usually retaining the original polish. Not a few factories devote their entire attention to the conversion of old tin cans, which are heated until the solder that holds them together runs into a separate receptacle, to be afterward sold for twelve cents a pound—the profit from this source alone almost paying for the gathering and handling of the raw material. The tops and bottoms are melted for sash-weights. Nothing is lost except the labels, which are removed by soaking, as a preliminary to rolling the cylinders flat, and thus it is that a two-horse load of old cans has a market value of six to eight dollars.

When an old shoe has got beyond the point where it can possibly be of any use as footgear, whether whole or in part, it is still valuable as scrap leather. All leather scraps, such as come in large quantities from the shoe factories, are chopped fine and converted into artificial leather. Sometimes, for this purpose, they are mixed with paper pulp and molded for the counters and insoles of boots and shoes, the material thus utilized being treated with a mixture of oil, rubber and glycerine. The glycerine softens it, and the oil and rubber render it waterproof. Then it is cut into the required shapes. Much material of this kind, in the shape of what is known as "leather board," is employed in the manufacture of traveling bags.

There is always a market for waste paper, and even old newspapers, which represent the lowest and least desirable grade, are worth fifteen cents a hundred pounds. The uses to which such material is put are almost innumerable, extending even to the manufacture of car-wheels and coffins. In the making of trunks and valises, as a substitute for leather, there is commonly used a sort of paper board.

composed of layers of paper which has previously been subjected to a chemical treatment that renders it extremely hard and tough. All of the paper money issued by the United States Government is eventually, after being redeemed, ground up and reduced to a pulp, which, being of the finest linen stock, is eagerly purchased by paper-makers.

Sawdust, which was formerly a waste product, is put to a multitude of uses in these modern days. Mixed with tar and compressed into bricks it is employed for gas-making, a ton of the bricks yielding from 30,000 to 40,000 cubic feet of gas. Bricks of clay and sawdust mixed are considered very superior for building purposes, being only half the weight of ordinary bricks, and taking plaster direct without the intervention of laths. Sawdust is also employed instead of sand for mortar, and it is utilized quite commonly for filling the walls and floors of apartment houses to deaden sound. In cold-storage houses and market ice-boxes sawdust serves as a non-conductor, and hardwood sawdust is said to be excellent for smoking hams. Wood alcohol is also derived from sawdust by distillation.

Mixed with a glue solution and bichromate of potash, sawdust is now converted into an artificial wood which is very durable and takes a high polish. It is shaped in molds, and many handsome articles are made out of it. The bichromate is to render it waterproof. In France great success has been obtained in the manufacture of wood pastes, as they are called, from sawdust, with an admixture of dyewoods for color. Not to be forgotten are the bottle stoppers which, made from sawdust, serve quite satisfactorily in place of corks for certain purposes, holding the corkscrew well.

A Market for Skunk Tails

INCIDENTAL to the manufacture of corks there is much waste in the shape of small scraps which formerly were thrown away. Nowadays, however, such cork dust is used for stuffing mattresses, for upholstery, and for ships' fenders. It is also employed as a coating for the inside of paper tubes in which bottles are shipped, to prevent breakage.

Furriers' refuse finds a great variety of uses, every waste piece being salable for one purpose or another. Scraps of bearskin, skunk tails, and fragments of badger skin are bought by the brush-makers, the badger hair being utilized for the highest grade of shaving brushes. Cuttings of beaver and muskrat are sought by the hat-makers, while those of hare and rabbit are wanted by hat-makers and fur-makers. Odd bits of ermine go to make imitation "tips," and goose and swan feathers from refuse pieces are employed for stuffing muffs.

In the meerschaum factory all of the scraps are used for making imitation meerschaum, being ground fine and boiled with alum, to make the stuff stick together, and linseed oil to give it the requisite shine. The material is reduced to a soapy consistency by heat, and then shaped in molds, after which it is turned in the lathe; and finally the pipes are dried in a stove, boiled in melted suet, rubbed with a peculiar kind of grass, and dipped in boiling wax to give polish and hardness.

The utilization of refuse scraps of amber was long a puzzle, attempts to weld them together by heat being vain because the product was brown and brittle. However, a fairly satisfactory result has been accomplished by treating the stuff chemically, afterward subjecting it to high pressure.

Bookbinders' waste goes to make papier-maché, for bas-reliefs, dishes, picture frames, clock cases, and so forth, fine sifted wood ashes and flour paste entering into the composition. Old rubber as a refuse product is a thing of the past. It is mixed with new rubber, or else steamed to soften it and applied to a coarse woven fabric for waterproof cloth. Broken glass is converted into artificial stone for building purposes, being ground to powder and reduced to a paste in a furnace, after which it is pressed and sold under the name of "ceramic stone."

In former days there was no refuse product deemed more hopelessly without value than furnace slag, which now is turned to most useful account in the manufacture of paving-stones and in the production of bricks of superior quality. A cement equal to Portland cement is obtained from it, as well as a product called "slag wool," which is snow white and looks like cotton wool. This slag wool is utilized for covering boilers and steam pipes, being a non-conductor and incombustible.

Incidentally to the manufacture of gas large quantities of ammonia and coal tar are obtained as by-products. The former is valuable for a variety of purposes, while the latter is the source of aniline dyes and an endless number of medicinal substances, being a convenient organic base for chemists to work upon.

Wood shavings, which used to be thrown away, are now pressed solid, in which shape they furnish an economical fuel for making steam, burning slowly and developing high heat. Coal dust is likewise utilized as fuel, being made up into "briquettes" with sawdust, molasses and various things. Even smoke is saved in these times, being convertible into acetate of lime, alcohol and tar.

Breakfast Foods for the Neglected Horse

THE waste material from the factories which put up the new-fangled cereal breakfast foods consists mainly of the branny parts of the grains, and is being utilized for horses—a use to which is likewise put the refuse from cornstarch mills. This latter, which is known as "gluten feed," is the nitrogenous part of the maize and highly nutritious. Corn oil, a by-product of distilleries and starch works, is employed in the manufacture of paints and for many other purposes. Treated with sulphuric acid, it affords a product similar to rubber. Meanwhile the pith of the cornstalk is used as a filling for coffer-dams in the newest warships being placed just behind the outer skin of the vessel at the water-line. It is the most absorbent of all substances, readily taking up twenty times its own weight of water, and thus, when a projectile enters the side of the ship near the water-line the corn-pith can be counted on to expand and fill the hole.

The intensity of our civilization finds no more striking expression than is afforded by the high development of modern methods for utilizing products formerly regarded as worthless. Every year the world is becoming more densely populated, and the problem of supplying the multiplying wants of mankind is becoming increasingly difficult. Each discovery of a new means of converting the valueless into the valuable is a gain to the human race, for the future as well as for the present, and he should surely be regarded as the greatest of benefactors who is most successful in diminishing the waste of the world.

Driven Without the Camp

By Forrest Crissey

"JIMMIE TOTMAN WILL TAKE THE RIGHT AISLE"

"WILL it have a steeple, Pa, an' a bell?" inquired Ezra.

"Yes, I s'pose so," dryly answered his father.

"I wisht we could help," timidly responded the boy from his seat on the doorstep; "but," he added reflectively, "I s'pose we can't because we're poor."

"Now, look here," good-humoredly responded the man; "I didn't refuse to subscribe to rebuildin' the church because we're poorer than the rest of 'em. It's just as I told th' old Deacon: I hain't got the money an' I don't know where it's comin' from; an' it ain't honest to pledge what you can't expect to get."

Ezra's eyes were following the figure of the gaunt old Deacon bobbing down the hill path with a jerky, petulant tread.

"Acts kind of stirred up, don't he?" commented the father. "That's th' Deacon all over! He told me t' trust th' Lord an' He would provide. Guess it didn't occur t' him that if it's just a matter of trustin' th' members of th' church ought t' be able t' do that without callin' on outsiders. But th' long an' short of it is that I can't put down on th' church paper th' money that ought t' go to payin' my honest debts. An' I won't, neither!"

"Ain't all th' folks that's got children in th' Sunday-school goin' to give something?" persisted Ezra.

"Likely."

There was an interval of silence.

"Well," continued the father, "if you're so anxious t' have a hand in fixin' over th' church, you c'n subscribe sixty days' work with a double team. I'll let you drive Mack an' Tige t' haul the buildin' material from th' stun quarry and th' sawmill."

With a bound the boy leaped from the door-sill and sped down the path after the retreating figure of the Deacon. When he returned his eyes glowed with pride and excitement.

"He seemed kind of glad t' get th' haulin' subscribed," shyly commented the boy, resuming his seat. His eyes were fixed dreamily on the dumpy little church in the village, at the foot of the hill; but in its place he saw a splendid white steeple, a steep roof, tall windows and green blinds; and in his ears were ringing peals from a clanging bell, like those he had heard at Westfield the Sunday that he and Chet drove the new teacher home.

Two days later, seated on a scrap of soiled and fuzzy sheepskin, his bare feet dangling from the forward bolster of the long boxless wagon, Ezra called out:

"G' up there, Tige!" and drove proudly out of the churchyard with the air of a man conscious of the importance of his mission and of his ability to perform it.

A band of morning mist still hung over Bear Creek and threaded the valley like a gray ribbon; cows filed in solemn procession out of stable doors after their early milking; and farm dogs charged savagely at the clattering wagon and retreated at the swish of his whip as he passed: the reins danced merrily upon the backs of Mack and Tige, and a cloud of dust trailed in the wake of the happiest, proudest driver who ever cracked a whip.

At the Town Line Corners he passed Joe Shinn, the cattle buyer, who eyed him sharply, smiling at the odd figure of so small a boy behind so large a team. He looked curiously lonely perched on the jolting bolster of the long-reached wagon.

"Head up, like a steer in the corn!" muttered the cattle buyer, as he lashed the ragweed at the side of the wheel rut.

But Ezra was too happy to notice the smile of the passer, or even to whistle. He saw, instead, the line which Deacon Keth had written on the subscription paper: "60 days' work—man and Double Team"—saw the slender white steeple and heard the clanging of the deep-voiced bell! As he slapped the reins upon the flanks of Mack and Tige and clucked them into a sharper trot, the Golden Text of last Sunday's lesson came suddenly into his mind.

"Them sixty days' work is all in, Pa," said Ezra, halting the team at the back door on his return from the last trip to the shingle mill. "Skinny Munger asked me to let him drive far 's th' schoolhouse this mornin'. But he ain't safe with the horses! I wouldn't trust him."

Then his eyes sought the steeple in the valley and he added: "I guess all of us that's worked on the church is kind of glad t' see that up."

A week before this supreme event Sardias Shepherd, Superintendent of the Sunday-school, hailed Ezra from the post-office steps and said:

"You've been selected as one of the ushers to seat the people at the services, Ezra."

It was something to drive a double team and do a man's work—but to be chosen to act as usher at the Dedication! This honor had never winged his most ambitious dreams. As he walked homeward to carry these marvelous tidings, his feet were treading the soft new carpet of the church aisle instead of the narrow footpath, and he was showing strange men and women, dressed in fine clothes, to their seats in the pews. Clothes! The word cast a cloud of doubts over his bright expectations. His best suit was scarcely fit for Sunday-school, to say nothing of the Dedication in which he would be before the eyes of a vast congregation.

Pride and fear both found their way into his voice as he entered the sitting-room and told of the honor that had been offered him, ending his narrative with the depressing qualification:

"But my clothes ain't fit, an' I guess I'll have to give it up; won't I, Ma?"

Aunt Pomilla, who had come to help out on the new rag carpet, snapped her thread with a decisive jerk.

"No! I haven't churned butter all summer for nothing. You shall have a good suit, one that will be appropriate for the occasion!"

Acts rather than words were characteristic of this aunt, who had been carefully educated in a select female seminary and whose "butter money" was reckoned among the substantial cash assets of the town. Dropping her ball of rags she disappeared into the spare bedroom, returning with the red morocco pocketbook which had always stood in Ezra's eyes as the symbol of unlimited worldly wealth.

"There," she exclaimed, stiffly thrusting a ten-dollar note and two silver dollars into the boy's hands; "that'll buy the cloth and making for as good a suit as any boy in this town will wear to the Dedication. I always intended to do something substantial by you."

October never coined a more golden day than that which gladdened the pilgrims who journeyed to the Dedication from every village and settlement of the county, and even from "the city."

And he had helped build that church!—had done sixty days' work with Mack and Tige, hauling lumber from the Busti sawmill, stone from Ellsworth's gully, sand from Owlsborough and shingles from Ford's Run. It would stand there grand and beautiful, too, for years and years, until he was a grown-up man—and perhaps he would go away and then come back to it and be asked by the Superintendent to "address" the Sunday-school, as Philo Jennings had done when he came from New York last summer.

Almost faint with happiness, Ezra went slowly up the stairs and waited for the first-comers to arrive. The deacons of the church, preoccupied and solemn with importance, brushed hurriedly past him and entered the audience-room. A moment later Deacon Keth returned, touched the sleeve of Ezra's coat and said:

"Come into the conference-room. I have something to say to you."

Wondering what new instructions were to be given him and resolving not to forget a word that was told him, Ezra followed his venerable guide to the basement.

"There's been a mistake—a little hasty action on the part of your teacher. It has been decided," he continued, slowly polishing the crown of his silk hat, "that it would be inappropriate to have any but the children of 'professors' officiate at these solemn services. That's the decision of the deacons of this church, so we won't need your help, Jimmie Totman will take the right aisle."

Five minutes later a shaking little figure stole through the wood-room and out the back door of the basement. The butternut-brown suit hung awkwardly upon his stooped shoulders; the pride of life had suddenly left him, and he was miserably shrunken, wasted, swollen of eye and ashen of face. Scarcely would his nearest companion have recognized in his haunted face and stricken figure a suggestion of the Ezra who had "hauled" for the church and carried the approaching honors of the Dedication upon his erect shoulders with ingenuous pride.

Glancing back, as if fearful some dread pursuer were close upon his track, he hesitated for a moment, then fled precipitately to the stall in which Mack and Tige were gnawing the braces of the horse shed. The big bay instantly lowered his velvety nose and pushed it against the tear-wet face of the boy. But the caress was not returned, for the sound of an approaching wagon was heard and the brown figure of Ezra slipped quickly through the gap in the shed where the pawing of restless horses had broken out a board.

Finally he plunged into his father's sugar bush. There he paused for breath, leaning blindly against the trunk of a friendly maple. But the sugar shanty was still a little beyond. He would crawl in there—and never come out again! They would find him some time—after many days, perhaps—and then they would know how cruel it had all been!

But after an hour of wild sobbing on a bed of leaves in the shanty he was still alive! Then his head became strangely light. Into his confused thoughts crept the awful conviction that, in some mysterious way, hopelessly beyond his understanding, his father and mother must be among the lost—for the Deacon had said they were not "professors." And he was lost, too! They were all lost except those who belonged to the church. He saw the crowded seats, the solemn, expectant audience, saw Willie and Jimmie going up and down the aisles spying out seats for the late comers; heard the swelling chords of the organ, the song of the beautiful lady who had come over in the stage, the deep voice of the tall preacher making the opening prayer! And he was cast out, shamed and disgraced—he who had hauled for the church and had been chosen as an usher!

Before the slant beams of the sun threw long shadows from the maples and told of the approaching dusk a new sensation came to the prostrate boy—an inward gnawing. He was not hungry—he knew that, for he was going to die!—but a vision of fried cakes and cookies in the brown jars in the pantry came persistently before his eyes, and with increasing distinctness.

Perhaps, after all, it would be better to run away! That would provide an escape from the shame of it all and—perhaps—it might some time, in some way, come out all right. Maybe his father and mother would become converted and join the church, and the Deacon would grow sorry for what he had done. Then he could come back home again. Yes; he would run away!

He moved cautiously to the execution of his plan. The house was very still as he crept silently in at the front door and stole to his chamber. From his shell-box he took the store of pennies he had saved to buy Christmas presents with. Into a heap in the centre of a big handkerchief he tossed the New Testament his Sunday-school teacher had given him, his reward of merit cards, the chunk of gold quartz which Chet had brought from Colorado, his big crystal marble with a white lamb inside, the little buckskin purse from the new teacher, and a keyless padlock he had found—as long ago as he could remember—in the road in front of the shoe-shop.

Tying the corners of the handkerchief together he slipped the bundle upon his arm and went stealthily down the stairway to the pantry. The sight of his mother's sunbonnet hanging upon its nail beside the kitchen door caused his breast to shake with sobs. He might never see her again—never!

Groping in the crocks which held the cookies and doughnuts, he fought savagely against the impulse to give up his plan. But no; he could never bear the shame of facing his companions and all the church people.

Suddenly he jumped, dropping the fried cakes and cookies upon the pantry floor. His mother's hand was upon his shoulder and she was saying:

"Why, Ezra!"

Then, reading the terror of his upturned face, she led him into the kitchen, where he buried his face in her apron and sobbed out his tale of shame. In the course of its broken recital the father entered, and stood a silent listener. The brown, work-worn hands of the mother stroked the boy's hair until his tempest of sobs subsided and he found breath to confess:

"It—it—made me 'fraid you an' Pa might be in-fi-dels, like old Aaron the shoemaker, an' that you was—lost!"

"Your father hain't ever made any regular profession of religion," quickly returned

Ezra's mother, "but he hain't so lost but what he gen'ly remembers to live the Golden Rule. I hain't forgot yet how he took care of Deacon Keth's children through the scarlet fever—never slept out of his clothes for two weeks—an' I sh'd think th' Deacon'd remember that, too!"

That night the father left the comforting of Ezra to the mother. His only remark was: "If it's clear to-morrow I'm goin' to go after some squirrels."

Ezra made no reply, asked no questions, but he knew that the squirrel hunt was planned for his pleasure, that he would tramp at his father's side all day long, and that he would be given the best shots with the long rifle.

Before they returned from the hunt, standing on the big rock overlooking the little valley, the father raised his hand, pointed at the straggling herds on the opposite slope and spoke, as if to himself;

"The cattle on a thousand hills are His!"

Then, his eyes still fixed on the dotted hillside, he said:

"A good many of the cruelest things that have been done in this world have been done in the name of religion—but without its spirit!"

In some way which he could not understand, it seemed to Ezra he had never been so near this tall, strong, quiet man before; and they went down the hillside hand in hand. Now, of a certainty, Ezra knew that his father was not numbered among the lost, and all the world seemed strangely safe and peaceful.

Passing through the village they came unexpectedly upon Aunt Pomilla, bearing in her hand the footstool which had rested in her pew since the old church was opened and which had been given a place of honor in the new structure.

"Yes; I'm taking it home, Amos. I guess I know when my toes have been tramped on. I told the old Deacon to-day that the church of the Lord ain't all steeple an' bell."

In the twilight, that evening, as the bell in the white steeple gave out its vibrant call for the "special consecration" meeting, Ezra shyly remarked to his mother:

"Sounds nice, don't it?"

And by this token she knew that the boy's peace and pride had been restored.

Letters by the Way

By Charles Battell Loomis

Author of A Man of Putty, Etc.

COMING FROM BOSTON.

Dear Reader: How many funny things do not strike us as being funny simply because we are so used to them. If a hundred years ago a man had told a story of a fellow who chased a dinner-table through the air for forty miles and cut up a piece of meat in one town to put it into his mouth two, three, four miles beyond; whose glass of water while trickling down his twelve inches of throat was moving forward a thousand feet—people would have said it was a fairy story and an amusing one, and some Cruikshank or Rowlandson would have drawn a picture that would have set the world of that time a-laughing. But to-day we begin a dinner in New York and continue it in Pennsylvania, and perhaps come to the dessert in Ohio, and the humor of the thing never strikes us. We know that even if the dinner-table is going through the air at the rate of fifty miles an hour the chair that holds us is able to keep up exactly the same rate of speed without turning a hair, and that the hot soup that leaves the plate at East Smithville and reaches our mouth at Smithville Centre will not have cooled a degree in spite of the rush.

The joke of one generation becomes the solemn fact of the next. I remember seeing in London Punch a generation or so ago—generations slip by me so quickly that I can never be very exact—a picture by Du Maurier showing how people who could not go to the opera might have the opera brought to them by means of the phonograph. It was an amusing conceit—so we thought then—and far enough from the probability to be a joke, but to-day the phonograph is no joke, and there is many a man who does not care for music at all who would willingly pay five dollars for a seat at the Metropolitan if by that means he could forever escape the thin, small voice of the talking machine.

So, too, ten years ago it would have been considered a very good joke if a man had said, "I know a theatre where they compel women to remove their hats." People would have said sarcastically—the men would have been especially sarcastic—"Oh, indeed! Please take us to that theatre so that we may delight our eyes with such an unseen sight as a theatre full of bareheaded women." Of course the man would have been a liar-gentleman and it would have been his form of joke that he was getting off. But to-day there is at least one theatre where it would be no joke for a woman to retain her bonnet after the curtain went up. There are doubtless others, but the theatre which I have in mind is in Boston and the notice on the program reads, "Ladies must remove their hats. Those who do not wish to do so will go to the box-office where their money will be refunded. An usher will remind all women who have neglected to remove their hats."

I may not be quoting exactly, but the spirit is there—and what spirit! Imagine a manager with nerve enough to print such an order. And imagine how proud he must be when he sees the order obeyed night after night. Not a hat in sight. It was grand. I felt like tossing my own hat into the air and crying "Hurrah for the manager!" People used to say the thing couldn't be done, but it has been done and a theatre is no longer a milliner's show window. The world do move.

Speaking of jokes, it seems to me that the greatest joke is the Boston Elevated-Underground Railroad. A man wants to go to Adams Square from the North Station. He laboriously toils up the stairs to the Elevated the same as he does in New York, and just as he does in New York he immerses himself in his newspaper and is oblivious to everything. Suddenly darkness falls on his page and he looks up in terror. The train has left the glad free air and is in the subway. Before he realizes what has happened the guard calls out the name of the station and he emerges, and in order to get to the city level has to climb up stairs again.

Now in New York there is only one climb and that is at the beginning of the journey, but the Bostonian's motto is ever Excelsior.

And they manage the elevated crowds differently in Boston. People are jammed in at the car end the same as they are in New York, but they are squeezed out at the middle like seeds out of an orange. Still, as they are all moving the same way, there is less friction, and they undoubtedly retain more of their clothing than a New York crowd can possibly do.

I had always heard that Bostonians were readers and that they were loyal to the little band of littérateurs who made a crown of glory for the city on the three hills, so it did not surprise me to see a man, evidently a business man, reading Emerson's Essays on a Boston and Cambridge electric. (They call them "electrics" in Boston. They have to be different.) I was curious to know something of the history of this typical Bostonian, and so under pretext of asking him whether the car went through to Arlington I entered into conversation with him when he had finished the essay on Self-Reliance and was presumably in a position to look out for himself.

"Pardon my inquisitiveness," said I, "but I could not help seeing the title of your book, and as I am a stranger in Boston it pleased me not a little to learn that Bostonians are really as cultivated as the joke writers would have us believe."

"Oh, yes," said he; "there are cultivated men in all cities."

"Well, can you tell me if it is a general custom for business men to read Emerson on the street cars?"

With great courtesy but with a half concealed smile he said:

"I am not in a position to answer your question as I was never in Boston before. I am a professor in Columbia College and I am on my way to visit my brother, who is a professor in Harvard. I was born and brought up in Jersey City and I never happened to read Emerson until to-day, when I picked up this copy in the Corner Book Store. I see that I have missed an intellectual treat."

I retired, apologizing, and fell to reflecting on the danger of generalizing. It reminded

New Mercerized Vesting WAIST

$1.00

Waist precisely like cut; a swell, strictly tailor made, heavy wash waist, with broad military shoulders, eight one-inch pleats across front, four pleats down back, up-to-date full French sleeve, nobby stock collar and tie, three large pearl buttons down front. Made of popular new men's madras vestings in plain basket weave or woven fancy stripes.

The illustration does not do the waist justice,—send for one and see for yourself.

All sizes in stock from 32 to 44. It's a waist that can be worn every day in the year, for heavy wash waists are now assured a permanent position in "My Lady's Wardrobe." Special $1

LIKE A DERRICK

Pure Food Lifts the Sick Up

Only those who have experienced the delicious feeling of returning health and vigor can properly appreciate the value of pure food. When the improper food is left off and scientific food such as Grape-Nuts is used in its place one begins to feel the glow of returning health. It feels as though some powerful derrick was lifting one up into the realms of sunshine once more.

"Some time ago I was taken sick and got so very low that I thought at times I would never be able to get out again," writes a business man of Wilmington, Del. "One day my wife saw an article in the paper about Grape-Nuts and read it to me. I was so impressed that I asked her to get some. How thankful I am that I did so. I was at that time reduced to a shadow of 75 pounds but the first week's use of Grape-Nuts brought me to my feet so that I could stand alone. By the second week I could walk out, to the great surprise of all, and now I can get out to my business without any trouble and I have made the phenomenal gain up to 160 pounds.

"Improper food nearly killed me but when I left it off and used Grape-Nuts it did not take long to put me back in health." Name furnished by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

"Feed right, feel right" is a true axiom. Remember Grape-Nuts food is for Athletes, as well as the sick.

me of a certain scene I once saw in New York when I was showing a Western friend the sights. We came on a group of children playing in Madison Square. They were not fashionably dressed; in fact their clothing showed signs of great wear, but they did seem to be having a good time and played with abandon.

My friend, who is something of a sentimentalist, wiped his eyes and said: "What a typical New York scene! These little children have probably come for the day from out some East Side rookery. The sight of trees and green grass is an unwonted one and to-day they are living. To-night they will go back to their noisome tenements and wish that their whole life could be spent on this breathing spot. Thank God for the city parks. How typical of New York it is. And how preternaturally old the poor little fellows look."

It certainly was a New York sight, and if snap-shotted would have become a permanent one, but, impelled by that same curiosity that had led me to speak to the Columbia professor, I went up to one of the children and said, "Johnny, where do you live when you're at home?"

"I live up at Goshen, Connecticut. We're on a picnic to New York. We belong to the First Congregational Sunday-school and the superintendent is paying for the whole thing. Ain't he generous? I like this green. It makes me think of the country."

"When did you leave the country?"

"This morning. We go back to-night. Been to the aquarium and the theatre and rode on the elevated cars, but I like this best because it's like home."

"A bit of New York!" Taken up bodily out of Connecticut and set down in New York, and my friend thought it a typical group of East Siders, and would probably have written an interesting letter to his home paper on what New York does for its city-ridden children if I hadn't found out the facts.

But it's a heap more interesting as a general thing to accept things at their face value and not go digging for the truth. I have no doubt that the Frenchiest Frenchmen I saw sipping coffee on the Boulevard des Italiens were Russians and Spanish Jews and Western art students. It takes a Kipling to look beneath the surface and grasp the essentials without spoiling the romance——

Oh, dear, we've got to change cars, and I was just warming up. I may write again if I don't hear from you.

Better than Kindling Wood

THE story is told that when a now forgotten chemist, many centuries ago, announced that coal was a valuable mineral fuel, a conservative in the same line of science applied fire to coal lumps in his laboratory, and as there was no ensuing combustion, nor any immediate indication that the coal would take fire, the prudent scientist declared that the claims of his contemporary were fantastic.

At very high temperatures, be conceded, coal could be made to fuse, but the process of kindling it would be so tedious and the quantity of ordinary fuel consumed in the undertaking so great that the heat extracted from the coal would involve a cost infinitely greater than its worth.

To-day, without having to wait to get a light from science, any man can kindle coal. Nevertheless, to start a coal fire quickly is an accomplishment that must be acquired.

As a boon to every man and woman to whom fate assigns the duty of "starting the fire" will come the device of an Ohio man.

He runs an iron gas pipe, equipped with many jets, beneath the grate. To start a fire in a range having his attachment under or adjacent to the grate-bars, the plan is to remove the lids directly above the fire-box, clear the grate-bars of ashes by tilting the grate, then turn on the gas and drop a lighted match into the fire-box, which immediately ignites the gas as it issues from the conduit. Then the fire builder should pour in sufficient coal, replace the lids, and see that the drafts are well opened. In about three minutes the gas should be turned off, and in about ten minutes more it will be found that one has a very hot coal fire.

WHEATLET

All the Wheat that's fit to eat

A Woman's Washington

By The Congressman's Wife

I HAVE been reminded throughout the dying throes of this Fifty-seventh Congress of the old cynic who said that dying was like thunder in two particulars: because we are alarmed at the sound of it and afraid of the symptoms that go before it; and this dying of the Fifty-seventh Congress is certainly very like thunder both in its symptoms and its sounds. I have listened for days from the gallery to a whole chamber full of men, all talking apparently against time and eternity, until I have become convinced of the truth that no wild beast is more to be dreaded than the man who is a spendthrift with his tongue. Truly, the tribulations of the Senate majority are an edifying spectacle, and as I have gazed down upon the devious ways of our legislators and have seen their deadlocked determination over Statehood and heard their deadlocked denials about the Trust telegrams, for some of their number have been going around with an air of "You-may-search-me-if-you-want-to," I have felt that I was in sore danger of meeting the fate of the man who died of laughing at seeing a monkey trying to pull off a pair of his boots.

The galleries around the Senate during these days have been a perfect flower garden filled with choice sprigs of the smart set, and I have been much afraid that Mr. Frye would call us all to order. There has been such a chattering going on that I have seen him raise his gavel once or twice as he glanced up our way. Robert and Senator P—— have come up every day for a time, and even the new Member of the House has borne us company, and they have brought the gossip of the cloakrooms and lobbies with them.

When all three of them joined us on one occasion the new Member whispered to me:

"This deadlock over the Omnibus bill with its two factions reminds me of a game we used to play when I was a boy. We used to duck our heads in a bucket of water and dare each other to stay under the longest."

"These two fighting factions remind me more," said I, "of the two parts of a pair of scissors that cut up everything that comes between without hurting each other in the least. It has been a liberal education to see the methods of Senators in getting into this fight. Some have been so amiable and ponderous with their opinions tacked to their tongues just as a notice might be tacked to a church door, and others have fought pugnaciously and insistently. If I were a politician I'd be a fighter, and when a great battle was over I'd be counted with the dead and not with the missing."

"Well," said Senator P—— dryly, in an undertone, "if this Omnibus bill is not disposed of pretty soon there won't be an intelligible tongue left among us. Frye is so worn out with it, and with announcing day after day that this bill is before the Senate as unfinished business, that he cannot now pronounce 'Omnibus' to save his life, and it is about all he can do not to call it 'Om'nous' bill."

This produced an audible ripple among us, and instantly the doorkeeper left his perch above and came down the gallery steps, looking for the offenders and saying, "No demonstration is permitted."

We subsided and gave our attention to the debate below. Senator X—— was talking. He had been talking for three days. He was gesticulating and riding up and down on his tiptoes with the rhythm of his words. The Democratic side of the chamber was almost deserted; even Cherokee Strip looked lonely. Across the middle aisle Senator Stewart and his opposite neighbor, Senator Berry, had swung their chairs, and with their newspapers spread out before them completely blocked business in that aisle, while Senator Beveridge and Senator Quay, the leaders of the two factions, were in their seats, silent, alert, like sentinels on picket duty. I whispered to Senator P——:

"I should think the real obstructionists in the Senate are Mr. Stewart and Mr. Berry. They are spread out over the entire aisle."

"Oh, they are tired to death. We are all tired to death," whispered back the Senator. "We've managed, however, to get a good deal out of this fight in the way of amusement. Some of us were badgering Quay yesterday about this bill, and we told him he was no nearer a vote than he was last week, and a witty Southern Senator said:

The World's Best Music

If you are a pianist or a singer you are constantly buying sheet music—and paying high prices for it. It lies in ragged piles around the house and becomes scattered and torn. You lose money by buying music in that way, to say nothing of your loss of time and temper when searching for a particular selection. Why not buy your music in volumes, filled with the best selections, and thoroughly indexed? The "Library of the World's Best Music" is designed for your needs. Its eight volumes—sheet music size, but light and easy to handle—are crowded with the best vocal and instrumental music, carefully selected by an experienced corps of music editors.

This Bookcase Free if You Order at Once.

Size of Volumes, 9 x 12 Inches.

A Complete Musical Library

The Library contains 300 instrumental selections by great composers; melodious, not too difficult, including popular and operatic melodies, dances, funeral marches, and classic and romantic piano music. There are 350 best old and new songs, duets, trios, and quartets. The volumes are illustrated with 400 portraits, many of which are handsome chromatic art plates printed in colors. The work contains 500 biographies of musicians, and more than 100 new and copyrighted selections by American composers. It is the most complete collection of music in existence.

2,200 Pages of Sheet Music

There are 2,200 pages of sheet music, which would cost, if purchased one piece at a time, more than $200.00. The volumes are nearly sheet music size, and are specially bound so as to open flat at the piano. In number of pages of sheet music, number of biographies, and in number of illustrations this Musical Library leads all others. In the preparation of the work twenty editors and special contributors assisted. It has been indorsed by music-loving people in every English-speaking country. Four hundred composers are represented, including such world-famous names as Paderewski, Balfe, Liszt, Wagner, Mozart, Gounod, Beethoven, De Koven, Strauss, Sullivan, and Handel. There are eight volumes in the set, handsomely bound in half leather or cloth. Size of volumes, 9 x 12 inches—nearly sheet music size.

Half-Price Club Closing!

We are so confident that this Library will please any music lover that we are willing to send complete sets for examination, but the edition at the disposal of our Musical Library Club is being rapidly exhausted, so prompt action is necessary if you wish to obtain a set at the present low prices. The regular publisher's prices for this Library are $40.00 and $35.00, but as long as the sets at the disposal of the Club last they will be distributed at $25.00 for a set in half-leather binding and $21.00 for the cloth binding—payable at the rate of $1.00 a month. Send us the coupon with your name and address filled in and a set will be sent you, express prepaid, for examination—no matter how far from New York your home is. If you do not find the set satisfactory, it may be returned at our expense. Remember that you do not pay a cent until you examine the books.

BOOK-CASE FREE We have a small number of elegant oak-wood book-cases that are made especially to hold a set of the "World's Best Music." Their retail price is $6.00 each, but we have decided to offer them as premiums to prompt subscribers. To obtain a book-case free with your set, it will be necessary to send us your order before April 1st. If your order is received after that date, we cannot supply a book-case with the set, unless, of course, you care to pay the retail price of $4.00 for the case. This book-case is a present from us, and does not increase the cost of the music in any manner.

New Books Worth Having

Hypnotism By Edward H. Eldridge, A.M.

There is no more popular or interesting form of entertainment than hypnotic exhibitions, and every one would like to know how to hypnotize. By following the simple and concise instructions contained in this complete manual any one can, with a little practice, readily learn how to exercise this unique and strange power.

Proverbs By John H. Bechtel

The genius, wit and spirit of a nation are discovered in its proverbs, and the condensed wisdom of all ages and all nations is embodied in them. A good proverb that fits the case is often a convincing argument. This volume contains a representative collection of proverbs, old and new, and the indexes, topical and alphabetical, enable one to find readily just what he requires.

Electricity By George L. Fowler

An interesting and thoroughly reliable presentation of the subject for the amateur or skilled electrician. If you wish to install an electric door-bell, construct a telephone, wire a house, or understand the workings of a dynamo, this volume will furnish the required information. A practical book of inestimable value to every one.

Toasts By William Pittenger

Most men dread being called upon to respond to a toast or to make an address. What would you not give for the ability to be rid of this embarrassment? No need to give much when you can learn the art from this little book. It will tell you how to do it; not only that, but by example it will show the way. It is valuable not alone to the novice, but the experienced speaker will gather from it many suggestions.

"Your success, Quay, in this fight, reminds me of old Uncle Hannibal's fishing. Uncle Hannibal lives down in my region and he's a persistent fisherman. He fishes week in and week out and it never seems to put him out if he doesn't get anything. One day he had a particularly exasperating fish on his hook. He gave it full play, and for hours was as wary and patient and sporty as possible. At last some one coming along said:

"'"What's the matter, Uncle Hannibal; can't you land him?"

"'"Well," said Uncle Hannibal sagely, "'pears to me like I dunno whuther I's a nigger a-fishin', or whuther that fish is a-niggerin'."'"

"Did Mr. Quay see the application?" I whispered.

"Oh, yes; you know it is an old saying that the prosperity of a jest lies in the ear of him who hears, and Quay heard all right and laughed all right," said the Senator.

"By the way," said Robert, "have you happened to hear the masterly way Joe Blackburn has of telling a man that what he says is not true? He took issue with an assertion of a certain Senator the other day, and conveyed his meaning in the most parliamentary fashion:

"'It goes without saying that the truth is innocent of any appearance in that statement.'

"And apropos," continued Robert, "of the prolonged deadlock in the Delaware Legislature which is keeping two vacant seats in the Senate Chamber here, Blackburn told a good story of his friend, Colonel Chinn, of Kentucky.

"'They ought to have Chinn up in Delaware,' said he; 'he'd settle it. Once when there was a row in our Kentucky Legislature Chinn got together a faction that turned out some of the legislators so effectually that they did not know they were out till it was over, and one of the ousted ones said:

"'"Colonel Chinn, I want an explanation as to why I was turned out."

"'"Sir, because you part your hair in the middle."

"'"But, sir," said the ousted one, "why did you turn out my colleague?"

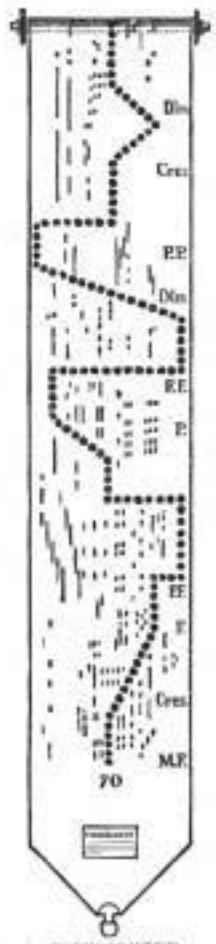
"'"Because he doesn't part his hair in the middle," was the imperturbable answer.'"

"I should have thought," said I, interrupting Robert, "that such a proceeding would have ended with pistols."

"Oh, there was a row and some talk of shooting, but no one was hurt. Blackburn, who is a mighty good story-teller, said that another time Chinn wanted some office, and it was when the silver craze was over all the land. Colonel Chinn made up his mind to take the stump, although he couldn't make a speech to save his life. So he decided he would not let any of his own friends hear his speeches but would talk only to the negroes, whose votes he wanted. About two hundred negroes attended Chinn's meeting. He began a long speech on the tariff, but was finally interrupted:

"'Boss, we don' want no tariff; we wants silver talk.'

"'Oh, all right,' said Chinn cheerfully, 'I know about silver down to the ground. My friends, it's this in a nutshell: The Republicans have got all the jobs, the Jews have got all the gold, but if you darkies and we poor white trash had all the silver we'd soon wipe all the rest off the globe—see?'



"And Blackburn said Colonel Chinn got every negro vote in that community," wound up Robert.

"That speech of Colonel Chinn's," said Senator P—— reminiscently, "recalls a remarkably funny speech over in the House some years ago. A certain North Carolina man, renowned for his humor and for his odd quips and jests, got up one day when things were dull in the House and suddenly launched out into a speech that fairly scintillated with flowery phrases and rhetorical effects. He quoted from every English and American poet known, but it was all apropos of nothing under the sun. The House came flocking in from the lobbies to listen, to wonder and to catch on if it could to the reason for it. When the outburst was over, and the House caught its breath, the demand came from all sides to know what had provoked such a speech and what he had meant.

"'Oh, don't bother about what it meant, gentlemen. I was not talking for the House, but simply for Buncombe.'

"Buncombe," explained the Senator, laughing silently at the recollection, "was the man's home county in North Carolina."

"I imagine the House got as much fun out of that speech," said the Member, "as the Supreme Court did last week when our new justice, Justice Holmes, handed down his famous first opinion on the Circus Poster Case,

Music roll showing expression line. This line enables any one to play with expression.

THE word "PIANOLA" has been so often brought to one's attention that the realization that it must mean something forces itself upon one.

It is impossible to explain an article for which there is no precedent. Briefly stated, the Pianola is an instrument by means of which any one can play upon the piano any pianoforte selection ever composed—no matter how difficult. The player controls the expression and therefore experiences all the pleasure of hand-playing.

The popularity of the piano, despite its thousands of compositions locked behind a baffling technique, makes the enthusiasm created by the Pianola readily understood.

The Pianola looks like a small cabinet. It is not attached to the piano in any way, but is simply rolled to the instrument when its use is desired.

The price of the Pianola is $250.

Visitors welcome.

OUT DOOR ART CLUB, Box 14, Station F, Brooklyn, N. Y.

and quoted Ruskin. He had copies of these posters, which were handed around among the Justices, who examined their flaming cuts with the utmost dignity, amidst the ever impressive quiet which rules in that court. But there was a little girl among the spectators who had not been taken into the account. When she saw those posters and the gravity of the Justices she whispered audibly:

"'Why doesn't some one laugh, mamma?'"

This caused us a smile. Then I asked:

"Isn't it odd, the way that Justice Brewer and Justice Brown, of the Supreme Bench, have kept pace with each other all through their careers? They were boys together, they went through Yale College together, they went out West together, they studied law at the same time, they married at the same time, and their names were sent to the President for the Supreme Bench at the same time and for the same vacancy. When this happened, and the President was considering their names, Justice Brown wrote to the President withdrawing his name and urging the President to appoint his friend, who, he said, 'was the better man.' In consideration of this request the President appointed Justice Brewer, but he had been so impressed by the other's letter that when another vacancy occurred on the Bench he promptly offered it to Justice Brown, and in a short time both men faced each other from opposite ends of the Circle of Justices, and as Justice Brewer put it:

"'Yale College hems in the Supreme Court.'"

"I hear," said Robert, "that the whole Bench was quite indignant not long since because some one dubbed one of their decisions as 'The last guess of the Supreme Court.'"

"Pshaw," said Senator P—— decisively, "the Supreme Court is the strongest, highest expression of judicial thought that this or any other country is ever likely to hear expounded."

"By the way," said the new Member, "I was up at the new White House offices the other day, and there was a little ripple of fun running around about a recent Cabinet meeting. It seems that the different Secretaries had been unburdening themselves of their annoyances, Root and Moody in particular. Moody's pet grievance was the astronomical features of the Naval Observatory, which had been such a fad with Long. He said to the Cabinet:

"'I think the Navy ought to go out of the business of Astronomy. I do not know how to run an Observatory and you will never get a Secretary who does know how, nor an officer who knows how. Now, I should be glad to give the whole thing away to any scientific institution that could run it.'

"It was pointed out to the Secretary that the Naval Observatory had been built up carefully to its present proportions step by step, and that it had cost the Government a million dollars, and possessed a splendid collection of instruments and the best scientific library in the Western Hemisphere, and therefore he'd better hold on to it.

"And Root's particular annoyance on this occasion, barring about twenty others or more, was the case of Miss Taylor, who has taken her case against the War Department for removal into court. Some one was badgering Root and telling him Miss Taylor had dismissed her lawyers and was going to conduct her own case—that she meant to make things hot for the Department. One of the Cabinet said:

"'You'd better turn the case over to the Attorney-General, here, Root.'

"'No, no, you don't,' interposed the Attorney-General; 'Root must get out of that scrape by himself.'

"'Oh,' said Root quickly, 'I wouldn't think of getting Knox into this. This is a case for a lawyer.'"

Just then there seemed to be an unusual stir on the floor below. Senator X—— had paused in his talk. Several Senators were on their feet trying to speak. Mr. Frye was pounding with his gavel. I glanced around for an explanation, and there in the middle aisle of the gallery stood the Sergeant-at-Arms, bland and determined, looking fixedly at us.

"What does he want?" I asked quickly.

"Oh," laughed Senator P——, "they haven't had a quorum downstairs for the last half-hour and they've just found it out, and we're to be haled before the bar of the Senate. Come along, Slocum, our playtime is over."

Photography of Snakes and Other Reptiles

By Dr. R. W. Shufeldt

SNAKES, from their great agility and long, whiplike forms, very often make it extremely difficult for the amateur photographer to keep the entire creature in focus and within the boundary limits of the plate. This applies especially to the smaller forms we commonly run across in our rambles, such as the pretty little summer snakes, one blue and the other green; the garter snake and some few others. Large forms, such as the big rattlers, boa constrictors and the like, I have as yet had no experience with, but they will be found easy to photograph when compared with the smaller varieties just mentioned.

One day I caught a fine specimen of the little green summer snake I speak of and the gentle, delicate little creature was extremely lively. It was only by chance that it was seen, for his entire body was as green as the greenest of malachite, and he was reposing in wavy curves in a smilax vine having leaves and stems that matched his scaly coat to a fault. After his capture I took all of the smilax needed for a photographic picture to my studio, where I verily believe I got away with the best part of a dozen five-by-eight plates before my object was accomplished.

The blotched king snake has made a good picture for me several times, and on one occasion in a sort of a knot in the roughish branches of an old pine tree. He remained so but a moment, however, and then began to uncoil and descend to the ground. He was checked instantaneously by blowing at him, when he drew his head and the fore part of his length back in a beautiful double curve and he was immediately taken in this interesting attitude.

Some of the smaller innoxious serpents are protected by the law of "protective resemblance." Often it is very difficult to discover their presence on the dark soil among the blackish roots and brown crumpled leaves in some swampy fen, amid the sprouting ferns and grasses.

To obtain such a subject, one must cut out the entire sod with a spade, just as it is found, and carry it in a basket to the studio. Here it must be placed upon a stand at a height equal to that of the camera upon its tripod. No great amount of light must be admitted, and, if the snake be quiet, a diaphragm with a very small aperture must be employed, and a long time (three minutes) exposure given.

THE BLOTCHED KING SNAKE

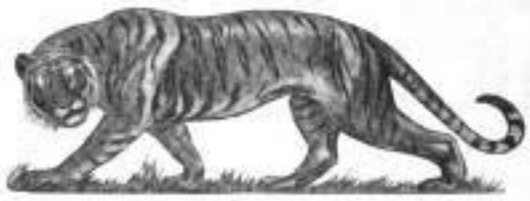
It is all nonsense talking about making "snap-shots" of such subjects. They do not admit of it, nor can one secure the requisite amount of detail if such a procedure be attempted. It is an entirely different matter, of course, if the specimen you desire to photograph is in active movement at the time the exposure is made, but under those circumstances it is a rare thing that one can devote any study to the subject, and it is only a chance that a really valuable and artistic picture is the result of the operation. Now, the bullfrog, shown in another picture, was practically an instantaneous picture, because frogs are very difficult subjects to get to stand still, and, everything else being equal, the quicker the exposure made upon them the better.

As I have elsewhere stated, of the great number of animal pictures I have taken with the camera, I have as yet never employed a hand camera for the purpose. It is all tripod work, every bit of it, and I think the famous Kearton brothers in England recommend the same plan. In fact, it is the only practical one to be recommended, and the only one in which success can be counted on. One needs, however, the simplest, quickest and, above all things, the most noiseless shutter that has been invented.



Attached to the shutter one should use a pneumatic bulb and no less than twelve or fifteen feet of rubber tubing, and by practice and experience learn to handle them under all circumstances.

Photographing a bird on its nest is a good illustrative case demanding such a device. The camera is artfully concealed near the nest and set in readiness to take the picture, while the long tube allows the operator to hide himself at a considerable distance from it. Those in the fashion in these days use the five-by-seven plate, but the plate for the purpose here being considered is the five-by-eight size, the additional inch on the long side meaning everything in obtaining long slim forms, such as pikes among fishes, certain types with long tails among reptiles, and a great many others, altogether too numerous to mention.

Fully as important as the size of the plate employed is its quality. I now employ for my purpose, with very great satisfaction, isochromatic dry plates, both quick and slow.

The isochromatic plate gives me the ability to produce color definition, though in some subjects this will make little or no difference. Take such difficult subjects to photograph as turtles and tortoises, for example. I made a successful picture of a young snapping-turtle, with a rapid plate, but the animal is all of a uniform brown color, so special definition was not required.

Our common box tortoises, however, are a very different kind of a species to obtain good photographic pictures of; and this not only on account of the difficulty of catching them in

THE PEOPLE'S Natural History

This natural history is a work of fascinating interest. It describes all the living creatures of the earth—wild animals and races of men—and though scientific and accurate, it is the only natural history in existence that has been written for the average, ordinary reader. It is readable and attractive from start to finish, because it is written from the standpoint of human interest, and is not filled with dry and tedious scientific terms. These volumes contain hundreds of real and true stories of wild animals and wild men. One may read here of the almost human intelligence of certain species of animals, of the curious deceptions practiced by others to ensnare their prey, of the way some species combine for defence or attack. The human race from its lowest to its highest forms is described by travelers and anthropologists. One would hardly believe, in these days of Marconi messages and air ships, that there are men now living who are wholly covered with long hair, who would give all they possess for a child's whirligig, or who run their fists through mirrors to catch the image on the other side. But such folk exist, and this work will tell you about them and show you their pictures.

Sets Sent Free!

We are just completing the first edition of this magnificent and valuable work. We are so confident that it will please the most fastidious purchaser that we are willing to send complete sets for examination without expense to you. It will cost you only a two-cent stamp to decide for yourself as to the value of this Library of Natural History.

The sets are in five large de luxe volumes, 11½ x 8½ inches in size. They are printed on superior fine white coated paper. Three volumes are devoted to the living animals of the world and two volumes to the living races of mankind. There are two thousand black and white illustrations in the set, besides numerous colored plates. The bindings are in red cloth or half-leather, stamped in gold.

A Portrait Gallery of Actual Life

TWO THOUSAND PICTURES

This natural history is unique in that it is illustrated only by reproductions of actual photographs of animals and savage races taken in every part of the globe. There are two thousand photographic reproductions in the set, which alone make it superior to the ordinary natural history filled with woodcuts—often ridiculous in their misconception—drawn by artists who had never seen the animals they attempted to portray. Among the eminent naturalists, anthropologists and travelers who contribute to the work are Prof. Richard Lydekker, Charles J. Cornish, Sir Harry Johnston, Ernest Ingersoll, F.C. Selous and many others.

AN IDEAL GIFT BOOK

This is the only natural history that treats extensively of the races of men as well as of animals. It furnishes a complete survey of the living creatures of the world, and provides, in a large measure, the breadth of knowledge and culture that are developed by foreign travel. It leads its readers through many lands under the direction of trained and observant guides. It is an ideal gift-book for young people as well as for grown folks. It is the kind of book that you can give to your boy or girl and know that they will derive instruction as well as entertainment from it.

SPECIAL BEFORE-PUBLICATION SALE

The first edition of "The People's Natural History" will be ready for delivery about the 1st of April. To obtain a large number of orders before publication, we will accept advance orders at a specially low introductory price. To secure a set on these terms, send us the coupon cut from this advertisement with your name and address written in, and upon completion of the work a set will be sent you, express prepaid, for examination. You may retain the set by paying $1.00 within five days after receipt of the books and $2.00 a month thereafter for twelve months if the half-leather binding is ordered. If the cloth binding is desired, there will be only nine monthly payments. If the set is not satisfactory, you may return it at our expense. These prices are about half the prices at which a work of this character is regularly sold. Don't wait, if you want to be sure of a set. Send your order to-day. It will cost you nothing to examine the books.

favorable positions, with head, limbs and tail all out and in full view, but on account of their color, which in the most highly colored specimens generally consists in irregularly arranged bright orange spots on a blackish-brown ground of the carapace and head.

These tortoises, it will be found, vary widely in the matter of individual temperament, some specimens being very sluggish in habit; and in photographing them one is obliged to wait a long time before the subject will condescend to come out of its shell—that is, extend its head, limbs and tail, and walk off a bit.

Others again are extremely lively, struggling in the hand of the photographer to escape, and rambling off the instant they are placed upon the ground.

In the course of a couple of hours, by exercising great patience and kindness, one can generally succeed in even getting such an apparently unteachable creature as this tortoise to understand what is needed of it, and a successful exposure is then made.

A BOX TORTOISE

The amateur photographer whose tastes lead him or her to make photographic pictures of living forms, will find that a small aquarium will make it possible to secure many of the aquatic animals. In it one may obtain very interesting photographs of the several species of our pretty pond turtles, newts, fish, water beetles and the like. The aquarium, filled with perfectly clear water and containing such plants, rocks and pebbly bottom as are required, is placed in the proper light on a stand as high as the box of the camera.

At the back of the aquarium a large piece of manila paper is placed for a background shutting out all objects in the rear of the aquarium.

Through this method I obtained the picture of the triton or newt shown in the accompanying picture, and have also photographed crayfish, many species of fishes, and other aquatic forms.

Some of our smaller wood lizards, such as the common swift, for example, and very gentle little creatures they are, make excellent subjects to test the skill of the naturalist photographer.

My picture of one of these was obtained by instantaneous exposure in the following manner:

Having selected a piece of old pine branch with a cone upon it, it was sustained in front of a white background in the proper light, as already directed, and with the camera focused upon it to the very finest degree of sharpness. Then closing the shutter, and placing in a very small "stop" and drawing the slide to the plate-holder, I was ready for an exposure with the pneumatic bulb in my left hand.

Meanwhile I pointed at the cone with my right forefinger, the arm being extended, with the lizard on the upper side of it opposite the elbow. By gently blowing at him, he was induced to run down my arm and out upon my extended finger, which was several inches removed from the cone. Then I gave a brisk puff and he jumped to the pine branch, when I instantly made the exposure by squeezing the bulb in my other hand, and so got the pretty little chap in the most natural attitude possible.

OSTHEIMER BROS., 621 Broadway, New York City

THE output of fiction never has been so enormous in this country as during the last Christmas holidays. Two significant facts are to be noticed about this flood of novels and short stories.

One is, that the great majority of them are the work of women, and the other is the large number which have been modeled on the lines of some "Big Seller."

Stanley Weyman's Gentleman of France has brought into the market dozens of imaginary legends of the Guadalquiver or the Seine—fantastic dreams which else had perished unborn in the brains of romantic girls and boys. Now that they have made their entrance into the world in cold print they may be called snap-shots of the realm of ancient chivalry. There are the castles, clowns, knights and troubadours, correct in clothes and speech. But yet one feels that the pictures were taken by a Yankee camera—a camera which never had crossed the seas.

As soon, too, as David Harum had set the country in a roar, how many of us scribblers seized our pens to sketch the grim, warty old farmers in Maine or Wyoming with whom we had boarded last summer?

A crop of Colonial stories sprang up, plenty as mushrooms on a sheep-walk, in the track of Mary Johnston's triumphant footsteps. And so on and on.

The breathless haste with which every successful book is imitated in this country has a pitiful significance,. It hints at the countless bright, energetic women who stand hungry in the market-place, eager to earn a livelihood in any decent way. They are as ready to write novels as to speculate in whale-oil, and often know as much of one kind of manufacture as of the other.

Hence many of these little books, red and blue, and gay with dashing figures on the backs, which heap our tables this winter, should perhaps be regarded as mere mouthfuls, meant to satisfy a moment's hunger—the hunger for money in the writer and for amusement in the reader. But, with all, what a flavor they have! The grammar may be faulty, the imitation of their model glaring, wit, pathos and humor may be wholly lacking, but in even the leanest and poorest of them there is a backbone of sincerity. The American woman who writes a book, from Margaret Deland down, invariably gives us something of herself in it, tears out a rib from her own side to make this creature alive which she sends out into the world. It is a singular trait in our women, but they have it. It may partly be due to the fact that they are wide-awake enough to know that the day for factitious lip-talk is past. The world has no time to spare to poseurs or make-believes. It only will listen to words which come blood-stained from the heart.

The Realm of Childhood

The story of Emmy Lou is perhaps the most genuine and delicate bit of humor to be found among recent books. During the last few years there have been many explorers through that unknown, mysterious realm of childhood into which Dickens was the first adventurer. His David and Tiny Tim and Paul Dombey with all their truth and pathos were, after all, only pictures of the child as seen by the adult. Kenneth Graham's immortal Harold is the boy as he remembers himself when he is a grown man. But Madden Martin has gone into the heart of an innocent, dull-witted little girl of six and

40-Volume Shakespearian Library
for 6 Cents a Day

For six cents a day, for a short while, you can buy a complete Shakespearian Library—forty volumes—containing all of Shakespeare's Plays, Poems and Sonnets, with copious notes and explanatory matter. If you are a student of Shakespeare, or if you are accumulating a library of standard authors, or if you wish to read merely for pleasure, you cannot do better than buy a set of the Booklovers' Shakespeare on our Club plan. An entire set will be sent you, on your request, for examination before purchasing.

The Booklovers' Edition

This is the ideal edition for those who love good books. It gives Shakespeare's works complete in forty dainty volumes—light and easy to handle—but well printed, beautifully illustrated and handsomely bound. It is not a cheaply made, trashy edition, but a production worthy of a place in the library of the most fastidious book lover. The type is large and clear, and the work is printed on a superior grade of white paper.

This edition reproduces the famous Cambridge text, to which have been added Prefaces, Critical Comments, Glossaries, and Explanatory and Critical Notes. There are over 400 illustrations, many of which are reproductions of rare woodcuts of Shakespeare's time.

Forty Complete Volumes

You will enjoy reading Shakespeare if you read this edition, not only because it is the most accurate edition, but also because it is the best annotated edition ever offered to the American public. Every obscure phrase, every difficult word, every tangled passage, has been discussed and explained by the men best fitted to explain it. In the extent of the information it contains concerning the great poet and his works it is, in fact, a Shakespearian encyclopedia.

The sets are in forty volumes, and with each set is included a Life of Shakespeare by Israel Gollancz, and a Topical Index of Shakespeare's works (comprising one volume) by means of which the reader can find any desired passage almost at a glance.

The entire set contains 7,000 pages, forty beautiful color plates and 400 woodcut illustrations. The volumes are 7½ x 5⅛ inches in size—just the right size for easy handling—and they are bound in an attractive cloth or half-leather binding stamped in gold.

The Coupon Cuts the Price in Two

The fact that we have secured an entire edition for cash from the publishers is the reason we are able to offer sets of this splendid Shakespeare at bargain prices. The edition will probably be sold very rapidly, so if you wish to take advantage of this bargain, do not fail to order at once. Our special bargain prices are $27.00 for a set in half-leather binding and $21.00 for cloth binding—payable at the rate of $2.00 a month. Cut out the coupon, sign it, and mail it to us to-day, and we will send you a set, express prepaid, for examination. You do not pay a cent until you examine the books and are satisfied with them.

A BEAUTIFUL PREMIUM

If your order is among the first 250 received, we will send you as a premium with the set a beautiful picture matted and framed in oak (ready for hanging) of six of Shakespeare's characters, executed in colors. The only condition is that you must order promptly, so that your order will be among the first 250. This picture is equal in value to pictures regularly sold at $2.75 each.

Farnsworth, Hoyt & Co., Boston

speaks out of that. She and her public school, her classmates and her thinkings and sayings are commonplace as the grass growing in the sun, but are as foreign and mysterious to us as the life of grass and sun.

We all applaud the explorer who opens up a new country in the world to us, be it Thibet or the Arctic regions. But we owe more to the man who shows us for the first time the world as it is seen by living things close at hand. Mrs. Stowe first gave us the negro's view of life, Kipling the wolf's, and now Mrs. Martin that of the little child.

Another book which has greatly puzzled the critics is Barrie's Little White Bird. It sets out to be a wayward, irresponsible flight of fancy—the freakish longings and doings of a lonely old bachelor. Some of these waking dreams are true and fine, and are brought home to us with that wizard touch of genius which gave Thrums to each of us—Thrums and Lizzy and Barrie's mother, possessions in perpetuity for us for all time.

But the defect in this book is that Mr. Barrie sometimes becomes conscious of his own magic. He summons for the first time into the world the dog that was a boy, out of the dark whence Shakespeare called Caliban, and then stops to look at him with his head on one side and a nod of approval, as though speculating how the new idea will hit the public.

Mr. Barrie is a successful man of business as well as a dreamer of dreams; he has at once the second sight of the Scot, and his eye for a bargain. He shows us both qualities in this book. They mix as badly as common water and holy oil.

A National Exhibit

The majority of the recent books are not so individual as these. They are, as a rule, sketches of the different picturesque phases of American life of to-day seen here and there—a kindly Irishwoman in a slum, cowboys, soldiers of fortune, freed plantation slaves, grim New England women, Boer patriots, Doukhobor zealots—whoever and whatever will attract the eye of the public for a moment. It is as though we were invited into a huge photograph gallery, filled with the pictures of notable living folk; heads, half-lengths, full figures. The likenesses are usually a little caricatured, but, as a rule, are done with a vigorous and friendly touch.

One feature in this exhibition cannot be passed over in silence—that is, the number of pictures of that class which in foreign galleries are placed in apartments forbidden to young girls. Most of these sketches of life in its rank and brutal phases are the work of women.

We cannot but wonder as we lay one of these books down, what was the purpose of its writer? Not, of course, to help or instruct the public, and certainly not to amuse it. There is usually not a gleam of humor or fun in these ill-smelling pages. Can it be that the minds of certain unlucky, unfortunate folk are haunted by these unclean thoughts, by a perpetual consciousness of certain facts in life which even the beasts strive to keep out of sight? Do they want to give them to the public in order that they may rid themselves of them—just as they give the offal of their households to the garbage man to carry away?

After all, books of fiction are written, as they are read, to satisfy some temporary mental hunger of a people. If we could read consecutively the popular romances of each century in England we should have at the end a clearer idea of the changes in the character of the English people than any history could give us.

Take Fielding, for example. In his novels are all the unconscious brutality, the grossness which never had learned how to blush, the tenderness, the slavish worship of rank which belonged to the middle-class Englishman under the first Georges. It was a day when Lady Blarney, with her rouge and musk, rubbed shoulders with the holy, simple old Vicar.

Take Sir Walter, a man whose mind was saturated from boyhood with the history and legends of his little country. His one aim in life was to make them real to the outside world, to force it to do homage, as he did, to the chivalry, the high spiritual life in these cattle thieves, with their cast-iron religion, their bogies and their second sight. It was his one errand in life to exploit this thing, to win recognition for Scotland from the world. "Ich kann nicht anders," he might have cried. He gave his message. No country ever owed so much to one man as Scotland to Scott. He brought to life knights and villains, Lowland old wives and Hieland lasses.

The President's Chair

Has been filled twenty times out of twenty-five by men with legal training. President Roosevelt, while never a practicing lawyer, studied law and is thoroughly grounded in it. A man cannot grapple successfully with large affairs without a sure grasp on fundamental law. Not only in politics but in business legal training is a tremendous advantage. Every business man is better equipped for great business undertakings if he is backed by knowledge of the law. The law, as a profession, never offered larger rewards than to-day for men trained to meet the new conditions of the new century. Every young man ambitious for a career at the bar, in public affairs, or in business, should attend a law school, or if that is impossible, should

A "Money-King"

AMONG BOYS

HE IS a "Captain of Industry"—a little "Money-King" among his playmates. In controlling trade he is as shrewd as the money-kings of the "grown-ups." Over $50.00 in PRIZE MONEY alone from THE SATURDAY EVENING POST within three months is his record.

He began by making a clean sweep of his block, getting everybody possible to sign an order directing him to deliver for four successive weeks. Street by street he canvassed his part of town with such success that all his boy friends were excited about it, and wrote to us clamoring to be agents. But Master Duncan had thought this problem all out for himself long before. He figured that we would not be apt to take chances on new boys to compete against him, if he could sell at the rate of 50 copies a week. So he wrote us a letter, requesting control of the whole town—knew he "could sell unassisted all the copies the people would buy"—wanted us to refuse all other boys; said he could "beat all of them put together, anyway," and wound up by inclosing a cash deposit to pay in advance for 50 copies a week for several months, just to show that he "meant business."

We complied with his request to refuse to sell to the other boys. Since then he has sold an average of 100 copies a week for almost a year. His town, lying in the copper country of the upper peninsula of Michigan, has been built four years and has just 750 inhabitants, and he is ten years old.

Any boy can earn money through this plan. NO MONEY REQUIRED TO START. We will furnish ten copies the first week free of charge, to be sold at five cents a copy. You can then send us the wholesale price for as many as you find you can sell the next week. IF YOU WILL TRY IT WE WILL SEND THE COPIES AND EVERYTHING NECESSARY, including A DAINTY LITTLE BOOKLET in which twenty-five out of more than six thousand bright boys tell in their own way just how they have made a success of selling THE SATURDAY EVENING POST. Pictures of the boys—letters telling how they built up a paying business outside of school hours—interesting stories of real business tact.

EVANS, WILKENS & CO., Washington, D. C.

But, being a kindly, modest gentleman as well as a wizard, he presented his men and women to the world with their passions decently clothed.

No truer picture ever was painted than that of Scotland in these books, purblind with bigotry, knightly, rapacious, but always decent.

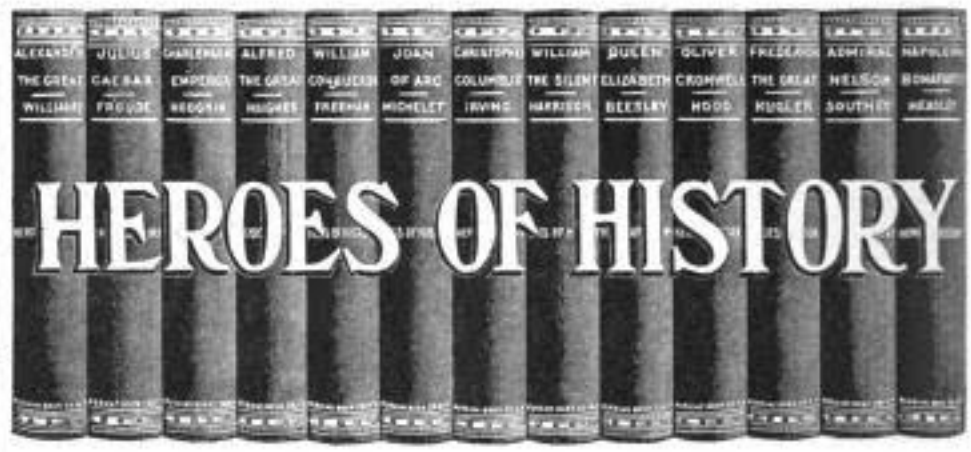
Next to Scott, Anthony Trollope ranks in English literature as the great historical painter of his own age. Trollope, always candid to bluntness, stated in his Autobiography that he was used to write so many pages each day. That was the practice of Byron, of Dickens, of many great masters of English literature. But the modern young literati who write the newspaper reviews, whose ideal author has attacks of inspiration at uncertain periods, when the ichor escapes in whiffs of gusty passion, as in the case of the Delphian oracle, jeer at Trollope and his methodic workaday ways. It is their custom to class him as a poor literary carpenter. In the meanwhile his people remain here in the world, living men and women, to tell the story of their times as no history can do. Whoever wishes to know England in the early Victorian days will learn to love the Duchess, to laugh at Planty Pall, and to take the Archdeacon to his heart of hearts. Barchester is as real a shire to most of us as Devon; the only difference is that we know it better.

We need not go over the roll-call of the great English novelists to show that they all had a like purpose, which was to paint the phase of social life which was most familiar to them.

The curious point worth notice is that few of the modern American novelists have any such aim. The old magicians of fiction called into life real men and women. Once born they did not die. We love or hate Rochester or Becky Sharp or Lady Kew, and gossip about them just as we do about the woman next door. But how many of us have any private opinion concerning the characters in this winter's novels, charming as many of them are? Some of them—notably Mrs. Humphry Ward's books—are bundles of qualities, with not a drop of red blood among them. Or they are lay figures which set forth the author's favorite moral. Or they are a striking tableau vivant meant to illustrate some dramatic phase of our modern life.

Mr. Howells' Beef Dinners

Many years ago, when Mr. Howells drew Silas Lapham, we had hopes that he would give us American characters with the fidelity, if not the power, of Thackeray or Trollope. But the novelist became the champion of realism. He laid down the axiom: No man must paint life except as it actually appears to the naked eye. Unfortunately, Mr. Howells is near-sighted; he has not the eye of the eye. He sees a husband and wife, for example, and can tell us of the cut of their clothes, the size of their joint of beef, and the pitter-patter of the guests who eat it with them. Beneath may lie a tragedy as terrible as that of Vashti and Esther. But he cannot see it. He has given us many pleasing domestic pictures of beef and dinner-tables, and never wearies of scolding other men who discover hidden meanings in the feast.



"There is a dinner-table and beef," he reiterates. "I see nothing but a dinner-table and beef; and, therefore, there is nothing else there."

Mr. Henry James in his earlier work drew three or four American men and women, en silhouette, it is true, but with startling vividness and vitality. Who can forget the hero of The American, or the father with a leech of a daughter in a short tale called Le Pension du Bon Repas? Of late years Mr. James apparently is convinced that his public demand high-flavored dishes and gives them to them. He is making a fatal mistake. One of our shrewdest critics said when Jude the Obscure was published, "The American will not tolerate the literature of the pigsty, and the man who gives it to him insures his own final defeat."

Among the books which are merely photographs of some phase of American life there are many of great power and charm, such as John Fox's glimpses of Kentucky and James Lane Allen's pictures of birds and gardens. His birds and beasts are always of so much higher breeding than his men!

The contribution to the passing literature of the day by our colored fellow-citizens during the last year has been large and has shown much native strength. But why do they follow in the old dusty paths of white romancers?

Their own story is yet to tell. No other is just now so well worth the telling.

A CHALLENGE

COLLIER'S Household Number for March marks the top notch in American magazine making. We challenge you to disprove this statement for 10c. at the nearest news-stand.

This number is American through and through. It has strength, timeliness and a generous dash of humor. The men who wrote for it and drew its pictures command the highest prices known to modern journalism. That is because they are the men for whose latest word the whole reading public waits. A contribution from any one of them would make any number notable; for one number to include them all is to set a new standard of magazine achievement.

James Whitcomb Riley

Tells in a poem how to make the right kind of man out of the right kind of boy.

Richard Harding Davis

Relates, in an amusing "inside story," how he captured the town of Coamo.

"Mr. Dooley"

Writes (exclusively for COLLIER'S) a letter about "The White House Expenses."

Thomas Nelson Page

Discusses very clearly and suggestively a new aspect of the Negro Question.

Charles Dana Gibson

Depicts, in his best drawing for years, "The Greatest Game in the World."

WE WANT YOU TO KNOW HOW GOOD COLLIER'S IS

Send us your name and address and we will mail you (1) a dainty little book, "Charles Dana Gibson: The Man and His Art," which contains reproductions of several Gibson-girl heads and a striking portrait of "Mr. Dooley" as seen by Mr. Gibson; (2) a copy of "The Lion's Mouth," which tells of a very interesting competition for over $4,000 in prizes (freely open to everybody), and a sample copy of a recent issue of Collier's. If you wish a copy of the March Household Number, send ten cents in stamps.

The Connemara Mare

that would have done credit to Othello, received an ovation that confirmed Captain Carteret in his contempt for country audiences. The performance raged to its close in a "cake-walk," to the inspiring strains of Razors a-Flyin' Through de Air, and the curtain fell on what the Enniscar Independent described cryptically as a "tout ensemble à la conversazione that was refreshingly unique."

"Five minutes more and I should have had heat apoplexy!" said Mrs. Carteret, hurling her turban across the clerk's room, "but it all went splendidly! Empty that basin out of the window, somebody, and give me the vaseline. The last time I blacked my face it was covered with red spots for a week afterward because I used soap instead of vaseline!"

Rupert Gunning approached Fanny with an open note in his hand.

"I've had this from your aunt," he said, handing it to her. It was decorated with sooty thumb-marks, to which Fanny's black claw contributed a fresh batch as she took it, but she read it without a smile.

It was to the effect that the heat of the room had been too much for the elder Misses Fitzroy, and they had therefore gone home, but as Mr. Gunning had to pass their gate perhaps he would be kind enough to drive their niece home.

"Oh——" said Fanny, in tones from which dismay was by no means eliminated. "How stupid of Aunt Rachel!"

"I'm afraid there seems no way out of it for you," said Rupert offendedly.

A glimpse of their two wrathful black faces in the glass abruptly checked Fanny's desire to say something crushing. At this juncture she would rather have died than laughed.

Burnt cork is not lightly to be removed at the first essay, and when, half an hour later, Fanny Fitz, with a pale and dirty face, stood under the dismal light of the lamp outside the Town Hall, waiting for Mr. Gunning's trap, she had the pleasure of hearing a woman among the loiterers say compassionately:

"God help her, the crayture! She looks like a servant that be bate out with work!"

Mr. Gunning's new cob stood hearkening with flickering ears to the various commotions of the street—she understood them all perfectly well, but her soul being uplifted by reason of oats, she chose to resent them as impertinences. Having tolerated with difficulty the installment of Miss Fitzroy in the trap, she started with a flourish, and pulled hard until clear of the town and its flaring public-houses. On the open road, with nothing more enlivening than the dark hills, half-seen in the light of the rising moon, she settled down. Rupert turned to his silent companion. He had become aware during the evening that something was wrong, and his own sense of injury was frightened into the background.

"What do you think of my new buy?" he said pacifically; "she's a good goer, isn't she?"

"Very," replied Fanny.

Silence again reigned. One or two further attempts at conversation met with equal discouragement. The miles passed by. At length, as the mare slackened to walk up a long hill, Rupert said with a voice that had the shake of pent-up injury:

"I've been wondering what I've done to be put into Coventry like this!"

"I thought you probably wouldn't care to speak to me!" was Fanny's astonishing reply, delivered in tones of ice.

"I!" he stammered, "not care to speak to you! You ought to know——"

"Yes, indeed, I do know!" broke in Fanny, passing from the frigid to the torrid zone with characteristic speed, "I know what a failure your horse-dealing at the Dublin Show was! I've heard how you bought my mare and had her shot the same night, because you wouldn't take the trouble even to go and look at her after the poor little thing was hurt! Oh! I can't bear even to think of it!"

Rupert Gunning remained abjectly and dumfoundedly silent.

"And then," continued Fanny, whirling on to the final point of her indictment, "you pretended to Captain Carteret and me that the horse you had bought was 'a common

THE PUBLISHERS believe that in the publication of "Modern Eloquence" they are adding something of value to the world's literature—a work that traverses entirely new fields. For the first time, the best After-Dinner Speeches, Lectures, Addresses and Anecdotes of the most brilliant men of the present generation (the past fifty years) have been gathered together.

A work on oratory has meant, heretofore, a musty collection of time-worn speeches, some of them good, but all of them to be found in divers similar collections. The present Library is as different from these as its distinguished Editor-in-Chief was different from other men. Former Speaker Thomas B. Reed, with the assistance of an able staff, succeeded in compiling a work on new and original lines—a work eminently needful to every library, public or private,—as the most cursory examination of its purpose and scope will testify.

PURPOSE AND SCOPE

The purpose underlying the Library of Modern Eloquence was to collect and publish in permanent form the best spoken thought of recent times; but nothing has been included save what is replete with genuine literary value and undoubted popular interest. No excerpts or mutilated portions of speeches have been admitted. Texts have been given in full, since incomplete readings work an injustice to both author and reader.

This work is without a precedent. It has neither predecessor nor competitor. It is sole occupant of a new field. Although the speeches are not all new in themselves, yet, as here given to the public, they are literally treasure-trove. They constitute an important body of Nineteenth Century literature, heretofore inaccessible and hidden in widely separated places.

No experiments have been tried. Whatever is included is of proved value and interest. Speeches which have been flashed across a continent; lectures which have been repeated with ever-renewed fervor; addresses which have brought fame to the speaker and have marked an epoch in history—these have been collected for the first time after months of laborious effort.

Appended to this collection and reënforcing its purpose to entertain, will be found a series of witticisms, anecdotes, and eloquent sayings, making the work in effect a cyclopedia of later oratory.

After-Dinner Speeches—Vols. I, II and III

MANY of the brightest, wittiest, wisest sayings of our time have been engendered amid the incense of fragrant Havanas and the aroma of café noir. There is something particularly inspiring in a group of congenial men who are in the best of humor, from having just dined, and who settle back comfortably in their chairs to listen to some ethical, scientific, literary, or, perhaps, satirical discourse from a speaker of national repute.

Such a speaker must be entertaining. The nature of the occasion demands that quality. He must be brief and to the point. While his speech may have the bright ring of an impromptu effort, the best examples are rarely haphazard. It has been remarked that Emerson put into an after-dinner speech the best philosophy of a long essay. Joseph H. Choate, Mark Twain, Chauncey M. Depew, and Charles Dickens have established international reputations in this special field.

Lectures—Vols. IV, V and VI

A LECTURE is kneaded, twisted, and revamped by frequent repetition till it becomes a model of eloquence. Many of the noblest flights of oratory must be credited to the lecturers of this and other countries. Their subjects have cost them weeks and months in the preparation; they have been tried by the fire of public ordeal.

In a book, the public will endure, though not graciously, a mass of truthful, even though unenlivened, sentiment. In a lecture, brightness is the saving grace. Should a man produce a great lecture he has, of sheer necessity, created literature worthy to endure.

Famous Addresses—Vols. VII, VIII and IX

THIS department includes Literary, Scientific, and Commemorative Addresses and Eulogies. The authors represented are renowned orators, men whose authority to treat of their subjects is as unquestioned as is their power to speak with ability.

The editorial committee have aimed to give only those speeches that would "read well"—that would be attractive from both charm of style and force of thought. Comparatively recent as is the history of America, its literature is already teeming with noteworthy examples. The patriotic American as well as the litterateur will be inspired by and delighted with these "Occasional Addresses."

Anecdotes—Vol. X

FOR the man desirous of becoming a public speaker, or for him who is called upon at short notice to respond to a toast, "Modern Eloquence" will prove an ever-present helper. To such persons the last section will especially commend itself; it includes several hundred pages of anecdotes, reminiscences, and repartee. A well-timed story is often the salvation of a speech; and here such stories may be found in the widest possible variety—and of the highest possible quality.

brute,' a cob for carting, and you said the other night that you had made a fool of yourself over it! I didn't know then all about it, but I do now. Captain Carteret heard about it from the dealer in Dublin. Even the dealer said it was a pity you hadn't given the mare a chance!"

"It's all perfectly true," said Rupert in a low voice.

A soft answer, so far from turning away wrath, frequently inflames it.

"Then I think there's no more to be said!" said Fanny hotly.

There was silence. They had reached the top of the hill and the gray mare began to trot.

"Well, there's just one thing I should like to say," said Rupert awkwardly, his breath coming very short; "I couldn't help everything going wrong about the mare. It was just my bad luck. I only bought her to please you. They told me she couldn't get right after the accident. What was the good of my going to look at her? I wanted to cross in the boat with you. Whatever I did I did for you. I would do anything in the world for you——"

It was at this crucial moment that there arose suddenly from the dim gray road in front of them a slightly grayer shadow, a shadow that limped amid the clanking of chains. The Connemara mare, now masquerading as a County Cork cob, asked for nothing better. If it were a ghost she was legitimately entitled to flee from it; if, as was indeed the case, it was a donkey, she made a point of shying at donkeys. She realized that, by a singular stroke of good fortune, the reins were lying in loops on her back.

A snort, a sideways bound, a couple of gleeful kicks on the dashboard, and she was away at full gallop, with one rein under her tail and a pleasant open road before her.

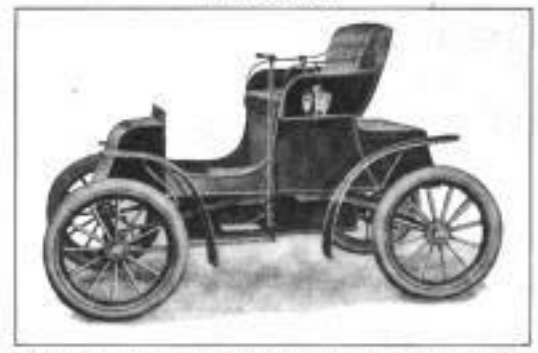
"It's all right!" said Rupert, recovering his balance by a hairbreadth, and feeling in his heart that it was all wrong, "the Craffroe Hill will stop her. Hold on to the rail."

Fanny said nothing. It was, indeed, all that she could do to keep her seat in the trap, with which the rushing road was playing cup and ball; she was, besides, not one of the people who are conversational in emergencies. When an animal, as active and artful as the Connemara mare, is going at some twenty miles an hour, with one of the reins under its tail, endeavors to detach the rein are not much avail, and when the tail is still tender from recent docking, they are a good deal worse than useless. Having twice nearly fallen on his head, Rupert abandoned the attempt and prayed for the long, stiff ascent of the Craffroe Hill.

It came swiftly out of the gray moonlight. At its foot another road forked to the right, instead of facing the hill that led to home and stable, the mare swung into the side road, with one wheel up on the grass, and the cushions slipping from the seat, and Rupert just saving the situation with the left rein that remained to him, said to himself that they were in for a bad business.

For a mile they swung and clattered along it, with the wind striking and splitting against their faces like a cold and tearing stream of water; a light wavered and disappeared across the pallid fields to the left, a group of starveling trees on a hill slid up into the skyline behind it, and at last it seemed as if some touch of self-control, some suggestion of having had enough of the joke, was shortening the mare's grasping stride. The trap pitched more than ever as she came up into the shafts and back into her harness; she twisted suddenly to the left into a narrow lane, cleared the corner by an impossible fluke, and Fanny Fitz was hurled ignominiously on to Rupert Gunning's lap. Long briars and twigs struck them from either side, the trap bumped in craggy ruts and slashed through wide puddles, then reeled irretrievably over a heap of stones and tilted against the low bank to the right.

Without any exact knowledge of how she got there, Fanny found herself on her hands and knees in a clump of bracken on top of the bank; Rupert was already picking himself out of rugs and other jetsam in the field below her, and the mare was proceeding up the lane at a disorderly trot, having jerked the trap on to its legs again from its reclining position.



Fanny was lifted down into the lane; she told him that she was not hurt, but her knees shook, her hands trembled, and the arm that was round her tightened its clasp in silence. When a man is strongly moved by tenderness and anxiety and relief he can say little to make it known; he need not—it is known beyond all telling by the one other person whom it concerns. She felt suddenly that she was safe, that his heart was torn for her sake, and that the tension of the last ten minutes had been great. It went through her with a pang, and her head swayed against his arm. In a moment she felt his lips on her hair, on her temple, and the oldest, the most familiar of all words of endearment was spoken at her ear. She recovered herself, but in a new world. She tried to walk on up the lane, but stumbled in the deep ruts and found the supporting arm again ready at need. She did not resist it.

A shrill neigh arose in front of them. The mare had pulled up at a closed gate and was apparently apostrophizing some low farm buildings beyond it. A dog barked hysterically, the door of a cowshed burst open, and a man came out with a lantern.

"Oh, I know now where we are!" cried Fanny wildly; "it's Johnny Connolly's! Oh, Johnny, Johnny Connolly, we've been run away with!"

"For the Lorrud's sake!" responded Johnny Connolly, standing stock-still in his amazement, "is that Miss Fanny?"

"Get hold of the mare," shouted Rupert, "or she'll jump the gate!"

Johnny Connolly advanced, still calling his astonishment, and the mare uttered a low but vehement neigh.

"Ye've deshtroyed Miss Fanny! And Mr. Gunning, the Lord save us! Ye've killed the two o' ye! What happened ye at all? Woa gerrl, woa gerrlie! Ye'd say she knew me, the crayture." The mare was rubbing her dripping face and neck against the farmer's shoulder with hoarse whispering snorts of recognition and pleasure. He held his lantern high to look at her.

"Musha, why wouldn't she know me!" he roared; "sure it's yer own mare, Miss Fanny! 'Tis the Connemara mare I thrained for ye! And may the divil sweep and roast thim that has it told through all the counthry that she was killed!"

The Autobiography of a Beggar

"Git some one ter raise up de tent an' charge a dollar," yells Foxy, dreadful excited. "Git 'er up!"

"It can't be done," yells Crutch.

"Dat rascul ef a circus man spiled our bizness," yells One-armed Jake, "him bein' jealous ef us an' sickin' de Honoluler Queen on de Honoluler King." An' Jake cracks de circus man one wid his good arm an' one wid his wood arm, an' de crowd pitches in ter pull 'em apart, an' I don't know what would have happened only a crowd ef circus peepul comes over de bridge ter help deir side out, fer it was gittin' most terribul.

All I kin rimimber now is dat when some one got orff meh chest an' quit poundin' meh head I looked up an' seen de Honoluler King an' de Honoluler Queen a-goin' home arm in arm, de best friends in all de world, de same ez ef dey had niver been king er queen at all, but jist plain husband an' wife all deir lives.

An' I hollers ter Foxy quick an' tells him what I seen, an' he says, "Ater 'em quick, Mollbuzzer. Ater 'em! We kin git both ef 'em ter travel aroun' wid us under one tent, an' we kin have de best show in de countree. De Honoluler Queen is better en a tiger er a elerphunt. 'Stead ef dancin' we kin let 'em fight. Ater 'em quick, Mollbuzzer."

An' I scoots ater 'em, Foxy jist a little bit ahint meh yellin', "Coax him, Mollbuzzer, coax him; promise him a red silk tent an' a yaller banjo, an' her a diamond bracelet an' a yaller handkerchief."

An' in meh excitemint I didn't notice dat Foxy kep' care ter keep ahint meh an' coax meh ter coax dem, fer when I ketched de Honoluler King he jist grabs meh by de neck an' he says, "Dere's de man what cut meh pants orff an' painted meh red."

"Dat's de man, is it!" yells de Honoluler Queen, a-lookin' at meh sharp; "dat's de same man what called meh names yisterday."

"I got a diamond tent an' a yaller diamond," I started fer ter explain, but dey wouldn't even wait ter hear what I had ter give 'em, but bein' in a hurry he jist took all de coin what I had away from meh, sayin' it was his'n, anyway.

De more I thinks ef de circus bizness, Mr. Anterpolergist, de more I thinks ef Mr. P. T. Barnum, fer how he could keep elerphunts an' tigers an' Honoluler Queens goin' 'round de same ring an' not git hurt bisself is a mysteree ter meh. Maybe he wore Injee-rubber clothes an' had a peculiar kind ef skin.

How a College Education Was Paid For

A young man in a small town in Western New York writes:

"The commission on the order for subscriptions which I am sending to you to-day completes the amount necessary to pay for my last year at college. I can devote my spare time from now until Fall to laying up something for the future. Perhaps you do not know just what THE POST has done for me. Several months ago my father died, leaving only sufficient money to support my mother and sister. My course in medicine was paid for until the end of this term, but one more year was necessary for me to finish my course. I determined to accomplish this by my own efforts and I have now done it. The commission on to-day's order, together with what I earned on those previously sent, gives me sufficient money to pay my tuition and incidentals for next term, at the end of which I can hang out my sign, 'M. D.'"

What this young man has done in the way of earning money is being accomplished by hundreds of other young people throughout the country. THE SATURDAY EVENING POST is willing to appoint an agent in every town to look after its subscription business, and any young man or young woman can, through this plan, earn sufficient money either to carry out some cherished project or to comfortably support himself.

If you are interested in learning the details, send a line addressed to THE POST'S Circulation Bureau and full information will be sent.

No train in America is more brilliantly lighted than the

Golden State Limited

Electric lights are everywhere—in the roofs, on the sides of the cars, in the berths. This last feature is worthy of special note, for it not only enables one to undress in comfort, but also, in case one wishes, to read in bed. The berth lights are conveniently placed and can be turned on and off at pleasure.

The Golden State Limited leaves Chicago daily via the El Paso-Rock Island route. Less than three days to Los Angeles. Thro' cars to Santa Barbara and San Francisco. Compartment and standard sleepers; dining, library, and observation cars. Lowest altitudes of any line across the continent. $18 MADE TO YOUR MEASURE $18

Let Us Make It For You

This two-button double breasted sack suit is one of the season's popular styles. It is individual—neat—dressy. You can have it tailored just the way you want it, and just as sure to please you as if you were right here in person in our fashionable Michigan Boulevard tailoring house. We guarantee this; the risk is all ours—not yours. We have been tailoring for so many years—making garments strictly to measure—that we have mastered the innumerable little niceties that enter into what is termed correct dress.

Fabric Samples Free

There's no logic in paying $25 for a suit that you ought to get, made to your measure, for $18. Write us to-day for samples, style booklet No. 18 and measurement blank; they are free for the asking—and if you order a suit you need not pay us for it until we have sent it to you and you are satisfied with it. Spring overcoats? Yes, certainly—beautifully made to your measure at least 33⅓—possibly 50—per cent. lower in price than you are in the habit of paying for equally good tailoring.

Fabrics sampled herewith may be described as follows:

Goods 2923—Fancy Striped Worsted; colorings, green, white and red, dark blue background.

Goods 2960—Imported Fancy Double and Twist Worsted; colorings, red, green and white, gray mixed background.

Goods 2948—Fancy Blue Checked Worsted; colorings, red and green mixed.

Goods 2990—Fancy Striped Worsted; colorings, green and white mixed, gray mixed background.

Dealers everywhere take measures for Royal Tailoring; if there's one in your town call on him; otherwise write us direct. Our stock comprises over 1000 latest patterns. Suits or overcoats to measure $12 and up; trousers $3.50 to $10. A Royal man-tailored ladies' skirt made to measure at $5, is the biggest measure of full value that we know anything about.

We make all kinds of uniforms, too.

"LEST WE FORGET"

True respect for our departed loved ones demands that we erect ARTISTIC and ENDURING MEMORIALS. Marble has proved an unfortunate failure. Moss-grown, broken and tumbled-down slabs appear everywhere. Some cemeteries now prohibit marble entirely. Granite, too, soon gets discolored, moss-grown, cracks, crumbles and decays. Besides, it is very expensive.

WHITE BRONZE MONUMENTS are cheaper and Infinitely Better. They are strictly everlasting. Rust, corrosion and moss-growth are IMPOSSIBILITIES. They CANNOT crumble from the action of frost.

WHITE BRONZE is far more artistic and expressive than any stone. Then why not investigate it? It has been on the market for over twenty-five years and is an established success. It has been adopted for more than a hundred public monuments and by thousands of delighted individuals in all parts of the country. Many granite-dealers have used White Bronze in preference to granite for their own burial plots.

We have hundreds of beautiful designs at prices from $4 to $4,000. We deal direct and deliver everywhere. Distance is no obstacle. Write us at once for designs and information if you are interested. It costs you nothing and puts you under no obligations whatever. Address

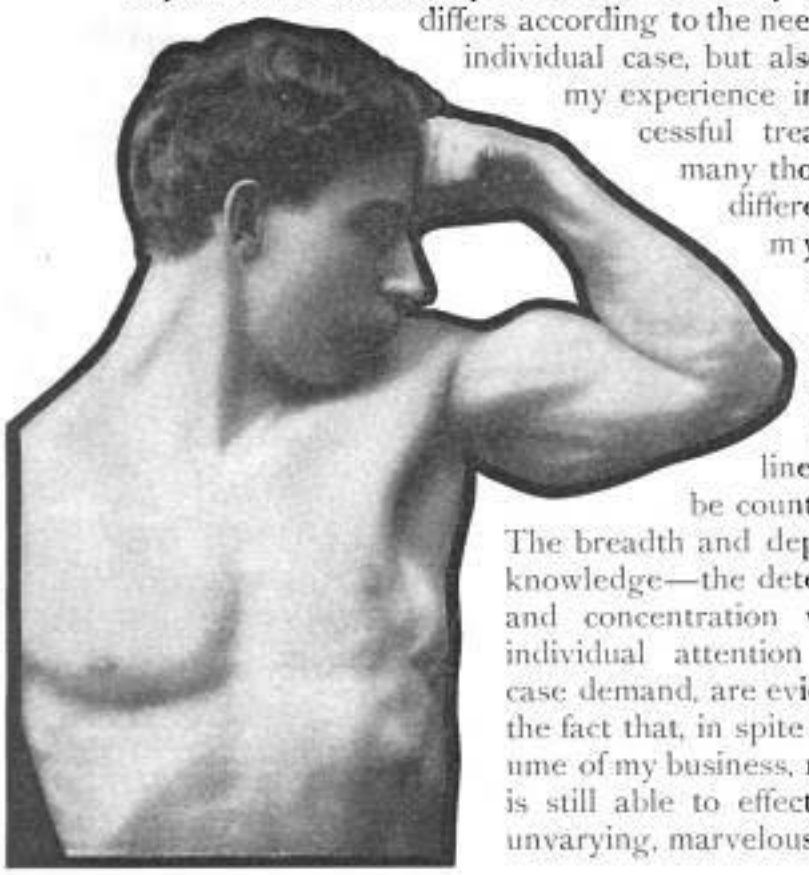
One cent, now—Afterward Years of health and strength

A postal asking about my system, now, will not only save dollars in doctors' bills, but also save at least half of my charge.

I Propose to More than Double My Fee.

My system is built around Alois P. Swoboda. It depends upon me and my intimate knowledge of human ailments and their treatment. There is a limit to my personal effort. I cannot give individual attention to more than a limited number of pupils.

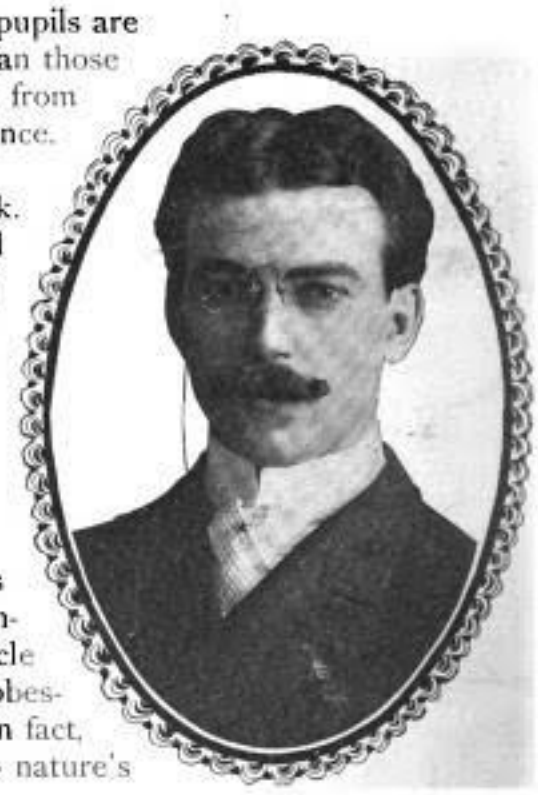
I must either restrict the number of my pupils or neglect some of them.



I will not neglect a pupil—I certainly have no intention of reducing my income; hence the increase.

My system has always been worth more than twice the amount I have charged and many times as much as any other system.

Out of a spirit of fairness to those to whom I have already stated my fee, I make this public announcement, so that they may either enroll themselves at once, or have no complaint at the future increase.



I cannot regard great swelling muscles, or the ability to snap chains and lift horses, or even a knowledge of the Marquis of Queensbury rules, as qualifying a man to keep in repair the most delicate of all organisms, the human system.

I am glad when a thinker begins to investigate the various systems for attaining physical excellence, for when a thinking man investigates, MY system is invariably selected. There is no other like it. It is obviously impossible to imitate my instruction, not only because it differs according to the needs of each individual case, but also because my experience in the successful treatment of many thousands of different cases, my years of investigation and study along this particular line, cannot be counterfeited.

The breadth and depth of this knowledge—the determination and concentration which my individual attention to each case demand, are evidenced by the fact that, in spite of the volume of my business, my system is still able to effect the same unvarying, marvelous results.

My instructions to my pupils are clearer and more effective than those of others because I speak from years of successful experience. I KNOW.

There is no guesswork.

Scientific physiological exercise is NOT a fad. Fads do not cure hopeless cases of indigestion, dyspepsia, neurasthenia, insomnia and rheumatism, liver trouble and nervous diseases of every description, etc.

My system not only does this, but it rounds out the ungraceful form, puts muscle where it is needed, reduces obesity, purifies the blood, and, in fact, fits man, woman or child to nature's perfect mould.

It is right living in condensed form. By it the evil effects of wrong living are neutralized and a splendid condition of robust mental and physical health assured.

This is done without distasteful dieting and without discomfort of any nature. It makes men strong, alert and graceful. It gives women beauty of figure and grace of carriage, with a clear skin, bright eyes and rosy cheeks.

My system is taught by mail only and with perfect success, requires no apparatus whatever and but a few minutes' time in your own room just before retiring, and it is the only one which does not overtax the heart.

There is no wasted effort, no wasted time, the instruction is entirely individual and will fit the exact requirements of YOUR CASE. I don't ask you to take my word for this; judge me by my works—they speak louder than words. Below is the unsolicited testimony of a man who knows through personal experience what the Swoboda system will do. This man is one of thousands. He has no earthly interest in me or my system beyond what it has done for him.

Here is a letter received from a prominent merchant of Texas. It tells an interesting Story, because it's True.

Mr. Alois P. Swoboda, 57 Washington St., Chicago, Ills. San Antonio, Texas, Aug. 15, 1902.

My Dear Sir:—It is a pleasure to testify to the merits and the benefits to be derived from your system of physiological exercises. Sixteen years of close application to my business has been a severe strain on my constitution. My physician recommended a complete rest for a long period. The benefits received from your system in a few months have been wonderful. My endurance seems unlimited, my appetite has increased enormously with no difficulty in assimilating and digesting food consumed. My reserve force, which is so essential to every business man, makes me feel that nothing is impossible. My capacity, both physically and mentally, is increasing daily. Your system of exercises is looked forward to, with pleasure, daily. Wishing you deserved success, I am, Yours very sincerely, (Signed) P. MAUREAUX.

If you want the names and addresses of others for personal investigation, I will gladly furnish them.

I shall be pleased to send you free valuable information and detailed outline of my system, its principles and effects, upon application. This information, which I furnish free, is very interesting and cannot be secured elsewhere at any price. Write at once.

HOT WATER HEATED for $273

THE Andrews System of Hot Water Heating, perfected by 15 years of practical heating experience in Minnesota's rigorous climate, insures a warm house in extremest cold, also low fuel consumption in mild weather. Burns soft coal or hard; is easy to operate and keep in order. Its high-grade steel boiler is easily cleaned, durable and constructed upon lines of best engineering practice. Piping and radiation are ample in every respect, making a perfectly balanced job.

The Andrews Mail Order Method gives the purchaser the economy of factory production, all material being completed, the pipe cut ready to be erected by any carpenter or mechanic, avoids all chance of vexatious mistakes by preparing accurate plans and bills of materials, subject to owner's approval before contract is made.

The material is shipped from Minneapolis or Branch in Buffalo, N. Y., and radiators (70 per cent. of the weight) from nearest distributing point.

This, mind you, at a time of year when the thermometer at home is 'way below zero and the newspapers are filled with details of the "greatest snow-storm in years."

THE BRAIN TRUST

The Oligarchy that Rules the Country

By William Allen White

SENATOR BEVERIDGE OF INDIANA

SENATOR PLATT OF CONNECTICUT

A GREAT editor has been described as a man who knows where the devil is going to break out next, and who has a reporter on the spot to tell about it. If this definition is correct, the fact is significant that more reporters hang up their overcoats in the press gallery of the United States Senate than in any other news centre in the world. During the three or four years last past there has been a gradual thinning out of reporters in the press gallery of the House of Representatives, and now it is virtually deserted. But the Senate press gallery lobby is crowded. Which fact seems to indicate that the real power in the legislative branch of the American Government has passed from the House to the Senate. Yet it is not well to be cock-sure. For there is always a crowd about the doors of the House; the lobby before the door of the House Committee on Ways and Means is always thronged, and the patter of hurrying feet on the tiled corridors of that part of the Capitol where even the minor committees of the House are found is never silent during the working-day. With people who do things and have real, though often trivial, business, the House is still popular. The Senate is not so. And yet newspaper men, who generally sense things accurately, avoid the House and court the Senate. The conditions are anomalous. The explanation is this: In the House news is made under cover, in committees, by machine, as it were; measures that have been incubating for years, burst suddenly through their shells in the House, without warning, without discussion, and hurry to their passage. Not a dozen members know what bills are coming, outside of the committeemen who bring these bills in full-fledged. Debate is smothered in the House, and measures go to a vote on party lines. There is no news element in the cut and dried, and reporters avoid it. But in the Senate, because debate is unlimited, the real merits of the measure in question will be discussed, and there reporters go for the meat of the matter. It was supposed by the makers of the Constitution that the House would initiate legislation and that the Senate would have merely a veto power on the House's bills. The situation now seems to be this: The House winnows out the chaff from among the many bills introduced, and hands them up for the Senate to formulate, discuss and pass; then voting upon reports of conference committees, after the Senate has hammered a bill into a prospective law, the House has the veto on the Senate's initiative.

Thus it happens that, the House being no longer a deliberative body, the strong men of the House are leaving it for the Senate. The great national careers of the eighties and nineties that were made in Congress at all were made in the House. Blaine, McKinley and Reed grew famous and powerful in the House. Harrison served a term in the Senate, but that term did not add much lustre to his name. The Senate in those days was considered an old gentlemen's home, a kind of male embroidery club, where elderly men of means could enjoy their afternoon snoozes while their wives and daughters were dressing for dinner. So it happens that the Senate, in its dawning day of power, is filled with rich old snoozers, and eight men, only two of whom are more than well-to-do, run things in the Senate as though they had a fee-simple title to it. These eight men often are referred to as the Senate Brain Trust. They are Aldrich, of Rhode Island; Hanna, of Ohio; Platt, of Connecticut; Lodge, of Massachusetts; Hale and Frye, of Maine; Allison, of Iowa; and Spooner, of Wisconsin. These men, so far as the legislative branch of this Government goes in any affair, are the Republican party. They can unite and force the House of Representatives into any position they would insist on; for they are fair men whose judgment is reliable; and if they would join in making a request or a suggestion to the President of the United States to-day, even though his own judgment might point in another direction than theirs, he would hesitate a long time before following it on anything but a moral issue. These men are as close, taken as a group, to President Roosevelt as his Cabinet is, similarly considered. He consults them freely, and, so much as a man may do in simple dignity, he shares some of the impersonal responsibilities of his office with them. The brain trust is not a good name for these men; rather they might be called the official keepers of the National conscience.

No better preliminary work may be done, in considering the Senate and its powers and tendencies, than to look at these men briefly who control the Senate. In the first place it may be noted that five out of the eight of them are Eastern men; the Senate is dominated by the East as the House is by the West; and not merely is the majority of the Senate leaders composed of Easterners, but New Englanders — Yankees of the purest strain. Each of the eight has received some sort of a college education. Six of them, Lodge, Frye, Hale, Spooner, Platt and Allison, were trained as lawyers. There are three practical politicians in the group — Hanna, Aldrich and Lodge. Any of the others would be helpless in the upper corridors of a hotel during a hot political fight. Two of them are accounted rich — Hanna and Aldrich; the others are well-to-do American gentlemen passing middle age, who have no reason to fear want in their declining years. Excepting the three men who live west of the Alleghenies, where every reëlection to the Senate is a fight with the wolves, the Senate leaders may expect to stay in the Senate during the rest of their natural lives. They have to all intents a life tenure on their offices. They may follow the dictates of their consciences as closely as a Federal judge may without considering the caprices of the people at the polls. In the New England group there isn't a man who might not oppose his party time and again, even abuse and bullyrag his party with impunity. This liberality of action gives the East its power, and until the West takes its lariat off its members and gives them personal elbow-room the West will be represented in the Senate by nobodies. The very fact that Hanna by the crass power of personality can drag his State after him, and that Spooner by sheer intellect can command his State, and that tradition in Iowa compels Allison's reelection, gives these three men much of their strength. No State that sends a slave to the Senate, who has to cringe to public sentiment, need expect to be represented there by a man. This much, then, is seen of the group of Senate leaders: that they are trained minds and free men. Men of that type are likely to be honest; for a good head soon learns to give up the luxury of a bad heart. It is well known of men that, in all the relations of life — in business, in politics, and in the more intimate social relations — these Senate leaders are true and square. There is not a crooked stick among them. But whatever else may be said of the Senate as it now exists it will not tolerate a scoundrel among its leaders. The surest road to obscurity in the Senate is the broad and devious one.

Now the Senate and the House differ widely in this: that in the House after the thirty foremost men are named the others are utterly unknown. In the Senate when the eight foremost men are named there are twice as many other men who narrowly escape being in the first class. Among these men are every Senator from New England and the Senators from Michigan, Indiana, Nevada, Missouri, and Senators Foraker, Quarles, Quay, Bailey, Blackburn, Dolliver, Elkins, Cullom, Morgan, Nelson, Warren, and two or three others. By a turn of the wheel of fortune any of these men in the second class may be thrown into the first class, provided always that he is reasonably decent, and just a little more honest than his times. Indeed, so far as the rules of the Senate are concerned, a man may rise from the level of the Senate to prominence at his will. There is absolutely free play for every Senator under the Senate rules. Debate is unlimited.

The machine, though it exists, is submerged, and the individual seems unhampered in his action before the Senate. Theoretically, every Senator is a leader. Yet two-thirds of the membership of the Senate is as ignorant of what is really going on, and is as ineffective in getting things done, and is as totally without knowledge of how to direct its power as the majority in the House of Representatives is under the strangling cloture rule. Nothing in this American Government shows so clearly how little laws and rules and restrictions have to do with the condition of men, and how much character does have to do, as the comparison between the rules of the Senate and those of the House, and the similarity of the results in the matter of leadership. Character is the only thing among men that makes things move.

The Senator's Possible Power for Evil

IT MAY be shown how under the rules of the Senate the individual possesses dangerous power. It may be demonstrated clearly that one man, standing on his rights as a Senator to debate a measure till he is convinced of his error, may prevent the passage of every bit of legislation before the Congress for six years—even the appropriation bills. There is no doubt that under the law and the rules he can do this, if the Senate does not change its rules in the mean time. It may be shown how a Senator under the present system of distributing the patronage may tie the hands of the President by refusing, for instance, to confirm any Presidential appointee for United States Marshal in the Senator's State who will not execute the laws as the Senator reads them rather than as the President wishes them executed. The possible power for evil of any Senator is to-day nearly as much as the possible power for evil of a President, provided a Senator cares to be brazen, and a President would be brazen also, and not seek cover. The power of the Senate for good or bad has been set forth ably by Mr. Henry Loomis Nelson recently. He showed how the Constitution places the appointing power in the matter of administrative offices under the Government with the President and the veto power with the Senate, and how the growth of the party system has reversed this, so that to-day Senators appoint all these officers, and the President vetoes their appointments—when he must do so—and that his desire to veto Senatorial appointments is weakened by the fact that the Senate, having power to confirm other appointments than the one immediately under consideration, may keep out of office every good and efficient man who is near the President's heart, including prospective members of his Cabinet. One may go even a step further and prove that in many States the Senator is the political boss, or office broker. In these States his power to control important Federal offices, and his vote on the confirmation of even minor Federal officers in his State has made members of Congress from his State his henchmen, and has put the State administration under his hands. There is no question about the facts here. In theory it is possible for a Senator to exercise the power of an absolute monarch in his State, and to throttle the Government of the Nation so long as he continues in office. But no such thing was ever done, nor ever will be done. No matter what horrible dragons we may carve out of the wood of possibility they will not really and truly bite; they lack one thing: life. And in reckoning the danger from rules and customs and laws we should not fail to reckon with life. It is not the things in this life that may or might happen that should engage our precautions. It is the things that do happen. There are certain recurring phenomena of existence which the race has come to understand; this understanding is coined into current proverbs: "The wicked flee when no man pursueth." Evil is a coward. In the Senate of the United States, whatever is done is done openly. Everything is subject to amendment and debate. The man who would do all these terrible things with which we are threatened by the power of the Senate must do them in broad daylight. Good men and great are scarce, Heaven knows; but bad men and great are still scarcer; only one character in history is bad and great enough to do any of these dangerous things which American Senators might do, and he is supposed to be in chains and not a possible Senatorial candidate.

SENATOR ALDRICH OF RHODE ISLAND

That some Senators do sometimes use their power villainously is, of course, true. One may even go further and say that, being human, it is probable that once in a while every Senator, however good, uses his power badly. But being representative American citizens, and being in the Senate because they are thoroughly representative, these Senators are going to act largely as the average man acts, and during a day, or a month, or a year the balance of good done by any Senator is going to oversum the small amount of evil he does. Generally the evil will be done thoughtlessly, whereas the good will come from the conscious effort to help the world along which is planted in every sane heart. But suppose a man is deliberately bad; suppose he skates as near the edge of the ice of good behavior as possible; suppose he is a moral degenerate and should happen to get into the Senate; what then? What checks are there on him?

Apparently none, but really a score. The first is self-preservation: the desire for reëlection. Putting that away, there is the common-sense of decency among the other Senators which would smother Senatorial courtesy and all its brood the moment they threatened any real danger to public welfare. But barring the sense of decency of his associates, there is the crushing power of the party machine, which, though a Senator or a group of them may control its levers and pulleys and cogs, gets its real power from the members of the party in the wards and precincts of the land. The man who would dare violate that party sense would be ground to pieces. They would all come out the same kind of sausage. The moral sense of this Republic grinds exceeding fine. And the moral sense of the people will back a man up, standing alone, just as it will grind him up, standing alone. Witness Beveridge. There is no doubt but that for six weeks a working majority of the Senate favored the admission of four Territories into the Union. During that time a majority of the people did not favor this measure. Senator Beveridge had charge of the fight against the Statehood bill that favored the admission of four States. The Senate was against him. Probably the people were with him. Then began the longest continuous filibustering fight ever made in the history of the Senate. To many outsiders it looked as though Quay was doing the filibustering. He was doing nothing of the kind. He was merely insisting day by day on a vote on the Statehood bill, and the Beveridge people, who knew the majority in the Senate was against them, would not let the matter come to a vote, and kept exercising the Senatorial right to debate the question indefinitely. Now, if Beveridge had been advocating a proposition distinctly immoral or had been opposing a proposition that stood for a great moral issue, he would have been withered by a flood of public wrath, instead of getting the mild scorching that came from a few Western papers. The beet-sugar Senators a year ago were kept jumping like dancing turkeys while they opposed a moral issue and were glad enough to announce their conversion to the Cuban reciprocity idea when Congress convened in December. Theoretically, the Senate is not near the people; it was devised as a long-term body which should be somewhat removed from popular waves of emotion and of prejudice. When these are wrong, the Senate, by some inscrutable means, withstands them. But when a wave of popular feeling is a moral wave the Senate is more sensitive to it than the House; for the men in the Senate are wiser than those in the House, and "the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom."

Where Gratitude Comes In

AND now, bearing all these things in mind, remembering that whatever gorgons lie in wait the Republic is not in the slightest danger, it may be well to consider briefly the questionable powers of the Senate. These are mostly powers of patronage. For while the House and the people are checks on the lawmaking powers of the Senate majority, the general conduct of the Senator, as has just been shown, cannot go far astray. But in patronage the Senator has much unhampered power. Gratitude is the basis of many good actions. When a Federal officer knows that a Senator—or a Representative, if he be high in authority—desires a thing done about which the public seems to have no feeling well defined, if the Senator or the Representative has that Federal officer under substantial obligations of a political nature, the thing will probably be done—provided the officer next above doesn't find it out.

Probably not ten district attorneys in the United States would refuse the request of the Senator who gave them their offices to dismiss a suit against any minor offender—if the district attorney could do so without attracting the attention of the Attorney-General of the United States.

The same thing is equally true of marshals and revenue collectors and land officers.

The responsibility for executing the laws is divided between the law-making branch of the Government and the executive. This is, of course, bad, because the blame falls not on the Senators when officers are derelict, but upon the executive branch. The thing is extra-constitutional and pernicious. But it is not a cause for revolution nor for serious alarm. In the nature of things it will correct itself before it gets too bad. So long as the people are clean the Government will be clean. And these practices, bad as they are, are really no worse than the sharp practices of business and the tricks of all trades, which pass current among the people for acumen and commendable keenness. It is easy to call the thing smart in one's own business that one scorns as crooked in another man's business! And the irregular practices of some of the Senators—not all, nor by any means a majority—represent the average moral lapses of the average man in his own affairs. These are, of course, reprehensible and should not be condoned; but on the other hand, they should not cause any one to lose faith in either his God or his country.

SENATOR FRYE OF MAINE

A Fair Judgment of the Senate

THE Senate should be judged not by its faults nor by its virtues, but by the balance between them. It should be judged as a man is judged, not for this one good thing nor that other bad thing, but on the whole and by and large. "By their fruits ye shall know them." And under this test, taking the good and the bad, rejecting nothing, the Senate stands well. On the whole, the work of the Senate at the session last past has been good work. It may have omitted to do certain things which it should have done; but in legislation that is a small fault. Generally speaking, there are laws enough, and the failure to make one or two more is rarely serious. The important question to put is whether or not the things done were well done. If that question may be answered without apology, the result is good. And there is really nothing to blush for in the work of the Senate at this session. The bills which the Senate has helped to make laws were not all that many people desired. But they were equitable compromises between opposing extremes. All legislation is compromise. During the last half of the nineteenth century the Congress of the nation became little more than a clearing-house of opposing interests. There was scarcely any issue before the people that did not resolve itself into a tug of war between the representatives of the States in Congress: Senators, who should not be ambassadors from the several States, but tribunes of all the people of all the States, came to be mere wranglers for sectional interest. But of late years questions have arisen that have put the Senators back in the places where they belonged in the minds of the men who created the Senate—that is, as councilors of the whole nation. The discussions of our insular policy should not be sectional. Such a policy should be American policy rather than Northern, Southern, Eastern or Western. The tendency during the recent session was certainly in that direction. When that tendency grows rigid in custom the American Senate, with its open debate, renewed from year to year with new blood, "of the people and by the people," yet always out of the reach of the people in their passing spasms of anger, will be the greatest forum in the world. Then, discussing affairs beyond sectional interest (and in that much altruistic), affairs that shall test the national unselfishness and make the country take a loftier view of life than the full dinner-pail view, American Senators, relieved from the distracting details of preliminary legislation by the work of an efficient House, will find the "subject and the occasion" for true eloquence. And those times will develop the man! For it is a curious thing about our form of government that the same forces which develop great opportunities make men great enough to fill them. When opportunities go begging it will be the first sign of the nation's decay; and if that sign appears in the Senate, then indeed the alarm should be sounded. But now is not the time.

The Potato-Tender's Letter

WHICH recalls a closing story. In the old days in the Dakotas the United States Government sent some potatoes to a small army post for planting. The whole West was interested in the experiment, as it was thought then that potatoes would not grow in that soil. The potatoes were planted inside a stockade, and when the officer in charge took his squad away he left the crop in charge of a plainsman with instructions to allow no one inside the stockade and to report promptly and regularly on the potatoes. In ten days the officer got this letter from his potato-tender:

Dere Cap: Nothink Mutch has happen sense you left. Nigger Bill whitch is a renegade Crow Injun and a War Party come up yesterday and Wanted in. Nigger Bill he road up hooping and sed: I want in, and I sed No Nigger Bill you cannot come in and he sed I am a chief and I am coming in and I sed No Nigger Bill you must not come in, and he said Well I am coming in, and he started for the wicket. Then I went and got my gun and shot Nigger Bill and killed Him. He is ded. The potatoes is doing well.

In these times there is danger of being diverted from the main and vital part of things, and seeing bias and finding trivial faults. Therefore it may be well to know that so far as the United States Senate is concerned, the potatoes, however small some of them may be, on the whole and in the main "is doing well."

Editor's Note—This is the second of Mr. White's articles on Washington. The next will appear in an early number.

Great Men at the Table

By William Mathews

AS EVERYTHING relating to great men is interesting, it is not strange that so much has been published about their tastes regarding things edible and potable. Possessing stronger natures—intenser likes and antipathies—than most other men, it is not strange that they have generally been exceedingly fond of particular dishes. Aristotle, the father of philosophy, who dominated the intellectual world for two thousand years, was an exception. He lived so frugally that he might almost be said to have feasted on fancy. He speaks of himself somewhere as a fit person to have lived in the world when men fed on acorns. A noted French lady said that she would commit a baseness for the sake of fried potatoes. A similar avowal with regard to some other pet dish might be made truthfully by more than one disciple of Epicurus.

It is well known that the English King who died of a surfeit of lampreys was one of the foremost statesmen and warriors of his age, besides being a scholar. Alexander Pope, who was an epicure, would lie abed for days at Lord Bolingbroke's unless he was told that there were stewed lampreys for dinner, when he would rise instantly and hurry down to the table. His host, the brilliant orator and politician, was temperate at the table; but an over-roasted leg of mutton would strangely ruffle his temper. When Bolingbroke, inviting the cynical Swift to dinner, told of the tempting dishes that would be set before him, the Dean replied: "A plague on your bill of fare! Show me your bill of company."

Doctor Johnson had a keen relish for a leg of mutton and for a veal pie with plums. "At my aunt Fields'," he once said, "I ate so much of a leg of mutton that she used to talk of it." Being once treated to a dish of new honey and clouted cream, he ate so voraciously that his entertainer was alarmed. Dryden, declining, in 1699, an invitation from a lady to an attractive supper, wrote: "If beggars might be choosers, a chine of honest bacon would please my appetite more than all the marrow puddings, for I like them better plain, having a very vulgar stomach." The great Greek scholar, Doctor Parr, avowed that he had a great love for "hot boiled lobsters with a profusion of shrimp sauce." Byron was inordinately fond of bacon and eggs, in which he would indulge in spite of what he knew would be the inevitable result—an attack of indigestion. Another and a harmless passion of the poet was that for soda water, on which and dry biscuits he at one time almost exclusively subsisted. In this he was rivaled by the famous Beckford, of Fonthill Abbey, the millionaire author, who during the days and nights of continuous work in which he dashed off his Vathek—an Eastern tale to which Byron said that "even Rasselas must bow"—subsisted mainly on the same gaseous fluid.

Like Byron, Leigh Hunt would treat himself at late suppers to the most indigestible foods, though he had repeatedly suffered from them—"nightmare producing things," as he himself confessed, "that had nearly killed him." Ariosto had a ravenous appetite for turnips. Goethe had an immense appetite, and ate more than most men even on days when he complained of not being hungry. He took no refreshment, however, until two o'clock except a cup of chocolate at eleven. Of wine he took two or three bottles daily. Handel, who was a large, bulky man, ate enormously, and when he dined at a tavern always ordered dinner for three. When told that the dinner would be ready as soon as the company should arrive, he would exclaim: "Den pring up de dinner prestissimo; I am de company." Beethoven, who in general cared little for the pleasures of the table, yet was very fastidious and even whimsical regarding his food. Soup was his favorite dish; but it was hard to make it so as to please him. He told a servant who had lied to him that she was not pure in heart and therefore could not make good soup. Once, when his cook set before him some eggs that were stale, he threw one by one the whole batch at her.

Dr. George Fordyce, a celebrated London physician, author and lecturer on chemistry, who died in 1802, had a singular theory regarding meals. He asserted that as one meal a day was enough for a lion, it ought to suffice for a man. In accordance with this opinion, he for more than twenty years ate only a dinner during the entire day, which he took regularly at four o'clock in the afternoon at Dolly's Chop House. But then, like the one meal of the lion, it was a meal indeed. A pound and a half of rump steak, half of a broiled chicken, a plate of fish, a bottle of port, a gill of brandy, and a tankard of strong ale—these satisfied nature's cravings till twenty-four hours more had passed, and occupied one hour and a half of his time. How the doctor was able, half an hour afterward—at six o'clock, daily—to deliver his lectures on Anatomy and Chemistry it is hard to see.

The Finals and Alice Gray

By Brand Whitlock

THE HISTORY OF A MATCH THAT DECIDED MORE THAN THE CLUB CHAMPIONSHIP

ALICE sat on the piazza of the clubhouse looking out on the fair green of the home hole. Jack Lauden was already there, practicing mid-iron shots. At the finish of each stroke he held the attitude, his legs apart as in a huge stride, his body twisted on his hips, his mid-iron at an angle in the air, his eyes intent on the ball that went so unerringly on to the green. Lauden held the position each time for several minutes, rigid, like a dog that is pointing. Never once did he turn his head to look at the brilliant throng on the clubhouse piazza; he affected a complete oblivion to that presence; he seemed to be utterly absorbed in the study of his game.

Alice thought him as oblivious as he appeared. As a golfer she admired his perfect form; she admired, too, the picture he made: his spotless white flannels against the deep green of the course; the blue and white handkerchief knotted at his throat; his arms bare to the elbows and bronzed and brawny as a mower's. His plaid hose showed at his ankles whenever he whirled in his stroke, his smooth face flushed with his exertion, and his yellow curls stirred in the light breeze that blew across the links.

Haworth, standing on the lawn, leaned against the rail of the piazza. He was dressed for play; his heavy leather bag leaned against the rail beside him. He had a driver in his hand. Once or twice he swung lightly at a clover top, but he did not practice. He, too, watched Lauden and admired him. He envied him, too, his being able to play so certainly and so easily before that company. He knew that he himself should be practicing, but the company embarrassed him. He let the moments pass by. Once he looked at Alice sitting there in her white linen She was beautiful, he thought, though not so beautiful as on that day when he first had seen her, in her golf suit, her head bare, her sleeves rolled to her elbows, bending above her ball on the putting green. The gallery had held its breath that day until she made the long nineteen-yard putt. He, too, had held his breath, but not because of any suspense about the putt. But to-day he saw the admiration on her face and his own face grew long and serious. He wished the moment for playing would hasten, that he might begin and have it over.

The throng on the piazza, pacing nervously up and down, chattering, laughing, their red and green and white jackets flashing back and forth in the brilliant light of the October afternoon, gathered finally about Alice. Sissy Louison, in a new scarlet jacket with brass buttons, though he never played, posted himself directly at Alice's side.

"Well, Alice," he said, "you're my lady at the tourney to-day—the winner gets your hand, eh?" He said this in the right of impertinence that was his by virtue of his position as an old beau who had stood still in his youth, as it were, while all the generations of the town's young girls grew up, danced, drove and flirted with him, then passed on to matronhood and left him to their younger sisters.

The group about her laughed knowingly, and Sissy Louison stood with his legs apart, cocked his head, and smiled with the self-satisfaction he always felt when he had said a thing no one else would have dared to say. Alice glanced at him, but she could not achieve a steady gaze.

"Oh, I don't know," she said, twisting her gloves in her fingers and tossing her head to one side.

The group laughed again, emboldened by the effrontery of Sissy Louison. They enjoyed Alice's embarrassment.

"It makes it awfully interesting!" exclaimed Blanche Norris.

"Yes," said Alexander, "it's the most valuable president's cup ever put up in this or any other club."

"It holds so much," said Sissy Louison.

"Who're you betting on, Alice?" asked Williams rather bluntly.

"Ho, as if she'd tell!" cried Sissy Louison, clapping his hands. "That's just the point!"

He minced away, carefully reassuring himself that his cap was covering the bald spot on his head.

"Isn't he awful?" said Alice, looking after him, and trying to recover the dignity he had so seriously compromised.

"No, honestly, Alice," persisted Williams, "joking aside, who do you think will win?"

She saw that he was appealing to her now as the winner of the woman's championship.

"I really think it's a very even thing, John," she said quite seriously.

Then they all cried out and laughed immoderately, the women clapping their hands. Alice blushed deeply.

"What's the matter? What's the matter?" said Sissy Louison, flitting up again.

"She says it's a very even thing!" said Blanche Norris with a significant glance.

"Why, of course! I could have told you that!" Sissy Louison replied.

"I think you're all perfectly horrid!" said Alice, flirting her gloves at them.

Williams and Alexander and the other men crossed the piazza and stood before the great blackboard on the wall of the clubhouse, where, in a graduated series of brackets, the story of the tournament for the president's cup was told. The last and smallest bracket embraced the names of Lauden and Haworth. Just below its point was written: "Champion, 1902." The name of the winner would be written in after Lauden and Haworth had played the finals that afternoon.

ALICE

The men studied the record as if they might pick the winner. The joking she had endured that afternoon had gone deeper in her heart than Alice Gray would admit even to herself. She knew that society, because of the gossip about her relation to this match, had revived an interest in a sport it feared was no longer as fashionable as it once was, and she knew, too, how much truth there was in society's sentimental tale; there was enough, so far as her own indecision and trouble of heart went, at least, to make her wish they would discuss some other topic.

When Sissy Louison had nervously tripped away again she looked out over the green, across the gully, and far away to where the sun lay bright and warm on The Veldt. Her eyes dreamily rested on the canvas pavilion on the hill at the fifth tee, gleaming, a white spot, through the October haze that filled the valleys between the smooth green hills.

"Isn't it an ideal day?" she said at length.

"Look at Jack Lauden," said Blanche Norris irrelevantly, her eyes on nearer scenes. "His form is perfect!"

"Yes," said Mollie Wells, "but where is Archie?"

"He's over there," said Blanche, pointing to Haworth. He was still leaning against the railing of the piazza.

"I wonder why he isn't practicing?" said Mollie. "Does he think it isn't necessary?"

Haworth had felt their gaze upon him, and he glanced up uneasily. He saw that Alice was looking at him now, and he felt drawn toward her. He picked up his caddie bag and came over to where she sat in the midst of the group. He leaned over the rail, folding his bare arms upon it.

"Why aren't you practicing?" asked Alice rather severely.

"Oh, I don't know," he answered, kicking the toe of his hobnailed shoe into the sod. "Jack's in great form to-day, isn't he?" He turned to look at Lauden, seeking to divert attention from himself to his competitor. Lauden had moved toward the green and had taken his mashie.

"He drops 'em dead every time," remarked Mollie.

The girls went to the other end of the piazza to follow Lauden's practice play, and the men soon went after them. Haworth turned again and looked up at Alice.

"Are you nervous?" she asked.

"Frightfully," he replied.

"Nonsense!" she exclaimed. "What for?"

"Well," he answered, "you know I never can play with a gallery."

"How did you get along this morning?"

"Not very well."

"Not very well?"

"No. I played eighteen holes with Clifton."

"That was too much. You should have rested. How did you come out?"

"He beat."

"He!" said Alice in scorn. "How, I'd like to know?"

"Well, I don't know," Haworth said, almost penitently. "He made an eighty-three." He mused a moment. "He wore that striped sweater of his—that always does make me fidgety."

She looked at him sympathetically.

"And then," he continued, "Lauden's got that caddie this afternoon." He pointed at the boy leaping into the air in a pretense of catching Lauden's balls. "I never could play with that kid around. He nearly drives me crazy."

"Oh, Archie, you are simply ridiculous!" exclaimed Alice.

"I know it," he confessed. "I'm ridiculous about a good many things." He spoke with a meaning, then glanced about to see if any one were near. They were quite alone. He leaned farther over the railing. Then he added: "You, for instance."

She made no reply.

"You might at least deny that is ridiculous," he complained. "Of course the thought of my presumption is ridiculous. I know that." He ended hopelessly, hanging his head.

"Hadn't you better be thinking about golf? You have enough whims as it is—with your striped sweaters and your caddies and all that. Of course," she hastened to do the justice of one golfer to another, knowing the moods and tenses of the game, "I understand just how they affect you. I nearly lost my match because Sadie Harnett wore her hair in a pigtail down her back—as if she were still sixteen—the silly thing!"

"There's something else," Haworth began.

"What's that?"

"You."

"Me?"

"Yes, you," he answered boldly. "I shall never be able to keep my eye on the ball with you about."

MacNeal, the professional, was coming out of the club-house, clattering across the piazza in his spiked shoes. With him were Lawrence, the president of the club, and Gregory, who was to score.

"It's time," said Alice. She sprang to her feet.

"Yes," said Haworth. A chill was on him. He picked up his bag. The whole brilliant throng moved across the green toward the tee of Westward Ho, the first hole.

Lauden drove, a long, clean drive, straight across the pond two hundred yards down the course. Haworth, with a deliberation that Alice knew was to overcome his nervousness, addressed his ball again and again. It rather exasperated Alice, the more because when he drove at last his ball was quite as good, in direction and in distance, as Lauden's. Then the players and the gallery trooped down the hill and across the little white bridge to the fair green. Haworth could see Alice walking ahead with Lauden. Lauden was laughing down into her very eyes, and she was smiling back into his.

"I'm going to win, Alice," Lauden was saying. "I'll beat him to a standstill. I know it."

"I wouldn't be too cock-sure," she said.

"All right," Lauden answered, tossing his head, "you wait and see. I'll lay that cup in your hands to-night."

"How romantic you are, Jack!" Alice exclaimed. "Just like a crusader!" Her tone was one of irony, but her blush was one of pleasure.

Haworth was playing the odd; his ball dropped on the green and Lauden pitched his beside it easily. They putted out in two each and halved the hole.

The second hole, where the drive is over the burn, as every one loved to hear MacNeal call the high-banked stream, was the hardest on the course. But the rivals played it evenly until they were on the green. Haworth, twenty feet from the hole, was putting. Alice saw that, just as he drew back his club, he cast his glance toward her. The putt was short; he played one more. Lauden went in on his fifth stroke and the hole was his.

"It's absurd," said Alice to Mollie Wells, "how Archie lets little things throw him off his game."

Haworth, however, won the third hole, running down a long putt from the edge of the green for a three. The girls clapped their hands.

"Sh!" went Lawrence, hushing them. He took golf even more seriously than did MacNeal; so seriously that he always met the club's deficits at the end of the year.

They halved the fourth hole, and Lauden won the fifth. On the sixth, the smooth terrace that lay along the side of the ridge, he played perfectly, so that the gallery applauded again. Haworth had topped his drive, and it required four for him to hole out. Lauden was two up.

With Haworth, Alice climbed the hill up to the seventh tee.

"What was it that time?" she said almost petulantly.

"It was that Mrs. Cordill; didn't you hear her? Jabbering away there at the tee just as I drove! Can't anything be done to keep her still?"

"Jack doesn't mind it," said Alice. "He's playing faultless golf. Look at him now—and such form!"

She stood, as it were, on tiptoe, breathless.

"Watch his follow-through!" she whispered hurriedly.

Lauden's driver cracked, and the ball soared gracefully across the ravine, far down the course. He turned away with a nonchalant smile.

"Splendid, Jack!" cried Alice.

The throng looked at her.

"Want to bet on him, Alice?" called Sissy Louison.

"Sh!" went Lawrence, and she stopped stock-still, the wind playing with her skirts. Haworth glanced at her. She caught the appeal in his glance. Then he drove, pressing savagely, but his drive cleared the ravine.

"Nice one, old man," patronized Lauden.

Haworth made no reply, but ran in long leaps down into the ravine and up the other slope.

"He's out of sorts," said Mollie Wells. "Isn't he?"

"Why, I hadn't noticed it," said Alice with an air almost of injury.

Haworth's brassie fell on the hither side of the sunken road that made a hazard for the green and gave the hole its name of Waterloo, but he pitched his ball on to the green and it ran prettily down to within a foot of the hole.

"Bonnie shot!" exclaimed MacNeal in his deep voice, and the gallery laughed. There was pride in the laugh; they all felt so thoroughly repaid. MacNeal was their greatest comfort. They never omitted to explain, in speaking of him, "He learned his game at St. Andrews, you know." It demanded an offhand manner, but they had acquired that.

The bonnie shot enabled Haworth to halve that hole as well. But on Valley Creek, with its bogey of five, Haworth took six, while Lauden, never varying in his game, made the hole in bogey and won.

"He's two up, isn't he?" asked Mollie Wells.

"Three," Alice replied with a sudden and surprising pride. She marveled, secretly, to herself; and she walked with her head down, meditating. Mollie drew away from her and entwined her arm about Blanche Norris.

"I've solved the problem," she whispered. They were lifting their skirts as they went through the tall grass toward the group of slender little pines that grew between the green of the eighth and the tee of the ninth hole.

"Which is it?" Blanche asked.

"Jack!" Mollie replied.

"How do you know?"

"Because," Mollie said.

"Dear me!" Blanche marveled.

Katherine Mendenhall overtook them.

"We know now," Blanche hastened to assure her.

"Tell me," Katherine demanded.

And they told her just as Sissy Louison, having seen them with their heads together, ran up.

"What is it, girls?" he said eagerly, bending near them. "Tell me too!"

"Oh, nothing," Mollie replied coldly.

But Blanche was more generous.

"We have found out that it's Archie, that's all," she said.

"Nonsense!" Sissy Louison replied. "I know better. It's Jack Lauden—you'll see!" He winked knowingly, and the girls clutched each other, furtively, rapturously. Lauden had made his drive, using a mid-iron on the short hole, and then he took his stand beside Alice to await Haworth's effort. Alice, looking at Haworth, saw that the perspiration was streaming down his face. The autumnal sun had been slanting down on them, but she knew that his warmth had other causes. He teed his ball, and then when about to drive he paused and drew out his handkerchief, wiping the perspiration from his eyes, then scouring his whole face roughly. There was something almost pitiable about it. He made ready again, and was about to swing when a web of gossamer, floating lightly on the October breeze, blew across his face. He puffed at it impotently, but he had to draw out his handkerchief again to wipe it away. There was something ridiculous about it this time. A titter rippled through the group of onlookers, just as Haworth swung. His ball went swishing a little way through the long grass, and stopped. Consequently, in the end, the hole was Lauden's, three to four. The match was half played, and they all turned toward the tee of the tenth hole. Alice overheard Lauden say to Haworth:

"Hard luck, old man."

"Bad playing," Haworth answered, sternly just.

She dropped behind the others, for she felt a sudden need of being alone. The contest, though it was not at all close, was wearing on her nerves. She looked ahead at Lauden, at his broad shoulders, and his fair curly head that sat so firmly upon them. He swung confidently along, a man to admire, as one of those destined to win at everything, and to win easily, gracefully, with a laugh. She had felt the force of his nature in the look of those blue eyes; she had felt it often as they had been turned upon her. As he strode on, chatting with Haworth, her own heart beat rapidly. Once, glancing at him, she saw his profile as he turned to speak to Haworth. She caught her breath. She told herself that she cared nothing especially for his prowess at golf; that, of course, was an inconsequential thing; but it gave her an insight into his character. He was one of those strong, virile men, born to lead, to command, to summon victory. He carried himself in his business just as he did on the links; he was supreme there as well. His men all loved him, and, with that apparently negligent disregard of attire that gave his mode of wearing good clothes its greatest charm, he could go any moment into the works and toil with them. They never had any strikes at the Lauden Company's plant. She remembered that Jack had told her strikes didn't pay. And this was the man who loved her, who had so often told her that he intended to make her his wife. She thrilled under the thought, and glancing at him in that instant she suddenly dropped her eyes and blushed. She gazed, then, far across the links; the little green hills rolled away; the sun lay warm upon them; the little flags that marked the course fluttered smartly; here and there she caught the silver glint of the little stream; the whole valley was filled with the hazy air; gossamers trailed by; far off the motionless forests banked their brilliant colors against the serene sky. As she gazed, tears dimmed her eyes, and a vague unhappiness, a sorrow that was yet an ecstasy, came over her. She felt that this question which had so long troubled her must be settled soon; she could not go through such another winter as the last, with Jack and Archie after her all the time, and ready to fly at each other's throats any moment, yet always maintaining the punctilious truce of gentlemen. Her eye again followed Lauden: he had carelessly dropped his ball on the grass tee, and stood gazing down the course, measuring his distance. He swung his driver once or twice, then switched it in a great arc through the startled air, and sent the ball careering far across the brook. He watched it until it had fallen and ended its long roll; then he turned. His eye caught hers; his white teeth showed in a smile; and she smiled back at him.

But as Haworth stooped to pat his tee into form Alice told herself that she must not admit such considerations now; she must watch and enjoy this match, and she must view it from the unbiased and judicial standpoint of a golfer who hopes that the better man may win. She went forward resolutely and stood beside Mollie Wells and Blanche Norris. Raising her eyes she caught a glimpse of Lauden standing with his muscular arms folded across his broad chest, his driver hanging in one hand. He was standing by the side of MacNeal, who had taught him his game. But Alice checked herself again; she felt that she must not look at Jack now—there would be time enough for that—and again she felt the warm glow within her breast. No, she must watch Haworth. He was rising from his stooping posture and taking his stance. As she looked at him she remembered an evening long ago. . . . It was a pity, she felt; she did hope—it all flashed through her mind in the instant that he was addressing his ball—she did hope that he would win a few holes now, that the match might be more even. His driver sang through the air, and his ball followed Lauden's. He was, of course, a little short, and had to play the odd. His approach was perfect. The gallery applauded. Lauden, in playing the like, fell short; he played one more. Then in two putts each they holed out, but Haworth had won that hole, and Lauden was only three up.

A look of black determination had settled on Haworth's face, and he played the eleventh hole, The Gulch, in that spirit. Lauden had grown careless, and made his first bad drive of the afternoon, going into the bunker. Thus it was that Haworth was playing one off three when his brassie laid him on the green. So he won the hole and Lauden was only two up. He won the twelfth hole almost as easily.

"Nothing can cope with that kind of work, Archie," laughed Lauden.

Alice saw Haworth, as he approached the tee, glare at Lauden's caddie. The boy was leaning idly on the sand-box moulding little tees along its edge.

"Fore, caddie," said Haworth in a low voice as he balanced for his stance.

"Come back here, kid," said Lauden. The caddie obeyed and Haworth began swinging his club lightly back and forth. There was silence. Alice looked at him; she could see the trouble in his eyes; the strain was telling. He drove, and he sliced badly. And Alice felt a vague new trouble in her heart.

"He's off his game, eh, Alice?" said Sissy Louison, using a phrase he had heard.

"No," she replied, "Mr. Lauden's caddie should not have stood where he did."

"Why, he wasn't in the way," said the old beau.

"Psychologically he was, Mr. Louison," replied Alice coldly.

"I thought that he teed too high," said Katherine Mendenhall, who had just then joined them.

"No," said Alice with her expert knowledge, "it wasn't that; he caught it on the toe of his club. It's too bad."

They went down the green, and after playing out of the rough grass beside the course Haworth was still away, and in playing he sclaffed. Lawrence ran over and solicitously replaced the divot. Alice, with her eyes on Haworth, who was waiting beside his ball, felt that if he would only show anger it might aid her own feelings.

"I'd swear if it were I," said Mollie Wells who had halted near her.

"So should I," she replied.

Lauden, about to play, paused coolly and lighted a cigarette. The fragrance of it was blown across to where they stood. Alice caught the odor. The men, sniffing it eagerly, lighted cigarettes themselves. But Alice felt that it would have been more generous in Lauden not to have lighted his cigarette just at that crisis. Lauden's stroke, of course, was perfect; the ball rose, sailed over the hill, fell a foot from the hole and fell dead. He won the hole in three.

"Two up now," said some one near Alice. Somehow it impressed her sadly, and she knit her brows, wondering why.

They were upon The Veldt now, the long, straight, beautiful hole, five hundred and one yards in length, lying on the uplands, commanding the whole countryside, and swept always by inspiring winds.

"Any one could play golf up here," said Gregory, filling his lungs gladly with the pure air.

Lauden drove and Haworth drove, and their balls lay, white dots, side by side, far down the green, beyond the two-hundred-yard post, and almost to the road. Lauden and Haworth, their drivers over their shoulders, marched side by side like two soldiers, their caddies and the group of enthusiasts following them closely. Once, as he marched, Lauden swung carelessly at the white head of a dandelion which, at a distance, looked so much like a ball; he scattered its down to the winds. He swung as lightly at his ball, and it sped on and on and on, seeming to climb through the air each instant to accelerate its speed. Haworth's brassie was as fine; the gallery applauded. Their approaches were good, and they halved the hole by perfect play.

They were at the fifteenth hole, the one they called The Oaks, because some small trees of that variety grew out of the gully that divided the two little breasts of hills, and the man from whom the grounds were leased would not let them cut the trees down. Here Lauden, for some reason, took his cleek to drive, and for some reason the action affected Alice as had the lighting of the cigarette. The calm and serene assurance of the thing made Haworth's position all the more pitiable. Lauden seemingly had but to slap his ball with the iron to send it to the ravine; there it lay waiting for a mid-iron to place it on the green. But Haworth, too, used an iron, and Alice felt a vicarious embarrassment. He fell short, and in playing the odd he went into the gulch; he played two more with a niblick before he surrendered and dropped back with his penalty. Lauden, of course, won the hole easily. He was two up now, and but three to play.

"He has a chance, though," some one was saying of Haworth.

"Yes, by winning all three holes," some one else replied.

"Which is just the same as one chance in a thousand," a third observed, almost contemptuously.

"I told you it would be Jack, girls," Alice heard Sissy Louison's voice saying.

The sixteenth hole had an elevated green; behind and all around the ground sloped sharply away from it. It looked like the glacis of a fort, and it served a like purpose. In playing his third shot Haworth overplayed the green. Lauden's approach had been played with his usual accuracy; he had laughed when his ball rolled almost into the hole.

"He's as good as dormie," Alice heard them saying.

Haworth played; his ball by an effort gained the green. He played one more, a long putt that rimmed the cup. Then Lauden carelessly touched his ball; he did not even take his putter to do it; he used the mashie he held in his hand. His ball rattled in the cup, and he had won the hole and the match and the president's cup. A shout rang out, they all clapped their hands, and then began the chatter of their congratulations.

"Will you play the by-holes?" asked Gregory.

Haworth shook his head.

"THEN," HE BEGAN, "I MAY—AFTER ALL——"

Lauden gave his club to his caddie, and the boy marched proudly in front of the little procession that started across the green toward the clubhouse. Lauden was striding along; beside him strode MacNeal and Lawrence and Gregory, all of them talking volubly, leaning over to look into each other's faces and drive their points home, all of them golfers. The rest followed, eager, enthusiastic, happy, identifying themselves promptly with the victor and the victory.

Haworth was back on the green, alone but for his caddie. The boy looked up into his face and Haworth smiled.

"Well, lad," he said, laying his hand on the boy's head—they had taken to calling the caddies "lad" when MacNeal came among them—"Well, lad, we'll have to be satisfied with our position as runner-up."

"I'd rather caddie for you at that," said the boy, sneering toward the clubhouse.

Haworth laughed and was touched. He started then after the others.

Alice had gone with the crowd, but as they advanced she found herself going ever more slowly. She did not have the joy in the victory she had anticipated. She thought of Haworth and glanced about, but she did not see him. She felt, presently, that he was somewhere back there behind her, alone in defeat. She fell away from the excited gallery. Haworth, looking up, saw that she was lagging far behind the others. She stopped at last, then started on, then turned and started on again. She hesitated in her steps; finally she whirled and faced him. As he looked at her she came back. She met him frankly, her hand outheld.

"I'm awfully sorry, Archie, really I am," she said.

He took her hand and replied:

"Thank you, Alice."

She looked into his face.

"Why, Archie!" she exclaimed. "Don't take it that hard!"

He smiled.

"I don't mind the cup; that's nothing; but—you know, Alice, what they've been saying. Of course, it's silly, but it got on my nerves—into my very being. I felt that if I lost the match—I lost——"

He glanced about. The caddie was moping far behind.

"That's what made it hard," he went on. He bent nearer. She faltered upon the beginning of some speech, then suddenly she looked up at him, and as suddenly her eyes fell.

"I don't think I'd pay much attention to what they all say," she said.

Haworth halted.

"Alice!" he almost cried.

"Don't," she protested. "Be careful."

He was bending over her.

"Then," he began, "I may—after all——"

She smiled into his eyes, and an ecstasy swam within him.

Side by side, in silence, they walked over to the clubhouse, and on the steps of the piazza Lauden awaited them, surrounded by his admirers. He looked big in his victory.

"Come on, Archie," he called, "come on. There's a bottle waiting for you."

Haworth stepped up with a rare smile.

"I must congratulate you, Jack. I never saw more magnificent golf."

He smiled so readily, and was so fine and generous about it all, that they marveled at the splendid grace with which he took his defeat. But that was for a second only. They all looked again at him, then at Alice standing there beside him. And as they looked at them the pair blushed hotly. Suddenly Lauden's face fell. The throng was breathless an instant, then they all clapped their hands.

"Bonnie shot!" cried Sissy Louison.

And they all burst into laughter.

On the blackboard Lawrence had just written in the blank above the words "Champion 1902":

"Lauden, 3 up 2 to play."

Lauden glanced at the inscription.

"I think," he said slowly, "that I look more like the runner-up—at least to me."

The company had come down from the piazza and were pressing around Haworth and Alice. But she ran from them, Mollie and Blanche and Katherine attending her with a new and intense solicitude. They heard her say on the threshold of the clubhouse:

"Hurry up, Archie; I have my trap; I'll drive you home."

The New Lawyer at Seminole

By Willis Gibson

HOW HE HELD A BRIEF FOR BOTH SIDES OF THE CASE AND WON FOR BOTH HIS CLIENTS

"I THINK YOU ARE THE MAN TO HELP ME WITH A LITTLE JOB I HAVE ON HAND"

ON A CERTAIN December afternoon, in his Chicago office, the General Manager of the West Trunk System opened with a bang the venerable book in which were recorded the holders of the company's annual passes, and, girding himself for a long-deferred work of reform, ran a belligerent eye down its initial page. The first name at which he paused was that of Arlo Crane, mayor of Seminole, Illinois.

Arlo Crane had stood Seminole's mayor sixteen years, but he had held his pass even longer. Back in the pioneer days of the road some now-forgotten director—a friend of Crane—had put his name on the book. It seemed to the General Manager that after half a lifetime of free rides a man ought to be willing to pay fare. He dipped a pen deep into his red-ink well—and all unknowingly into a mess of trouble—and drew a flaming band through Arlo Crane's entry.

New Year's morning, out in Seminole, Mayor Crane entered the post-office, scattering greetings all about him, and blithely sorted his mail in quest of the yellow envelope stamped with the red driving wheel—the trade-mark of the West Trunk—that had so long been wont to await him on that day. When he failed to find the yellow envelope he marched from the post-office quite discomfited, with never a "Happy New Year" for any one. Arlo Crane had seldom actually used his "annual," but he had found it very agreeable nevertheless to take the shiny little card from his wallet occasionally and read that "On Presentation Hereof, Hon. A. Crane Will be Passed Over All Divisions." More than that, a famous dignity had been trod upon; the proudest man in a proud man's town had been cast aside without a line of explanation.

Now in the Seminole Council there was an alderman, Mr. Mink, who was happy only when he was revising the City's laws. On the second Monday in January Alderman Mink chanced to turn his attention to the ordinance under which the West Trunk, to avoid a marsh in the path of its mile-long spur to the plant of the Union Packing Company, had laid one hundred yards of track on D Street, an isolated grade on the western outskirts of town. Mr. Mink wanted this ordinance repealed.

Unwittingly he stumbled upon a time when Mayor Crane, still finding no yellow envelope in his post-office box, had come to regard himself as a much-abused gentleman. In respect to Alderman Mink's project the Mayor felt called upon to address the Council so vigorously concerning the unbridled greed of railways—which, he said, was becoming more than ever apparent of late years—that the Honorable Body, quite carried away, passed the repeal almost unanimously, and by wire gave the West Trunk until the following noon to get its rails up. When upon the arrival of the appointed noon the spur continued intact, Mayor Crane gravely led Seminole's six policemen to D Street. Removing the coupling fish-plates at intervals, the Mayor and his men divided the one hundred yards of trespassing track into half a dozen sections, then with crowbars turned the sections, one after another, bodily upside down.

Next morning—Wednesday—there was a sensation in Seminole. The West Trunk passenger depot, a dingy but comfortable wooden structure, which since the coming of the road had stood, most conveniently, at the point where the tracks crossed busy Broadway, had disappeared. And to the vast crowd of citizens that congregated to gape astounded at its empty foundations the thing remained wholly inexplicable until a young clerk from the window of the near-by freight-house benevolently shouted:

"If it's the passenger depot you folks are looking for, you'll find it at its new location—California Avenue."

The citizens stared incredulous. California Avenue! Why, that was a mile and a half to the eastward, hidden beyond the top of the Long Grade, on the very limits of the city; in fact, California Avenue was the city limit. It marked the terminus of the West Trunk's long yard. A part of ill-fated Apple Blossom Addition, which never had been settled, it was really no street at all. There was no grade there, no sidewalks; nothing but rotting surveyors' stakes.

Nevertheless no better explanation appeared; presently the citizens trudged, a doubting cavalcade, to the brow of the Long Grade, and gazed out over the level country beyond.

There it was, the old brown depot, just within the borders of forgotten Apple Blossom Addition, still, lonely, like some country way-station, a solitary structure amid a limitless expanse of snow-wrapped meadows. It sat—rude steps rigged to its doors—upon two coupled flat-cars switched out close beside the main track, on the one siding of the yard that extended so far to the east. In the night a gang had come in on a special, moved the depot astride a handy side-track, lifted it high on jackscrews, run the flats beneath it, then towed away cars and depot at the tail of their engine.

That evening's Herald published an interview with the railroad's agent that clinched the matter. As soon as warmer weather permitted, he stated, foundations would be laid for the depot at its new location. Telegraphic business would continue to be transacted at Broadway through the instruments in the freight-house, and the depot, as formerly, would close for the night with the passing of the Omaha Limited at ten, but passenger trains would hereafter stop to discharge and receive passengers only at California Avenue.

Ponderously, then, a monster indignation outspread through decorous Seminole. Early in the afternoon of Thursday handbills appeared announcing for the night, at the City Hall, a mass-meeting to authorize a legal campaign against the West Trunk's scheme of retaliation which before surrender should be carried to the highest courts in the land. Everywhere men read the call with stern faces, grave, determined. In all the town there was but a single exception. Lawyer Richard Forest, junior member of the Seminole bar, scanning the handbill in his Broadway office, got on his feet abruptly, and declared with unmistakable jubilance to the walls of his empty room:

"By Jingo, boys, this is going to be a fight!"

But a moment before young Forest had been celebrating his first anniversary in Seminole by inspecting a journal whose credit columns, aside from a few odd jobs, collections and the like, sent him by out-of-town patrons who secured his name from the State Bar Directory, stood stark white. At his case book, resting brave and bulky near by, he had not troubled to look. Only once had an entry threatened to appear there. Roderick Mullen, a boss stevedore at the Union Packing Plant, because he had not been invited to the Erin Club's ball, had jovially taken possession of the Armory, where the affair was to occur, and held it, the only guest, until morning. Legal clouds that overhung the stevedore in consequence, Forest, by some diplomacy and much handshaking, had cleared away. Ungratefully, Mr. Mullen has so far neglected to pay his fee.

Forest had chosen Seminole for his first office on information—imparted by a former college chum professing to know the Middle West—that the town had "ten thousand well-fed citizens, no end of prosperous businesses, and no one to manage its litigations save a dozen gentle old judges whose desks stand knee-deep with year-old matters. The town," Forest's friend asserted, "is sound asleep, just waiting for a hustler to wake it up."

Forest had not come to Seminole a green hand. For the preceding two years he had been well connected with the legal department of a great Chicago corporation. Also, he had grit, ambition, a plucky young wife, and a comfortable bread-and-butter fund.

But Seminole, so he immediately found, if sound asleep, was loath to be awakened. Essentially an old man's town, long-settled, slow-going, cautious, it cherished the old ways of business. After a generation of attorneys who stalked to their offices solemn and preoccupied, their chins bowed upon their cravats, Seminole could not take seriously this new lawyer Forest who went about cheerfully, and who on Sunday afternoons took his wife on brisk tramps out into the country—a very schoolboy's recreation.

Little wonder, then, that Forest waxed enthusiastic over the handbill of the mass-meeting. He saw between its lines the chance he had so long awaited to force himself before Seminole's drowsy eye. Inevitably in the oncoming legal conflict easy-going Colonel Van Duzee, the City Attorney, and tranquil Judge Henty, the West Trunk's local counsel, would crave lieutenants by the dozen; Forest purposed to enlist. Once getting a foothold—no matter on which side—he would see to it that he made himself felt.

And forthwith he confidently set out from his office to make the opening move in the game.

"I shall need assistants, yes," said Colonel Van Duzee for the town. "But I fear"—he was wholly sincere—"that this is a task for us grayheads. I am inviting, outside of our city, veteran jurists of Quincy and Springfield to join me. If I may say so, my dear Forest, I hardly think your residence in Illinois has been sufficient to give you the familiarity with local conditions which seems to me necessary in these proceedings."

On much the same grounds Judge Henty for the railroad felt himself unable "consistently to recommend" Forest to his superiors.

Denied by plaintiff and defendant, Forest regained his office by all known standards finally separated from the case of Seminole vs. the West Trunk. But Forest threw known standards aside. He had made no mistake. The fight was to be big; outsiders, lawyers from distant towns, were being welcomed to it.

"If I can't make good here now," Forest told himself, "I never can."

All afternoon he paced his office floor, thinking, thinking, searching for a way by which he might still involve himself in the controversy. Telephoning his wife that he should want no supper, he went on with the struggle until the shuffling of many feet over the Broadway walks reminded him of the night's mass-meeting. Thinking to find some inspiration there, he joined the crowd.

SHE SMILED AND THOUGHT SHE KNEW THE "SOMEBODY ELSE" IN THE CASE

The meeting stood a belligerent unit. Rousing speeches followed fast one upon another. Colonel Van Duzee told at length of his plans. But Forest lost interest. His eye wandering presently fell upon a commanding old man at the back of the audience, a stranger in Seminole. On a sudden he placed him.

Then with the recollection the idea for which he had been searching all afternoon and evening abruptly gripped him. The bare scheme, bold, fantastic even, swiftly grew big within him. Details—vague, chimerical, immature—resolved themselves into a semblance of practicability. While Colonel Van Duzee was still speaking Forest struck off for home.

His wife was waiting up for him.

"Oh, Dick," she greeted him eagerly, "what about the big case, the trouble with the railroad? To-night's Herald said that every lawyer in Seminole was to take some part in it. But your name wasn't there. You're in the case, aren't you?"

"Yes," said Forest grimly. "Yes, I'm in it."

"Oh, I knew the paper was wrong," she cried gladly. "Which side are you on?"

"Both," replied the lawyer.

Distracted though it was by the excitement of the railroad squabble, Seminole still found time to marvel at Lawyer Forest's puzzling activity through the next day. It was rumored that he had got a case. It was rumored that he had abandoned the law and was looking for a job. The town as a whole could make nothing of it.

Between breakfast and luncheon he inspected the register of the Valley House; called on Captain Hogarth, the retired civil engineer, and with him pottered for an hour over great maps of the county; visited the City Hall, and, much to the Recorder's disgust, insisted that the City's copy of the West Trunk's local franchise be dragged from the vault for his inspection; closeted himself with each of the town's real-estate dealers; interviewed the officers of the Union Packing Company. Immediately after luncheon he rented a team and cutter, and by a most unfrequented route, with many stops, drove ten miles north to Cannon Rapids, made a few inquiries there, then returned to Seminole in season for supper.

At eight o'clock that evening Forest called upon Mayor Arlo Crane at his residence. The Mayor, mildly surprised—the pair had met but once before—received the lawyer in his library. He had just lit a cigar; he offered Forest one.

"Mayor Crane," began Forest directly, "I want you—for the City—to give me the contract to bring about an immediate and peaceful settlement of the controversy between Seminole and the West Trunk System."

The Mayor, quite taken aback, rose to his feet.

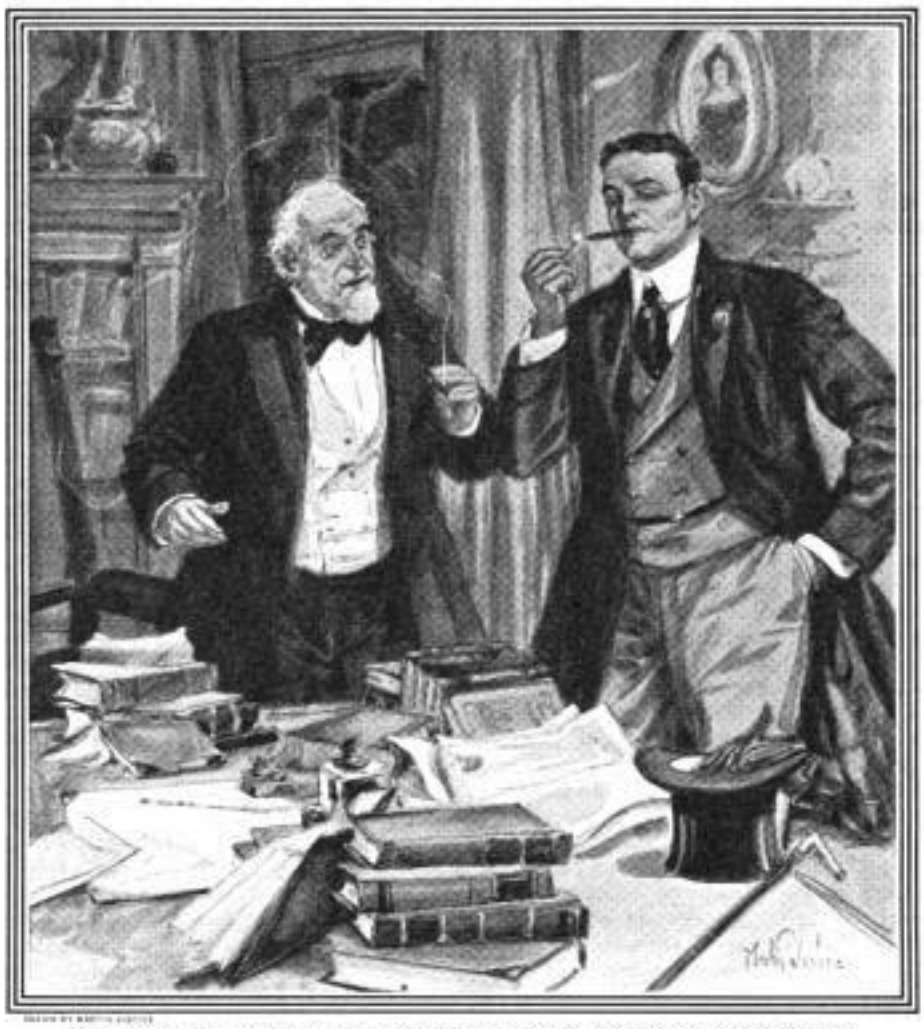
"Peace! settlement!" he vociferated. "I am astonished, Mr. Forest. We, the people of Seminole, are for war. We are in want of warriors, sir, not peacemakers. And," he continued brusquely, "supposing for the moment that I wished a peacemaker, do you not think that it should be my privilege to call him to me, at my own time?"

"My position here to-night," rejoined Forest quietly, "is that of the man who comes before you with an asphalt pavement to sell—who believes he has something that you, standing for the City, can use. From what I have learned to-day I know a settlement such as I have in mind to be valuable—vital even—to both town and railroad. I believe I have plans and information to enable me, acting for both sides, to effect that settlement. My services I proffer on a business basis."

Mayor Crane doubtfully sank again into his chair and took a fresh grip on his cigar.

"Well, well," he assented stiffly, "what is it you wish to propose, then?"

"Before I propose anything," answered Forest, "I want to tell you what some of those things I learned to-day were. This morning I looked a bit into the West Trunk's rights here. I had the City's copy of their franchise brought out. From the cobwebs on its outside and the wording within it was easy to see that no one in Seminole had consulted that paper for a good many years. It was equally plain that the railroad had consulted its copy very lately. The franchise defines the West Trunk's yard property as bounded by Terrace Street on the west and California Avenue on the east—we all know that, of course. But afterward it goes on to say that the railroad 'shall be permitted, at whatsoever point or points within those yards it may find convenient, to locate and erect depots and other necessary buildings.' Well, Mayor Crane, the West Trunk finds it convenient now to locate its passenger depot at California Avenue—quite as convenient there as at Broadway. And how are we going to get around it by law? The arrangement is very inconvenient for Seminole, no doubt. But where is there anything in the franchise about Seminole's convenience?"



The Mayor frowned thoughtfully at the floor, his cigar smouldering unnoticed in one limp hand.

"Possibly," argued Forest, "after years of litigation the City's counselors will quash that franchise. But, in the mean time, our real-estate men tell me, attracted by the depot, an undesired addition to Seminole will spring up in the Apple Blossom neighborhood. Particularly a new, cheap business district will grow up there. Broadway businesses will lose trade, properties will stand idle. That compactness of the city which now holds real estate so high will be disrupted. Indeed, the change has already begun. In my rounds of the real-estate offices I learned of a dozen options secured by out-of-town parties on lots near the depot."

The Mayor still frowned thoughtfully. His cigar burnt out.

"Also," Forest proceeded after a silence, "I called this morning on the Union Packing Company people. I found them discussing offers of sites and bonuses from three cities down the State. The Union people told me—their tone was not threatening, only businesslike—that the closing of their spur was causing them teaming of products, extra handling and delay that they could not afford. I suppose," mused the lawyer, "that the trade of those three hundred families that go with the plant will be worth a good deal to whichever city the company chooses."

"Don't say any more," the Mayor abruptly protested. "I know what you're leading to. You want to make out that the City did wrong in cutting the D Street spur. Well—you've told me some very disturbing things, I'll say that. And, well," he hesitated, "I will admit, in strict confidence, that the spur matter may have been ill-advised—I say may have been, mind you. But even so——"

"I WANT YOU—FOR THE CITY—TO GIVE ME THE CONTRACT TO BRING ABOUT AN IMMEDIATE AND PEACEFUL SETTLEMENT"

"Supposing," interrupted Forest sharply, hastening to grip his opportunity, "that the West Trunk depot were returned to Broadway, would you sanction the reopening of the packing-house spur?"

"Yes," returned the Mayor slowly, "I would. But," he objected, fast getting command of himself again, "for you to persuade the railroad to that I should first have to raise the white flag. I am a proud man, Mr. Forest—an old man—I cannot make the first move toward peace. I cannot allow you to repeat the admissions I have made."

"But," persisted Forest, "if I find that I can bring about the return of the depot without violating your conditions, shall I proceed?"

"Yes," answered Mayor Crane, "I am safe in agreeing to that—you have set for yourself an impossible task."

Nevertheless, in the uncomfortable hour between three and four Saturday morning Forest quite cheerfully rose, in a hack jolted out the rude trail that had been broken to California Avenue, and took train for Chicago to call upon Mr. Roswell Gregory, president of the West Trunk System.

In the West Trunk's offices it took Forest some time to get from the president's anteroom to the president's private office, but when at length he scaled the bulwarks of red tape he found behind them a heavy-set man, cordial, good-humored, open to reason. As Forest advanced his settlement project he saw he had Mr. Gregory interested. At length the president remarked with a chuckle:

"It's new—the lawyer turning peacemaker—but I don't know but what there's something in it. Go ahead now—what is it you want me to do?"

"I want you to consent," answered Forest frankly, "to the return of the Seminole passenger depot to Broadway, on condition that I secure the reopening of the packing-house spur."

To prove that action in the spur matter must be speedy or not at all, Forest told of his visit to the packing-house. Then he proceeded to facts tending to show that the depot's early presence at Broadway was equally urgent.

"In the crowd at the anti-West Trunk mass-meeting at Seminole," he narrated, "I saw Mr. L. W. Butler, president of the 'K' Route. I worked here in Chicago at one time in the building where the 'K' has its office; Mr. Butler had been pointed out to me often. It came to me that night that his line lay only ten miles away—to the north. I wondered if he was not planning to reap the benefit of Seminole's squabble with the West Trunk by running a branch into the heart of the town. In the morning I looked about a bit; I found his name on the register of the Valley House. With him was Mr. D. Reed, whom the Railway Guide places as the 'K's' chief engineer."

"But," objected Gregory, puzzled, "they can't get into Seminole. There's a rocky, ridgy country to the north there that would eat up a million dollars a mile."

"Well," answered Forest, "I didn't know anything about that then, and I asked Captain Hogarth, an old engineer in Seminole, what would be the 'K's' likeliest route. At first the Captain said there was no way through those ridges you speak of, but finally, studying over his maps, on the theory that easy grades are to be found along the banks of watercourses, we hit upon a route. Yesterday afternoon I drove over it—by following Coon Creek out of Seminole, got north into the rough country, made a portage there of perhaps ten rods to the Cannon River, and following the Cannon got on north and out of the rough country to the line of the 'K' at Cannon Rapids station. Asking from farmhouse to farmhouse, I found that Mr. Butler and another man—Reed undoubtedly—had been over the same route, going in the opposite direction, the day before. They had a team and cutter, but ranged over most of the ground on foot, and gave some ten hours to the job. Of the 'K's' intentions you, of course, are the judge, but I can say that if they do come in, no matter if they give the Seminole folks nothing better than box-cars to ride in, the West Trunk might as well cross Seminole off its map."

"I'm obliged to you," Gregory assured Forest heartily, after the two had talked for a half-hour more, "for calling on me. I don't mind telling you, between ourselves, that if I had known about that hole in the hills the Seminole depot would be at Broadway to-day. But now the thing's done we must stand by it. Should we back down at Seminole a dozen of our towns who fancy they have grievances would promptly go at us. If you can reopen the packing-house spur we'll consent to the return of the depot. But we can't make the first move. If you can swing your settlement in view of those conditions, go ahead."

"The situation," explained Forest to his wife that night, "is this: Mayor Crane wants peace, is willing to pay for it, but his pride is in the way; he won't move first. President Gregory wants peace, is willing to pay for it, but principles intervene; he won't move first. There's just one way out of it: somebody else will have to make that first move."

When from time to time during Sunday Nellie Forest looked in upon her husband as he sat in his den scowling through a fog of tobacco-smoke, piecing together ideas that had come to him at the mass-meeting, at the Mayor's, on the train returning from Chicago, she smiled and thought she knew the "somebody else" in the case.

Forest's Monday morning did not much smack of action—at California Avenue a thoughtful survey of the old brown depot sitting forlorn and uncomfortable upon its flat-cars; a chat inside with the ticket clerk; a tramp down the railroad yard and out the packing-house spur to D Street; a leisurely inspection there of the sections of track lying capsized and melancholy by the roadside.

But when abruptly the whistle of the packing-house outburst tumultuous in the twelve o'clock call there was a change. Hurrying over the remainder of the spur Forest entered the plant yard, and from the crowd of nooning hands sought out his neglectful client, the hero of the Erin Club ball, Roderick Mullen.

"Mullen," said Forest bluntly, "from a financial standpoint I can't say much for you. But, just the same, I think you are the man to help me with a little job I have on hand. I want a live man—and I know you're that."

"Now, your honor," expostulated Mullen, "every day I've had that little indebtedness on my mind."

"Well," returned Forest dryly, "now is your chance to square up. Can you pick out of the plant here, do you think, thirty husky men who are keen for a bit of overtime and won't gossip, and have them outside the main gate at half-past ten to-night? And can you, by the same hour, get together two dozen crowbars, some big wrenches, a batch of lanterns, and say fifty feet of stout rope?"

"Is it a burglary or a lynching that you want us for, sir?" inquired Mullen with a grin.

"It's a job worth ten dollars to you, and two apiece to the other boys," answered the lawyer crisply. "It'll be a worthy work."

"But we don't want any one to catch us at it; I see, sir," commented the stevedore sympathetically. "Well," he decreed after meditation, "I think I can arrange it."

It was very dark and very cold that night in Seminole—wintry enough to keep the town's four night-policemen on duty about the redhot stove at headquarters. Forest, swinging westward between rows of close-shuttered houses shortly after ten, noticed with satisfaction that he was the only man abroad. But he was still better pleased, upon arriving before the packing-house gate, to have a huge shape suddenly rise up betwixt him and the murky sky, and remark in the cheery voice of Mr. R. Mullen:

"I have the paraphernalia all assembled, sir, and the pirates as well—thirty of them shivering by the fence there."

"Well," responded Forest briskly, "we'll give them something to warm them up."

Mysteriously from out the gloom a whispering group of brawny spectres appeared, burdened with vague accoutrements that jostled with muffled clinkings, and in a moment more Forest had them stumbling away from the plant between the dimly-seen rails of the famous D Street spur.

At D Street Forest halted the party and ordered lanterns lit.

"Mullen," he directed, "pick out the twenty strongest men here."

When this had been accomplished after fierce whispered discussion, he continued:

"The ten who are left will take all the lanterns but two, half the crowbars, and the wrenches, and stay here under Mullen. It will be your job, Mullen, to put this packing-house spur into commission. Here"—Forest raised a lantern high—"is your track right convenient—save that it's bottom up—in six sections. And here, in a pile"—he swung his lantern over another spot—"are your fish-plates, bolts and nuts. Right the sections, work them into place with your 'bars—the wind's swept the ground clear here; you can see by the grooves the ties left where the track was originally—then couple up with the fish-plates."

"In other words," hazarded the boss stevedore, "you want us to do just what the policemen did, only backward."

"Exactly. But be sure of this—don't start work until twelve by the City Hall bell. Now," Forest turned to the picked twenty, "you strong chaps gather up all the stuff the other fellows aren't needing and come with me."

Cautiously, with lanterns out, Forest led his detachment, across open fields, on a great detour about the northern outskirts of the town, to bring it to a halt before the West Trunk passenger depot standing dark and deserted upon the Apple Blossom meadows, the ticket clerk long since departed, rising into the night there a vague, grotesque bulk, solitary, abandoned. Ahead the yard lay silent, empty, showing never a light anywhere save the reds and greens of the switch lamps, and the yellow glint that marked the window of the telegraph office in the freight-house a mile and more away.

"Our job," Forest advised his followers, "will be to put this depot back at Broadway—starting at twelve. If any of you fellows haven't been up here in daylight, I'll say the depot's on wheels—on flat-cars—and this siding it's on stands clear all the way downtown—hasn't been used since the depot's blocked this end. There aren't any telegraph wires to bother us—the company hasn't rigged them into the depot yet." These things Forest had learned in his morning's chat with the ticket clerk. "It'll simply be a question of hard pulling and keeping quiet about it."

The lanterns lighted for a moment, the stairs to the depot's doors were loosened, and the stout rope Mullen had provided made fast to the head coupling of the forward flat-car. Half of the packers, with Forest, manned the cable. The rest, with crowbars, took station by the trucks of the flats. Things were barely ready when the City Hall bell laboriously began its midnight task.

The men at the rope bent their backs. The men by the trucks put the points of their 'bars behind the wheels, and pried. With a gleeful squeal from the wheel bearings beneath, the West Trunk passenger depot departed—gradually—from California Avenue.

Over the half-mile level between the Avenue and the top of the Long Grade the pace was sluggish, halting; a foot, an inch at a time—a tireless, interminable heaving and tugging and prying. There were no sounds save the panting of the men, the crisp crackling of their boots over the brittle snow-crust, and now and then the sharp clangor of a crowbar falling across a rail. But the packers reveled in the enterprise. "Hallowe'en in the winter-time," they called it. And once over the brow of the grade the real work was done. The flats began to move for themselves; presently it became necessary to set a brake.

No trains swept in from the east or west. Seminole folks slept on in their shuttered houses. No inquiring head appeared in the operator's window. Nobody watched the depot on its stubby train stealing down the long siding through the frosty night save the blinking eyes of the switch lamps. Nobody else saw the depot come to a stop at two o'clock Tuesday morning, squarely opposite its abandoned foundations at the Broadway crossing.

To the aid of Roderick Mullen, then, Forest hurried his party. But when he arrived at D Street the boss stevedore proudly greeted him:

"Sure, sir, I'm in the wrong business; I was simply born for this track-laying."

"All done?" asked Forest.

"Complete," returned Mullen.

A lantern in either hand Forest had a look around. But Mullen had been justly proud. The missing sections of the spur had been replaced with real skill.

"You started at twelve?" Forest questioned him finally.

"At the first tap of the bell," Mullen assured him.

At seven o'clock, on Broadway, Forest and Mayor Crane stood talking. Before them the West Trunk depot, the prodigal, loomed black and bulky against the sun-flooded east.

"And so," Forest was saying, "I made the first move myself. I didn't move for one side before the other; both works began simultaneously, at midnight. Haven't you got your depot back without having to ask for it? In reopening the spur didn't I stand on your agreement? Do you see where the railroad has got any the better of the town?"

"Why, no," responded the Mayor, beaming long at the depot. "Why no, I don't know as I do."

Already Forest, by telegraph, had asked similar questions—with appropriate alterations—of President Gregory.

But Gregory was long in replying. Toward noon Forest started from his office for the freight-house to see if any message had come in over the railroad wires. But gaining the street he halted.

Squarely in front of the depot, blocking Broadway, lay the Omaha Express. It was no moment's stop for orders. The engine stood immobile, at rest, its boiler steaming and humming comfortably, the measured exhausts of its air-pump purring deliberate in the stack. The engineer was out of the cab with his oil can. From the mail-and-baggage car pouches and trunks were being unloaded. Passengers were stepping off the platforms of the coaches.

"I guess," commented Forest, "that settles that."

Two days later the lawyer, in his office, from two checks was making these entries in his journal:

To West Trunk System.
In re "Settlement Proceedings."

Services,	$250.00
Expense, labor, etc., pro rata,	40.00

To City of Seminole.
In re Do.

Services,	250.00
Expense, labor, etc., pro rata,	40.00

When he had done his eye fell upon his spotless case book. "Keep up your courage, old chap," he murmured with a friendly pat. "I'm better known here than I was. I think the next row I tackle I'll handle through the court-house."

As Forest spoke, shouts, hoarse and alarming, penetrated his tight-shut windows. But Forest smiled at them; it was only the foreman of the railroad gang superintending the descent of the depot from its flat-cars.

Money Kings of the World

Some European Potentates

By W. T. Stead

EUROPE, according to the Almanach de Gotha, is governed by the Czar and the Kaiser, Francis Joseph of Austria-Hungary, the Kings of Italy and of Spain, and the President of the French Republic. The minor monarchs of the smaller kingdoms need not be enumerated. But the Crédit Lyonnais is more potent in France than M. Loubet. M. Witte overshadows the throne in Russia. The Pope with his millions at the Vatican is more powerful than his Royal neighbor at the Quirinal, and in Germany the Kaiser would be powerless without his financiers.

Of all the Money Kings of Europe by far the most conspicuous and by far the most powerful is the Russian Minister of Finance. He is the modern Joseph of the Muscovite Pharaoh. He, more than any modern statesman, has realized the sovereignty of money. The Imperial sceptre, backed by its army of millions of armed men, is to him almost as much an anachronism as the blunderbuss. When he wishes to annex a province he does it not by a soldier but by a banker. When he wishes to consolidate the power of the Government he does it not by freeing the press or by conceding parliamentary institutions, but by consolidating great industries, monopolizing national trade, until people begin to wonder whether any property will be left in Russia that is not owned and administered by the State. But M. Witte's astonishing exploits in converting the historic Empire of the Romanoff into an immense monopoly of the means both of production and of distribution have been dealt with in these columns by another pen. So with this brief allusion to the most remarkable and significant of the Money Kings of the Old World, I proceed with a rapid survey of our other potentates and millionaires.

There are many millionaires in Russia, but the autocracy is too strong for them even to aspire to convert it into a plutocracy. Some of the Russian nobles are immensely rich, but their wealth gives them no direct voice in the affairs of the State. The merchant millionaire and the Siberian mine owner have no ambition to wield political power. Many of them can hardly sign their names and many of them prefer the primitive abacus to the multiplication table. Yet they are not without public spirit.

There is only one other case on record, I believe, of a multi-millionaire with anything like Mr. Rhodes' wealth leaving all his fortune for public purposes. That instance occurred in Russia just a year before Mr. Rhodes' death. The testator, M. G. G. Solodoonikoff, was a Moscow millionaire, who had made his immense fortune chiefly by colossal speculations on the Bourse, and partly by the immense appreciation which has taken place in the value of real property in Russia. He was one of the largest shareholders in the Moscow-Archangel Railway prior to its purchase by the Crown, and made enormous profits out of this railway. M. Solodoonikoff was also the biggest shareholder in the Moscow-Kazan Railway. He held shares in so many different undertakings that it was said the handling of coupons alone gave constant employment to ten clerks. M. Solodoonikoff was a miser. He lived in a dilapidated two-storied little house surrounded by rotting furniture. He lived a life almost altogether locked up in himself, spending nearly all day at home and half of it in a dressing-gown. He had been abroad and knew Western European life; and like Mr. Rhodes had journalistic ambitions, once actually going so far as to buy the Russian Illustrated Gazette. He carried on negotiations with various journalists, and had arranged everything, when on the day the contracts were to be signed he drew back, fearing the risk of losing a few thousand rubles. Moscow perpetually rang with anecdotes of the penuriousness and at the same time of the extraordinary business capacity of Solodoonikoff. Toward the end of his life he aged rapidly, and was fond of sitting in his ancient saloon telling his visitors of the celebrities who had sat on his dirty, threadbare sofa.

M. Solodoonikoff apparently had never done any good in his life. But he was determined, nevertheless, that his wealth should not be spent unproductively after his death. When the will was opened it was found that he had left his immense fortune, estimated at from about 40,000,000 rubles, or 30,000,000 dollars, to 100,000,000 rubles, or 75,000,000 dollars, to public purposes. His property was to be realized in the course of the next ten or fifteen years, and after payment of a few small legacies of from $25,000 to $150,000 to relations and friends, the whole was left to the public. The millions were to be divided into three equal parts, the first portion to be spent on the building of secondary schools for girls on the model of the Female Gymnasium in the town of Orloff; the Editor's Note—This is the seventh paper in Mr. Stead's series. The eighth and concluding paper will appear in an early number.

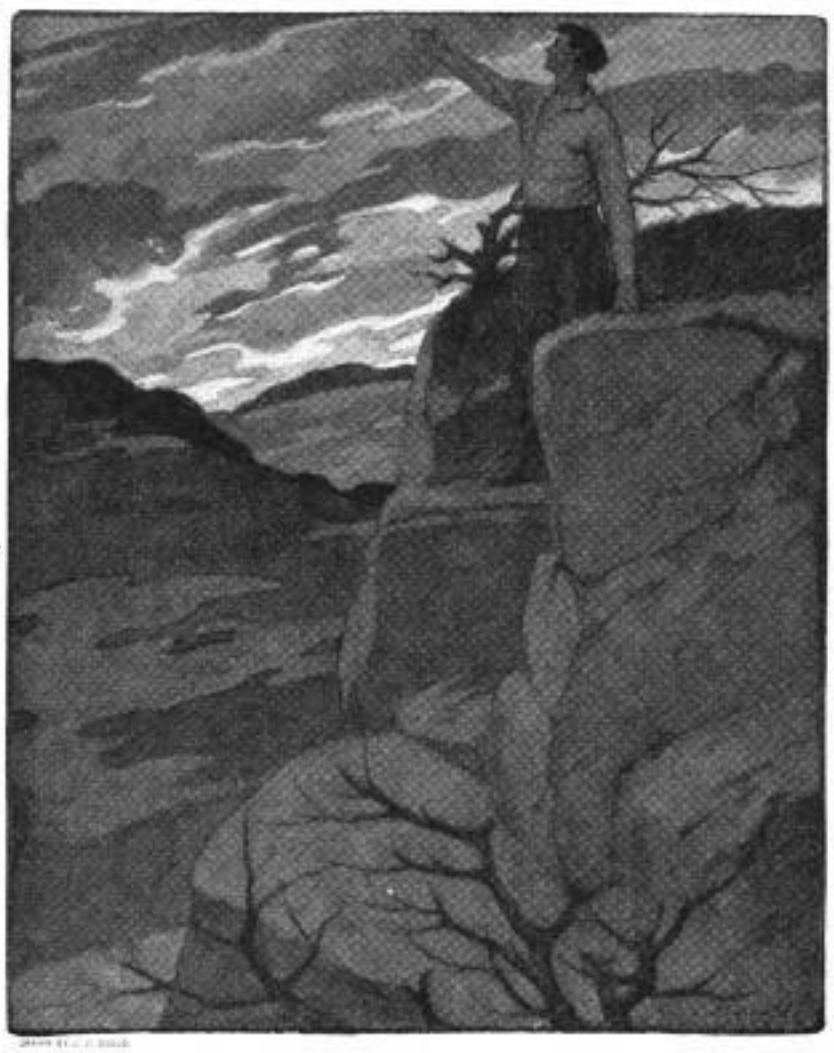
Digitized by Google

second third to be spent on industrial training schools for men and women, the building and organization of which was to be left to the Zemstvos or County Councils; the third part on the building of cheap lodgings for the working-class.

Curiously enough, almost on the same day died another Moscow millionaire, K. T. Soldatenkoff, a neighbor, co-shareholder and benefactor like Solodoonikoff. But, whereas Solodoonikoff has left his millions to charity after his death, Soldatenkoff had spent his in good works during his life, and had gained the name of the best man in Moscow.

In Austria the most notable of millionaires was the late Baron Hirsch, who made most of his money building railways in the Balkans and in speculation on the Bourse. He was reputed, erroneously, no doubt, to have financed the Prince of Wales. But it is true that his immense wealth gave him a position in Austria to which no Jew but a Rothschild had previously dared to aspire. Like the Moscow millionaires his chief renown arose from his benefactions. There is something magnificent in a bequest of $35,000,000 given by one of the richest of the sons of Israel to improve the condition of his poorer compatriots. It is to be regretted that, although Baron Hirsch's intentions were of the best, the application of the enormous sum has by no means realized the hope of the munificent founder.



Another famous Jew who made millions in railway construction was M. Jean Bloch, the eminent Warsaw banker and political economist. M. Bloch, although influential as a money king, was much better known by his writings, and especially by his prophetic encyclopædic work on the Future of War. M. Bloch was a statesman and a seer as well as a great railway builder and financier. He spent his money lavishly in the promotion of his ideas, and on his death he left large sums to be devoted to public charities and to the education of girls.

In Scandinavia the manufacture of dynamite gave Alfred Nobel an almost regal position. The dynamite king abstained during his life from taking any part in public affairs, but on his death he left a fortune of $10,000,000 to found prizes to be distributed annually in lump sums of about $40,000 each to the five persons who have rendered best service to their fellow-men. The Nobel prizes are awarded annually, first, to the man who has made the most important discovery in the domain of physical science; secondly, to the man who has made the most important discovery or introduced the greatest improvement in chemistry; thirdly, to the author of the most important discovery in the domain of physiology or medicine; fourthly, to the man who has produced the most remarkable literary work of an idealistic nature; and fifthly, to the man who has done the most and the best work for the fraternity of the nations, the suppression or reduction of standing armies, and the formation and propagation of peace congresses.

It is worth while to record the testimony of this master of many millions as to the evil of inherited wealth. Speaking shortly before his death he said: "I am a thorough Social Democrat, but with moderation. Experience has taught me that great fortunes acquired by inheritance never bring happiness; they only dull the faculties. Any man possessing a large fortune ought not to leave more than a small part of it to his heirs, not even to his direct heirs—just enough to make their way in the world."

In Denmark the only money king is Jacobsen, the brewer. Jacobsen I presented to the State or spent in scientific or philanthropic purposes about five million dollars. The Carlsberg fund which he founded celebrated its twenty-fifth anniversary in 1901, when his son, Jacobsen II, handed over the famous brewery, the source of all their wealth, to the fund, only reserving for himself and his family one-third of the income for fifty years. Jacobsen also presented Copenhagen with the largest private collection of sculpture in the world, the estimated value of which was not less than three million dollars.

I shall say nothing about the money kings of France, who, although they are personally of small account, are collectively omnipotent, nor of the wealthiest nobleman in Spain, who is almost the only aristocrat who has displayed great financial and business capacity; nor shall I even dwell on the Pope, whose exchequer is fed by the offerings of the faithful all over the world. I will proceed at once to the German Empire.

Free-Born

By Thornton Sherburne Hardy

Who is hill-born is free-born:
He will never learn
To count his steps by garden lengths,
His prayers by the bell.
He will grow careless of his ease,
Impatient of the fat, forgetful face of Nature
Satisfied,
The smug propriety, the trim content
Of bordered walks and barbered turf;
He will be always casting up the wind,
Faint for the voices of the waters warring,
Eager for the rude Northern airs,
The sheer ascent;
Eager to hear again
His feet go ringing up the stony ways
Of those lean, flinty pastures set against the skies.
Till at the last he must turn back,
Back from the smothered comfort of the garden close,
To the gray, frost-faced fields,
The stunted orchard, the low, ragged wall,
The blue fir standing sentinel,
High on the very verge of the world,
Watching, far north of him,
Pricked out against the polar sky,
Faint, remote illimitably,
Arcturus, coursing his nightly round.

The rapid growth of the money power in modern Germany dates from the Franco-German war. When the victorious legions of the newly-proclaimed German Emperor came home, bringing with them the war indemnity of a thousand million dollars, the whole nation flung itself into industrial pursuits.

The distinctive features of the evolution of German industry are due to the men who led the advance, and most of all to the measures which a paternal government took to purge the economic body of the young Empire of impurities which tended to imperil the reputation of the German nation. The fate of German banquiers who ventured to experiment with the stringent company law of their country offers a curious and instructive contrast to that of similar speculators in England and America. And in this contrast lies one of the secrets of the standing which German commercial and financial giants enjoy at the present time among nations. The thoroughness and many-sidedness of German education, the close union between German commerce and science, have done much to enable her to dispute the commercial supremacy of Great Britain.

After the Franco-German war the establishment of a central banking institution for the whole country removed many barriers to free commercial relations. The Imperial Bank of Germany (Deutsche Reichsbank) is, strictly speaking, only a local institution, which, like the Bank of England, Banque de France and nearly all other national banks of issue, is unable to establish branches outside its immediate sphere of activity. As Prussia was the predominant partner in the young Empire, it was only natural that the leading banking institution of the closer confederation of the various states should spring from the State Bank of Prussia, or as it was called, the Royal Prussian Haupt-bank. The directorate of this old-established company was partly nominated by the Government, which a few months before the outbreak of the Franco-German war promoted to that body a young lawyer named Richard Koch, who was born at Kattbus in Brandenburg thirty-six years previously. He had at that time a distinguished record behind him, having been appointed an assistant judge before he was thirty-two, and acting as secretary to a Royal commission which deliberated on the Prussian Civil Code from 1868 to 1870. The eventful years following the establishment of a united Empire led to far-reaching changes in every sphere of public life, and when the new Reichsbank had overcome the initial difficulties of the gold standard it soon directed its attention to the growing needs of the commercial community, which by means of the new currency had attained a much more important position in the world's trade. The introduction of a modern banking and credit system was one of the earliest requirements, and when the directorate in 1876 decided upon the adoption of the English method of checks and "clearing" Director Koch was invited to assist in the carrying out of the reform. It may be mentioned here that his plan of checks taking to a very large extent the place of banknotes, and thereby acting in relief of the issuing bank, has never yet been fully realized. The German trade, both large and small, prefers ready money in the shape of cash or notes to the check, which, with its greater security in transmission, only ranks as money after it has passed through the "clearing-house." Herr Koch became vice-president of the Reichsbank eleven years after he had joined its board, and at the death of its first president, Herr von Dechend, he assumed the direction of the institution.

If the Reichsbank played an important part in the growth and development of the national credit of Germany, the financial foundations of the Empire were certainly laid by the banking firm of S. Bleichroder, which dates back to the early days of the nineteenth century, but which became important only when it was connected with the Rothschilds, whom it has represented in the capital of Prussia since the twenties. Gerson Bleichroder, the son of the founder of the firm, whom he succeeded in 1855 at the age of thirty-three, soon gained the friendship of Prince Bismarck and assisted the Government in several important financial operations which preceded the wars of 1864 and 1866 against Denmark and Austria. The success of the Prussian State Railways is largely due to the skill by which the acquisition and the building of new lines were carried out.

XVII—Continued

FROTHINGHAM'S "representative" was Lawrence, attorney to the British Consulate at Chicago, a brother of Gerald Boughton's mother. He had come to America thirty years before because he could make a living there and could not make a living at home. He had renounced allegiance to the British throne because by doing so his income was doubled. But at heart he regarded himself as a British subject and, while he pretended to be an American, was so savagely critical of things American that every one disliked him. He wore the long, slim side whiskers which were the fashion when he left home; he talked with the lisp then affected as the "hall-mark" of a gentleman. He disliked Americans; he despised Anglo-Americans of the Hooper type; Hooper himself he loathed as an intolerable upstart, successful where he, of the "upper class," was barely able to keep chin above water.

When he came into Hooper's study at the hour fixed by Frothingham he was an accurate representation of the supercilious, frozen-faced "swell" of the Piccadilly district a quarter of a century before. Hooper knew that he was of the "upper class," but had not the faintest deference for him. Hooper had been Americanized to the extent of caring nothing for mere family. It took a title to stir his dormant instincts of servility; the untitled Lawrence was a man to be judged by American standards, as he understood them. Lawrence was not a millionaire and not on the way toward that goal of every rational ambition; Hooper, therefore, had no more respect for him than he had for any other "failure."

"You've come to explain about the Earl of Frothingham," began Hooper in the arrogant voice he used at business. "But it's not necessary. I'm well informed as to Lord Frothingham's family and am satisfied he's what he represents himself to be."

Lawrence combed his long, lean "Dundrearys" with his slim white fingers. The joy of battle gleamed in his eyes. "I can't imagine," he replied—he had a broad accent and drawl, said "cawn't" and "fawncy"—"why you should fancy I came here to insult Lord Frothingham, whose representative I have the honor to be."

"Insult? What do you mean, Mr. Lawrence?" demanded Hooper, his voice courageous, but not his eyes.

Lawrence felt he had been right in thinking that no American would negotiate for the purchase of a title unless he were at bottom a "groveling snob." "There could not be a question of Lord Frothingham's character," he said. "And as for his family, there's none more illustrious in England."

"Certainly, certainly. I've admitted all that. I assumed that Lord Frothingham was sending you through over-anxiety—not unnatural when he's so far from home."

"My business with you, Mr. Hooper," continued Lawrence, "relates to settlements." Hooper's pretense—"the shallow device of a bargain-hunter"—disgusted him.

Hooper waved his hand—a broad, thick, stumpy-fingered hand. "Oh, I've no doubt Lord Frothingham will do the right thing by my daughter. And besides, I intend to do something for her—no one ever accused Amzi Hooper of stinginess."

"That is gratifying," said Lawrence. "We shall no doubt have not the slightest difficulty in reaching an understanding. What, may I ask, is the—aw—extent of the settlement you purpose to make—upon your daughter and—and Lord Frothingham."

Hooper's face grew red. "You may ask, sir, but I'll not answer. I'm not in the habit of discussing my private affairs with *any*body."

Lawrence was angry also—"the fellow's taking me for a fool," he thought. But he knew he must control himself; so he answered smoothly: "This is extraordinary—most extraordinary, Mr. Hooper. You've had some experience—aw—in foreign marriages——"

Hooper dropped sullenly before this poisoned shaft.

"And," continued Lawrence, "you must know that settlements are the matter of course."

"No, sir!" exclaimed Hooper, pounding the desk. "I know nothing of the sort. When my oldest daughter married they talked to me about settlements, but I refused to have anything to do with it."

Lawrence, in fact all Chicago, knew that Hooper, who was not nearly so rich then, had settled a quarter of a million upon the Papal nobleman and half a million on his daughter, and had engaged to settle a quarter of a million more upon the first male child of the marriage. "We should, of course, not be satisfied with the settlements you made upon the Duke of Valdunomia," said he, ignoring Hooper's falsehood.

Hooper winced, looked bluster, thought better of it, said quietly: "You've been misinformed, Mr. Lawrence. I made no settlements. But I gave the young people enough to set them up comfortably."

"Lord Frothingham's position forbids him to consider any such arrangement as that, Mr. Hooper. You know how it is with the great families. They have station, rank, tradition to maintain. They——"

"I won't bribe any man to marry my daughter. That ain't the American way." This was said, not fiercely, but, on the contrary, in a conciliatory tone and manner.

"IT'S UN-AMERICAN, SIR, TO MAKE ANY SETTLEMENT AT ALL"

Lawrence sneered—inwardly—at this "cheap clap-trap," and said: "That's sound—and eminently creditable to you, sir. But you will bear in mind that Lord Frothingham is an English nobleman, the head of a distinguished family, and that your daughter is about to become his Countess, an Englishwoman, the mother of a line of English noblemen. Do I make myself clear?"

"Perfectly. Perfectly. And I've not the least objection to doing what's right. I want to make it clear that I'm giving only out of generosity and affection, and a desire to see my girl properly established."

"No one who knows you will doubt that," said Lawrence so blandly that Hooper could find no fault, could not understand why he was irritated. "And now that we're on common ground I hope you'll give me some—aw—data—so that I may draw up the necessary papers."

"Has Frothingham any debts?" asked Hooper abruptly, after a thoughtful pause.

"There are about fifteen thousand pounds of personal obligations," replied Lawrence carelessly, "and a matter of perhaps a hundred thousand pounds as a charge on the entailed estate. I understand the entailed part is all that's left; but the estates can be, should be, restored to what they were until a hundred or a hundred and fifty years ago."

"Um!" muttered Hooper.

"The debt represents, I believe," continued Lawrence, "the wild oats and careless management of previous generations. The present Earl has been—remarkably steady, they tell me, considering his station and opportunities and the example of his father and grandfather."

Hooper had read with an attention that made his memory leechlike every word of every sketch of Frothingham and the Gordon-Beauvais family in the Chicago papers. Lawrence's aristocratic allusions were, therefore, full of suggestion and moved him profoundly. "Well," said he, "I should say, in round numbers, that a million would straighten the young man out and set them housekeeping in good style."

There was a queer gleam in Lawrence's eyes as he replied: "Very handsome, Mr. Hooper. Most satisfactory. Your daughter can take the position in England to which the Earl's rank entitles her." He looked as if he were reflecting; then, as if thinking aloud: "Let me see—a million pounds—five million——"

Hooper sprang to his feet. "You misunderstood me, Mr. Lawrence," he protested angrily, but nervously. "My daughter will have that—perhaps more than that—ultimately. But I meant dollars, not pounds."

Lawrence put on an expression of amazement. "I beg your pardon, Mr. Hooper, but really—really—you can't mean that. Two hundred thousand pounds would barely fetch them even. They'd have nothing to live on."

"Oh, of course I don't mean that I'd not give 'em anything in addition. We were talking only of settlements."

"Certainly. And you must see, Mr. Hooper, that it would be impossible for us to accept any settlement so inadequate. Some misfortune might overtake you and—you would be unable to carry out your present generous intentions."

"A million dollars is a big sum of money. It looks even bigger in England than here."

"But you are making a great alliance. A million dollars is a small sum in the circumstances—I mean, in view of the necessity of enabling your daughter to take all that her position as Countess of Frothingham entitles her to."

"Permit me to ask," said Hooper with some sarcasm, but not enough to conceal his anxiety, "what did Lord Frothingham expect in the way of settlement?" The multimillionaire had developed two powerful passions with age—avarice and social ambition. These were now rending each the other, and both were rending him.

"Lord Frothingham, of course, did not discuss the matter with me—a gentleman is, naturally, delicate in matters of money. He simply stated the posture of his affairs and left me in full charge. When I suggested to him that eight hundred thousand—pounds—would be adequate, he protested that that was too much. 'I wish Mr. Hooper to appreciate that it is his daughter I want,' said he. 'Make the least possible conditions. I'd be glad to marry her without a penny if my position permitted. It's hard to have to consider such things at this time,' he said. 'I'm sure we can pull through with seven hundred thousand.' I did not and do not agree with him, but I assented because I knew that you would liberally supplement the settlements."

Every sentence in that speech exasperated Mr. Hooper—perhaps Lawrence's persistence in expressing himself in pounds instead of in dollars most of all. Pounds made the huge sum demanded seem small, made his resistance seem mean and vulgar. He reflected for several minutes. "I won't do it," he said in a sudden gust of temper. "Half that is my final figure. I'll settle the obligations—the five hundred and seventy thousand dollars—and I'll entail five hundred thousand and give Jenny five hundred thousand for her lifetime, it to go afterward to the younger children."

Lawrence combed his whiskers with his fine fingers, shaking his head slowly as he did so. "But, Mr. Hooper——"

"That's final," interrupted Hooper. "It's bad enough—it's shameful—it's un-American, sir, to make any settlement at all."

At "un-American," Lawrence took advantage of the fact that Hooper was not looking at him to indulge in a glance of contemptuous amusement. "Nobody but an American," he said to himself, "could have dragged 'un-American' into such a discussion as this. The cad is dickering over his daughter like an old-clothes dealer over a bag of rags."

Hooper was talking again—talking loudly: "Not a cent more! Not a blamed cent more! If they need more after they're married, let 'em come to me for it. They'll get it. But I ain't fool enough to make 'em independent of me. I ain't going to give 'em a chance to forget the hand that feeds 'em. No, sir; I want my daughter to continue to love me and think of me."

There was no affectation in Lawrence's astonishment at this view of affection and the way to keep it. "Poor devil," he said to himself pityingly, "he's been so perverted by his wealth that he actually doesn't see he's taking the very course that'll make his children hate him." But he ventured only, "I'm certain, sir, from what I know of your daughter and Lord Frothingham that money could have no influence with them one way or the other."

Hooper smiled cynically. "It's human nature," he said. "The hand that feeds is the hand that's licked. I'll give

'em all they need whenever they need it. Do you suppose I've no pride in my daughter, in seeing that she makes a good appearance over there? But a million and a half is my outside figure for settlements."

"Practically less than a hundred thousand over and above the debts," replied Lawrence, irritatingly reverting to pounds. "That is, about four thousand a year for them to live on."

"Forty to fifty thousand a year, including Jenny's income," corrected Hooper, standing up for dollars. "And while I don't promise, still, if they behave, they can count on as much more from me."

"Nine thousand a year," said Lawrence, translating into pounds, "would hardly keep up Beauvais Hall in a pinched fashion. It would leave nothing for restoring the property; the Hall, for example, needs fifty thousand pounds at once to restore it."

The reasonableness, the unanswerableness of this presentation of the case exasperated Hooper. "They'll have to look to me afterward for that," he said angrily. "I've said my last word."

But Lawrence didn't believe him. He saw that, though avarice was uppermost for the moment, the "cad's craving" was a close second—then there was the daughter's aid. She would have something to say to her father when she knew of the hitch in the negotiations. He rose. "There's nothing further at present, Mr. Hooper. I shall be compelled strongly to advise Lord Frothingham against going on and engaging himself. I cannot do otherwise consistently, with my duty as the, as it were, guardian for the moment of his dignity and the dignity of his house. It may be that he will disregard my advice. But I don't see how he can, careless in sordid things and impetuous though he is. The prospect for an unhappy marriage would be too clear. Good-morning, sir."

Hooper shook hands with him lingeringly. Avarice forbade him to speak. "The Earl will come to your terms," it and shrewdness assured him. "If he don't the deal is still open, anyhow." His parting words were, "Give my regards to the young man. Tell him we hope to see him as usual, no matter how this affair comes out."

"The coarse brute," muttered Lawrence, as he stood without the doors of the granite palace. "The soul of a ham-seller, of a pig-sticker." And he took out his handkerchief and affectedly wiped the hand which Hooper had shaken. "Always a nasty business, this, of American upstarts buying into our nobility. It they weren't a lot of callous traders and money-grabbers they couldn't do it. And they usually negotiate at first hand, so that they can drive a closer bargain. And their best society, too! Beastly country—no wonder the women want to be traded out of it into civilization."

XVIII

THERE was a family council at the Hoopers' after luncheon that day—Mr. Hooper, his wife and Jeanne. The two women followed Hooper from the dining-room into his study, where he was pulling sullenly at his cigar and awaiting the attack. It was his wife who began: "Do you know why Lord Frothingham sent word he couldn't come to lunch, Pa? Jenny here is worried about it."

Mr. Hooper grunted. Finally he said: "I'm willing to do anything in reason to please Jenny. I don't approve of this title business. It ain't American. But as long as the young fellow has turned her head I was not disposed to stand in the way." He frowned fiercely. "But I tell you dat I won't be held up! And that fellow he sent here this morning was a plain highwaysman."

Mrs. Hooper and Jeanne looked significantly each at the other—they had had many talks about his growing stinginess, and they suspected him at once.. "What did he want?" inquired Mrs. Hooper.

"I don't propose to talk this thing over before Jenny. It's disgraceful that she should have gone into such a business. It ain't right that she should know about such things."

Jeanne's eyes filled with tears. "And I've told all the girls!" she exclaimed. "Everybody knows it. I can't back out now. The whole town'd be laughing at us. I'd be ashamed ever to show my face in the street again. You don't want to break my heart, do you, Pa?"

"You've made a sweet mess of it!" snarled her father. "You ought to have had better sense than to have told anybody till the business side of it was settled. I warned your Ma about that—I knew what was coming. Now, here you two've gone and given him the whip hand!"

"She got at the telephone before she told me," said Mrs. Hooper.

Neither she nor her husband suspected that Jeanne had thought of just this emergency of a wrangle over settlements and had decided that the best way to overcome her father's avarice was to put him in a position from which he could not recede. If Frothingham had not insisted on liberal settlements she would have prompted him to it. She was no more eager than was he to embark with small supplies in the hold when it was possible to lay in supplies a-plenty. And as her father had acted all her life upon his principle of paternal affection—"The hand that feeds is the hand that's licked"—she saw no harm in guiding her conduct toward him by another principle from the practical code. As she was about to engage in business, wasn't it common-sense to get as large a capital as she could? "We can't back out now," she repeated tearfully, watching him shrewdly through her tears.

"A pretty mess!" growled her father. But he was not really offended, partly because he was fond of his daughter and would have forgiven her almost anything, partly because he understood and sympathized with her eagerness to proclaim her triumph, chiefly because, now that he had thought it over, he was ready to accept Frothingham's terms. "The hope of getting more and the need of it will keep 'em tame," he reasoned. And he said, addressing the two women: "When that Lawrence fellow comes again to-morrow, as I'm dead sure he will, I'll close the matter. But you two keep your hands off!"

"SAY THAT MISS HOOPER'S AT THE TELEPHONE"

As soon as her father and mother were out of the way she went into the library and called up the Barneys. "Is Lord Frothingham there?" she asked.

"I'll put you on the switch to his room," was the reply. And presently a voice she recognized as Hutt's said: "Who wishes to speak to 'Is Lordship?"

"Say that Miss Hooper's at the telephone."

There was a pause, a murmur of voices—she was sure one of them was Frothingham's. Then Hutt answered: "'Is Lordship hain't 'ere just now, ma'am. Hany message, ma'am?"

She was trembling with alarm. "Just tell him that I called up, and that I'd like to speak to him when he comes in"—this in a rather shaky voice, for a great fear was gathering in around her, a fear that he had become offended at her father's stinginess and bartering and bargaining, and had decided to withdraw.

She wandered uneasily from room to room. She sat at the telephone several times—once she had the receiver off the book before she changed her mind about trying to reach him. She ordered her victoria and got ready for the street, to drive about in the hope of accidentally meeting him. At the door she changed her mind again. As she was turning back a boy came by, shouting an extra—"All about the Earl of Frothingham! Big sensation!" She saw that the boy knew who she was, knew that she was supposed to be engaged to Frothingham, was clamoring in that neighborhood because he thought sales would be briskest there. She fled into the house—but sent a servant out by the basement way to buy the paper.

The headlines were large and black. Frothingham, the story ran, had got into debt in England so deeply that his creditors found he could not pay more than a few pence in the pound; they had consulted as to ways and means of recovering, had organized themselves into a syndicate, had put up five thousand pounds to "finance" him for a hunt for a rich wife in America. "And," concluded the account, "this exposure comes barely in time to block his attempt to marry the beautiful daughter of one of the richest meat packers in Chicago, moving in our smartest smart set."

She did not know that this tale was a deliberately false diversion of the facts about a syndicated German prince who had visited Chicago several years before and had almost married there. The truth as to his enterprise had just come out on the other side through the collapse of the Rontivogli syndicate, and the newspaper, relying for immunity on Frothingham's aloneness and on his well-understood mercenary designs, had substituted his name for the German's. She read and believed. She had known from the outset that his main motive was money. But she had succeeded in disguising this unsightly truth in the same flowers of her crudely romantic imagination in which she disguised the truth as to her craving for a coronet. Now it was as if the flowers had been torn away to the last concealing petal and had left exposed things more hideous than she thought were there.

She hid her face and cried a little—"I despise him. Besides, if I went on and married him, what would people say?"

It would have taken finer scales than those available for weighing human motives to decide which of the two reasons embodied in those two sentences was the heavier. She dried her eyes and sat with her elbow on the table and her chin in her hand.

"That's the best thing to do, every way I look at it," she said aloud slowly at the end of half an hour's thought.

She went to the telephone, called up the offices of the Great Western and Southern Railway, asked and got the General Manager. "Is that you, Mr. Burster? Is that you, Tom? Meet me in the parlors of the Auditorium right away." And she rang off and telephoned to the stable for her victoria.

Ten minutes later she was driving down the avenue in her largest, most beplumed black hat and a pale blue carriage-coat that produced the wonted effect of her public appearances—Burster once said to her: "Jeanne, you're the only thing on earth that can stop traffic in the streets of Chicago. You can do in two seconds more than a blizzard could do in a week."

She returned at half-past five. Her father and mother were in the front sitting-room upstairs, gloomy as the lake in the dusk of a cloudy day. She entered, whistling and tilting her big hat first over her right eye, then over her left. "Don't look so cheerful," she said, patting her mother on the cheek and pulling her father's beard.

He tried to scowl, but it was a failure; and his voice was not in the least formidable as he said: "A pretty mess you got yourself into, miss, with your telephoning."

"What telephoning?" she asked with a start.

"Tattling your engagement."

"Oh!" She threw herself into a chair and laughed.

"Your father telephoned to Mr. Lawrence after he left us——" began her mother.

"What did you do that for, Pa?" she interrupted. "He'll think we haven't any pride."

"You ungrateful, thoughtless child! I did it for you."

"What did Mr. Lawrence say?"

Her father hesitated and his face showed how he hated to inflict upon his daughter the pain he thought his words would cause. "He said it was useless to continue our discussion, as Lord Frothingham had definitely and finally decided not to renew his proposal." The old man's voice almost broke as he went on: "Jenny, here's a note that came a few minutes ago—I think the address is in Frothingham's handwriting."

Neither he nor her mother dared to look at her as she was hearing these awful disclosures of the downfall of her hopes and the impending brutalities to her pride and vanity. She picked up the note, opened it slowly, read it—a few polite formal sentences, setting forth that he was "yielding to the insuperable obstacles interposed by your father."

She dropped the sheet and pirouetted round the room, in and out between the chairs occupied by her frightened parents—they thought her suddenly gone mad from the shock. "Who says I ain't the luckiest girl on earth?" she exclaimed.

Soldier or Camp-Follower?

IN a Middle-Western State there are two towns of about twelve thousand inhabitants a few score miles apart. They have the same climate, the same natural and railway advantages, the same kind of surrounding country, practically the same kind of population. Yet one town is like a city, the other like a village.

The city-town is well paved and well lighted. The houses are comfortable and attractive, the shops are good, and in the streets are well-dressed, energetic, cheerful people. The village-town is slovenly in air and in gait. The citizens lounge along the streets. There are many drygoods cases and barrels at the edges of the sidewalks and each has its group of drear-eyed whittlers.

There is a cause for everything; there is a cause for the difference in these two towns. That cause is—one man.

He lives in the city-town. He is not its richest, not its most conspicuous citizen. But he has two great talents—the talent for keeping himself up to the mark, the talent for making others feel that they must follow his example. He has neither preached nor posed. He found his town like its neighbor, facing the cemetery and creeping toward it. He faced himself the other way, was presently joined by half a dozen others, by a score, by a hundred, by a thousand—and the battle was won.

Some one said the other day that of the eighty million people in this country less than a quarter of a million made it progress—that is, if a certain quarter of a million or less were to be wiped out suddenly at the same time the country would begin a retrograde movement from which it could not recover for years, if ever. Whether this estimate of the number of Americans who actually constitute the public opinion that is intelligently and energetically for enlightened progress be too small or too large, the point of the observation is unimpaired. We know that the number of really efficient and valuable persons is small in comparison with the total number, that the great mass of human beings is inert, is wholly dependent upon leadership. But we know also that, thanks to free institutions, the number of these force-units and force-centres is greater in America than in any other country present or past.

Look at any community, at any group of human beings gathered together for whatever purpose, and you will soon see how few of its members are in the least positive, how many are negative, are either inert or are docile instruments of the force that happens to come their way. And then you understand why evil, though weak in comparison with the forces of good, is yet so potent in human affairs. Evil is never positive; it is always negative. To-day's bad is yesterday's good; to-day's good is to-morrow's bad. Our worst criminal is simply an untimely exhibition of the highest morality of some period in the barbaric past. The best soldier that Agamemnon led to Troy would be shot as an unspeakable wretch in any army of civilization to-day. To become evil is merely to stand still.

Every rightly applied energy is striving for the increase in the number of those who do not rest, who are not negative, but are positive units, giving out force as well as receiving it, or at least capable of receiving force. And because you dress in the same manner as your positive neighbor instead of wearing the skin of a wild beast, because you take in the same papers and magazines, vote the same ticket and use the same language, don't be satisfied that you are really an independent marcher in the army of progress. You may be there because the pressure of those on all sides is too great to permit you to escape. Or you may be sitting by the wayside, part of the army only in the sense that you are clad in its uniform—which was furnished by some one else.

The Bat Mightier Than the Sword

SOME of us have felt a little doubt on the question how far "benevolent assimilation" in the Philippines assimilates, but the latest news from the islands ought to reassure us. The work of education begun by the American school-teacher is being completed by the American game of baseball. A six-club league has been organized at Manila, representing different branches of the public service, and the whole population turns out at the semi-weekly games. Baseball is as wild a fad in Manila now as Ibsen in Boston or the cake-walk in Paris. Even the English have been captured by it, which seems to show that as a colonizing people our branch of the race is even stronger than the other. You can usually trace the limits of English colonization by the cricket-fields, and hereafter you will be able to bound greater America by its baseball grounds.

In Manila the Filipinos have taken to the game so enthusiastically that they have organized clubs of their own, which play on the league grounds before and after the regular matches. The crowds on the bleachers have acquired all the baseball technicalities and do their "rooting" in English.

Think of the power of that lever for the Americanization of the islands! We might perhaps remain unmoved by shouts of "Desliza! Kelly, desliza!" or "Mated el arbitrador!" but how can we fail to feel at home when we hear the same sentiments expressed in the familiar words, hallowed by sweet associations, "Slide! Kelly, Slide!" and "Kill the umpire!"?

Mr. Chamberlain has been inviting Boers and Britons to shake hands over the bloody chasm in South Africa, and has not apparently met with the most flattering success. A good deal of blood has flowed in the Philippines, but baseball may prove a better peacemaker than Mr. Chamberlain. Certainly a Filipino who can deliver a good drop curve is not a member of an inferior race, but a man to be respected by his conquerors, and the conqueror who can bat a home run with two out and three men on bases is not a loathsome oppressor but a being to be loved by any Tagal patriot who has money up on his team.

When the Filipinos were devoted to cock-fighting, and General Otis was trying to suppress that sport on the ground that it was inconsistent with the moral standards of Brookline, Massachusetts, the situation was dangerous. If the brown men had stuck to cock-fighting and the white men to poker there would have remained a gap between the races that all the diplomacy of Governor Taft might not have been able to bridge. But baseball may make diplomacy unnecessary. It is gratifying to have the Filipinos taught to sing The Star-Spangled Banner in school, but when of their own accord they pick up Casey at the Bat in English they may be considered thoroughly assimilated.

Your Brother the Murderer

AN EMINENT American physician, whose practice is chiefly among women and children, said lately:

"A doctor is often in receipt of queer letters, but the strangest which come to me are the frequent applications from good, pious women living on farms and country villages for places in wealthy city families, where they can rear and train the poor neglected children of fashionable mothers. There seems to be a deep-seated conviction among these good folk that every rich, fashionable woman is a devotee to dancing, gambling, champagne, cigarettes and worse vices. To rescue and train her children, they argue, would be missionary work—and profitable.

"I might tell them truly," added the doctor, "that I have practiced among that class of women for thirty years, and in that time never have known but one who did not love and give her best effort to her children. But they would not believe me!"

Of course they would not. We all divide our fellow-creatures into classes, each with its sharp attributes, and love and hate them comfortably. Nothing is more disquieting or annoying than to have these attributes mixed up. Yet nothing is more certain to happen.

The one thing we may be sure of every day is that not a man whom we shall meet in it will belong to his type. The purse-proud plutocrat turns out to be a humble-minded young fellow anxiously envious of our knowledge of golf; the comic actor in private life is dull and shy, and reddens to the tips of his ears whenever he speaks: the murderer, taken out of the dock in a quiet hob and nob, proves to be a likable young chap who reminds you of your cousin Bob. He has precisely the same feeling for his Jenny and her boy at home that you have for your Mary and the kid. He is worrying about the price of potatoes just as you are worrying about coal.

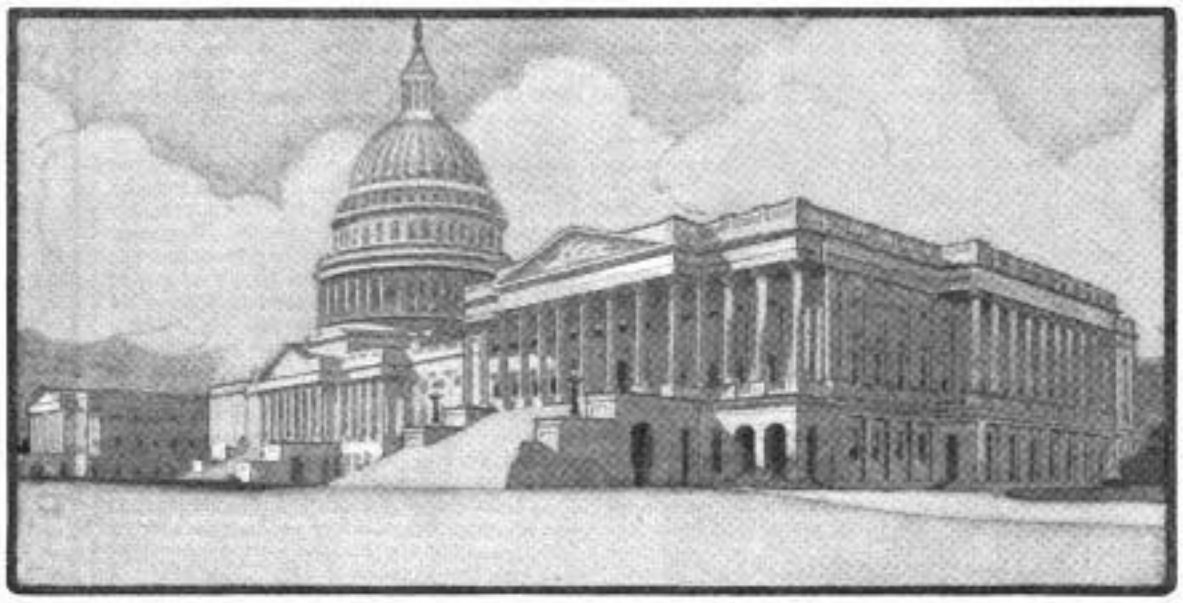
You are confused, annoyed. It would be so much easier to deal with the man, knife in hand, killing and needing to be killed, than with this anxious buyer of potatoes for Jenny and her baby.

After all, are not our mistakes in dealing with other people—at home, on the street, in church or the shop—due to our obstinacy in meeting them as members of classes instead of men and women like ourselves? Public opinion dubs this party fanatics; that, rogues; this race, traitors; this fashionable woman, vicious; that churchgoing woman, a saint.

But you will save time and many bitter mistakes if you will take each by the hand and judge for yourself.

The nature of the meanest man or woman is not like a manufactured music box, set to grind out forever the same tune—the Dead March or a jig—at the turning of a screw.

It is a live thing. And there is in it some wild harmony, provided you know how to find it.



An All-American Route to the East

THE proposition of Mr. John W. Mackay and his associates to build a cable all the way across the Pacific, and to ask nothing of any Government except landing privileges, was something so new and so good that it seemed almost impossible. And now here it is. For years Congress and the Departments have been talking of a cable line; newspapers have given thousands of columns of their space to the discussions; all recognized the need—but nothing was done. Nothing until one company stepped in, ran out the wire, and soon we may know Honolulu's latest news as it happens, and in a few more months get Aguinaldo's lecture terms over an all-American route. No subsidies in this great work, mind you—no log-rolling in or out of Congress—no frittering away of energies and dollars in the purchase of rights, but a straight, swift bit of American energy doing a great big thing so quickly that it almost takes one's breath away.

During the past century the Government lost hundreds of millions of dollars helping to build railroads—and most of it was stolen in one way or another. States went to the limit of their credit in building canals and aiding railway enterprises—and almost every cent was lost. Cities built transportation lines to bring trade to their marts—and the results are still seen in their debt statements. All this is changed. All are agreed that there is a wholesome dread of too much power or too much capital in the hands of any one man or any set of men, but the worst form of trustphobia cannot blind us to the truth that great capital is able to do great things without asking Congress for appropriations or swindling the people as did DeLesseps in France, or the early promoters of the Pacific roads in the United States.

MEN AND MEASURES

By Charles Emory Smith

TWO FORECASTS OF THE POLITICAL FUTURE. HOW THE PRESIDENT HAS DISARMED HIS OPPONENTS. DEMOCRATIC POSSIBILITIES FOR 1904

WHAT is the general political situation and outlook as it is left at the close of Congress? What has been the effect of the winter's operations? What are the personal bearings of the developments of the past three months?

These questions are inevitably raised by any attentive observation at Washington as the session of Congress comes to its culmination. Such work as the important action of these winter months, with all the forces that entered into it, could not fail to leave an impress on the trend of public movements. No observer can be blind to a consciousness on the part of all participants that the legislation of the session and the influences surrounding it are producing a distinct and palpable effect on the course of public opinion. Just what this effect is may be a matter of difference, but all feel that changes of some sort are being wrought out. There are certain facts which lie on the surface. The campaign of the President for the accomplishment of anti-trust legislation was successful. Whether it was all that was originally contemplated, it was all that was desired in the end; it was consistent and homogeneous; it made a good beginning; it authorized inquiry and publicity without intruding into general business or forcing useless exposure. Many of the large corporations yielded to it if they did not cheerfully accept it. But the chief trust magnates, while acquiescing rather than run the risk of something more drastic, were at the same time resentful. Meanwhile, the Democrats took heart from the narrow margin in the New York election of last November. They felt that it made the Empire State fairly debatable, and that with a conservative and unobjectionable candidate they might hopefully enter on the next Presidential contest. Would the Republicans gain or lose from these events? Would the Democrats be able to profit from the turn?

If these articles have any merit and value it is because they aim to be candid, dispassionate and judicial in the treatment of men, measures and movements. There are at Washington two distinct views of the situation, and a frank statement of these diverse views will indicate the conflicting currents of opinion.

The Clouded and Uncertain View

THE first view, which is that of doubt and uncertainty, is that the course of events has clouded the political prospect and rendered it obscure. According to this outlook the elements which are interested in the industrial combinations have been estranged by the anti-trust campaign and legislation, and have become lukewarm if not openly hostile. Not only have those directly concerned in the trusts been alienated, but broader business interests are said to have been disaffected by the fear that a movement against the industrial organizations will operate injuriously in the general business field. This view finds that distrust is not confined to Wall Street, but reaches out into mercantile and manufacturing circles, and rests upon the idea that the basis of stability and confidence has been impaired. It thinks that the enthusiasm and ardor of a few months ago have suffered some abatement. It reasons that the Republican party has made its great and successful fights only when the business interests were united and earnestly aroused on its side, and that indifference or lethargy on their part would be disastrous.

This view sees ground for disturbed feeling in the even balance of New York and in the apparent disposition of the Democrats to drop the mistakes of the past and unite upon an available candidate. Governor Odell was elected by less than 10,000 majority last November. This is a meagre margin in a total vote of nearly 1,400,000. A change of one vote in every 280 would have reversed the result. About 70,000 Republicans remained away from the polls in Greater New York through discontent. With the chances so closely balanced the appearance of a candidate like Chief Justice Parker might, according to this view, tip the scales in favor of the Democrats. Though the loss of New York would not necessarily be fatal, yet the same influences which cost her vote would be likely to carry other States, and it would be dangerous to enter on the contest with a general feeling that New York was prone to the other side.

It cannot be said that those who are troubled with these apprehensions have any different policy from the great body of Republicans who do not share their fears. They do not say that any other course should have been followed. They do not contend that there should have been no anti-trust legislation. They do not maintain that this legislation is too severe or excessive. Some of them think that it is a double-ender and involves risks both ways—from those who wanted nothing done and those who wanted more done. When their feeling is closely analyzed it seems to rest on the idea that there has been some reaction from the strong current of last year, some rising sentiment that the future has elements of uncertainty, but there is no proposal of any departure from the line on which the party is moving.

The Hopeful and Cheerful View

THE other view which prevails at Washington is much more hopeful and cheerful. It is not blind to the tendencies which threaten danger, but it sees countervailing forces which, according to its light, more than offset them. It believes that in his anti-trust campaign the President has represented a great popular sentiment and has spiked the only available weapons his political adversaries had for the coming battle. Those who hold this view recognize that in the legislation he has accomplished he has embittered some powerful elements whose support hitherto has been valuable; but they think he has won a popular favor which more than counterbalances this temporary loss, and they further question whether the very elements that are now resentful will not in the end see their interest in yielding opposition and going along. They believe that, instead of exciting business distrust and awakening a feeling of uncertainty, the handling of this subject will allay apprehension by showing that a difficult question and a popular demand can be met without departing from conservative lines.

According to this view the anti-trust legislation will gain in esteem as time and experience test it. At the outset it may exasperate those who wanted nothing and disappoint those who wanted more. But in its practical operation it will prove less intrusive and disturbing in the conduct of general business affairs than has been feared by conservative elements, and more effective where there is real need of restraint than has been imagined by radical critics. Its key is in the provision for investigation and publicity. This lies in the hands of the Bureau of Corporations and is thus under the eye of the President. He can decide what doors it shall unlock. To the great mass of business concerns it will not be applied. They will go on as freely as now. The number of trusts whose policy is believed to be in restraint of trade or in suppression of competition is very limited. In such cases the power of examination will uncover the facts and open the way to the remedy.

The efficacy of the law and its application thus depend on the President who administers it. Under the view now being sketched even the trusts which dislike the law will prefer that its execution shall be in the hands of those who framed it rather than in more uncertain and perhaps more violent hands. There will be a choice of executive power. Its spirit is not always a matter of individual temperament or character. It is subject to the general influences and trend of the forces behind it. A Republican President represents one set of tendencies, and a Democratic President would represent another. The view now presented is that when it is no longer a question of passing or defeating anti-trust legislation, but simply a question in whose hands it shall rest, the very elements that are dissatisfied would be unwilling to leave it to the uncertainties of a radical change.

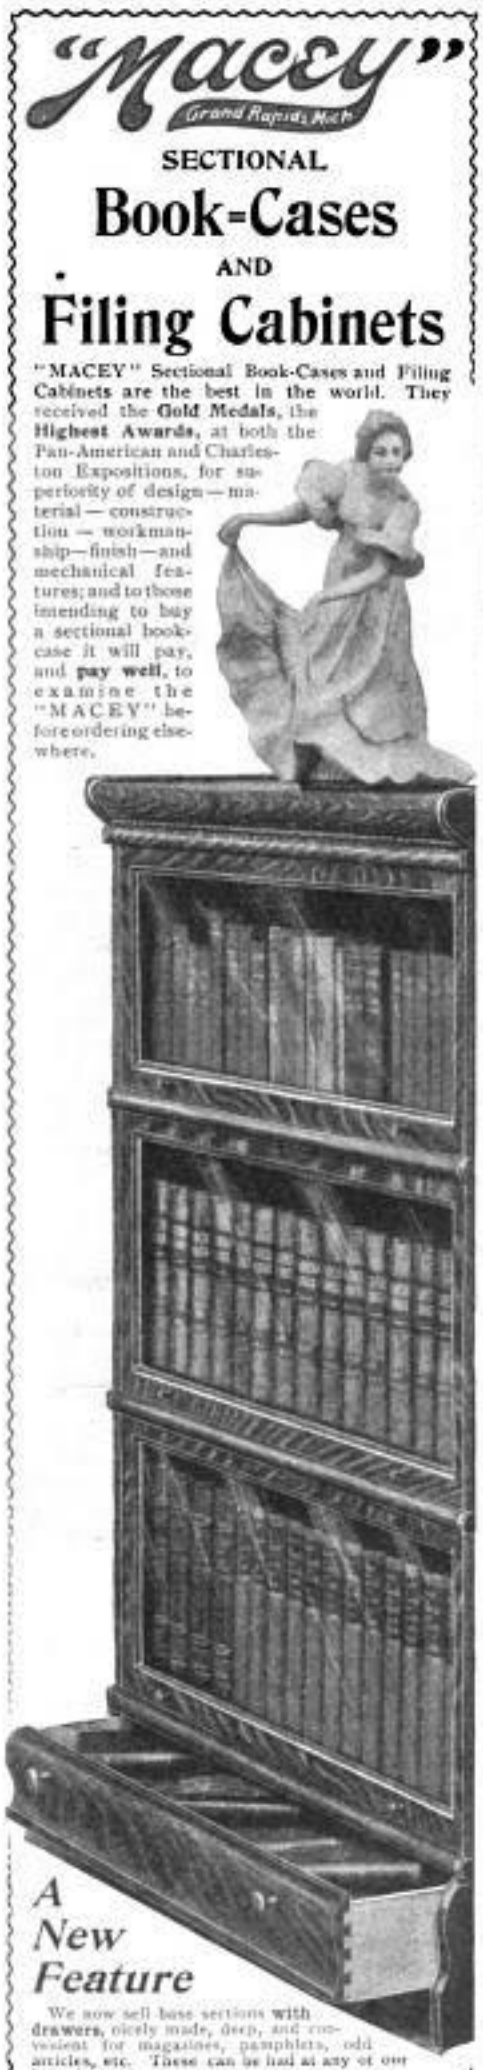
In this view there is another aspect of the matter which cannot be overlooked. It is agreed that Judge Parker is more discussed now than any other man as an eligible candidate of the opposition. Those who object to the restraining and regulating legislation are said to regard him with favor. But according to this view, may it not be a question whether it will be to his advantage to be known at this early day as a favorite of the trusts? Will it not repel more support than it will gain? Can the antagonistic elements of the opposition be united with such influences? Can there be an alliance of the socialistic tendencies which have had such development during the last year with the corporate forces which have so great a stake in the contest? If the lines are to be broken on the one side will they not be broken on the other, and will not the popular elements more than overmatch any special classes?

A Democratic Analysis of the Situation

THESE are the two views which any accurate record of the drift at Washington must recognize. They are portrayed as a reflex of the talk which divides political circles. They do not necessarily point to opposing and conflicting conclusions, but to varying shades of conviction. One view is more critical, dubious and hesitant than the other. The first sees difficulties, doubts and uncertainties; the second sees more promise and assurance in the outlook. The first finds an ebb of the tide, a little reaction, a measure of unrest, a race issue, a critical spirit, a feeling that it is impossible to tell just what to count on; the second finds that these are superficial and evanescent manifestations which are completely overridden by the irresistible sweep of the general current. Both are held with equal sincerity, and in their comparison they raise questions which command a deeper interest, even in the surging hours of a closing session, than the questions which are matters of action at the moment.

The real judgment of a sagacious Democratic politician, one of the most conspicuous chiefs of his party, was privately expressed the other day. He said in substance: "See what the President has done. Congress met for the short session with the universal belief that nothing would be accomplished. Yet the President has carried through both Houses just the legislation that he wanted—legislation that gives him power without being revolutionary or destructive. The Republican leaders didn't want it, but he has managed them all. He has taken the best weapons of the next fight away from his opponents, and he has kept control of the trusts because he has kept the discretion in his own hands. He has shown that as a politician he was not born yesterday." Yet the Democratic leader who spoke thus in the freedom of confidential talk will do his best, not without some hope, for Democratic success.

Some Presidential Possibilities



THAT hope centres in New York and in its relations to the contest. In view of its closeness at the last election and of the discontent which is so largely concentrated there, it must be regarded as a doubtful State. The political battlefield has shifted since the last two Presidential campaigns. Then New York and the States about it were sure, and the West was debatable. Now the entire West is apparently solid and New York hangs in the balance. The recognition of this equivocal position of New York leads to the dominant Democratic thought of finding within its borders a candidate for whom nobody has a knife up the sleeve. There is no doubt that for this reason Judge Parker is more in the mind of his party at the present time than any other man. His personality is impressive, and his position on the bench, withdrawn from the arena of contention, leaves him without points of attack.

In the field of speculation at Washington he is preëminent on the Democratic side, but not alone. The financial interests which shy at President Roosevelt's bold methods would be well pleased with Mr. Cleveland. It is true he startled them with his aggressive and defiant tone on the Venezuelan boundary, but they had confidence in his fiscal policies and associations. His name is not canvassed, and there is no expectation that he will be in the running, but his shadow sometimes falls across the course, with a query as to whether any strange turn might happen. Mr. Olney is more distinctly on the bulletin of announcements. He would be a vigorous leader of iron and blood. But the question instantly comes, Why should the Democracy go to Massachusetts, which cannot be made doubtful, and leave New York, which is surely to be a great battle-ground?

David Hill Must be Watched

There is a factor which cannot be ignored. In any consideration of what New York may offer David B. Hill cannot be left out of the reckoning. Will he be a candidate himself? Will he be friendly to Judge Parker? Nobody knows—literally nobody, so far as can be ascertained. He could not wield the sceptre without vehement opposition, and yet who could hold it without his favor? He is ambitious, but he is wary. Does he realize his weakness as well as his strength? Does he understand that he cannot be King, but that he may be a Warwick? No voice comes from him or from any authorized friend, either publicly or privately, and while the oracle is silent the course is not clear. His power over the organization of his State is recognized, but the fear that he will sway it for himself shadows the pathway, for it is clear that the best hope of his party lies along new lines.

There is another factor that may or may not play some part in the nomination, and that is Mr. Bryan. His day is over as a candidate. The settlement of his issues and the reversion of his special territory of the West to its earlier affiliations have left him high and dry on the shore as the current has swept by; but if he is dead as an influence in determining the choice of his party he doesn't know it. He is vociferous in imposing his conditions and limitations. But in the canvass of Washington he hardly receives the cold respect of a passing word. His recent visit was funereal. He doubtless has some following, but with the collapse of every theory and prediction it is scattered and broken, and the party wants to leave the past behind.

Probably if it exercised its real preference, without regard to locality or availability, it would take Mr. Gorman. That astute politician has perennial favor. The loss of his seat in the Senate did not obscure his light, and now he comes to the front again with renewed influence and strengthened position. His party has missed his adroit leadership in the Senate, and his resumption of the reins will be a distinct gain to it. He would be a candidate after its own heart, and, if he could be elected, a President altogether to its liking. It would not feel that Mr. Olney or Mr. Cleveland would be a strong or strict party man. It would count on more of the tie that binds in Judge Parker. But, above all, Mr. Gorman would be its ideal, and if it were not for the vital relation of New York to the contest he would doubtless be first in its thought.

For the Democratic hope of an encouraging fight turns on New York, though it is far from certain that the election itself will turn on that State. Since 1900 the conditions have so changed that New York has less of a pivotal position than then. Even then the transfer of the Empire State to the other column would not have altered the result. President McKinley had 292 electoral votes against 155 for Mr. Bryan. The loss of New York would still have left him a majority of 65. He might also have lost New Jersey, Connecticut, Delaware, California and Utah and yet have been elected. The reapportionment and the solidification of the Mountain States are changes of condition more favorable to the dominant party, while the recognized reaction in New York is a change less favorable.

The total electoral vote is now increased to 476, making 239 necessary to a choice. If the vote were to be divided as the States voted last November the Republicans would have 318 and the Democrats 158. This leaves a broad margin. If New York were counted on the other side the Republicans would still marshal 279, or 40 more than enough to elect. It is said that the same influences which would throw New York to the opposition would carry New Jersey and Connecticut the same way. The question was put to Senator Platt, of Connecticut, a man of great experience, poise and wisdom. "The business elements of Connecticut," he answered, "do not sympathize with the interests in New York that are disaffected. They stand just where they have stood."

We Shall Soon Know

Nothing, therefore, is settled. The whole question is open and undetermined. If it be said that there are signs of reaction, it may be answered that it will require a large and widespread reaction to portend a radical change. Washington is in an inquiring frame of mind. It is often sensitive to small influences whose ripples scarcely reach beyond the capital, and sometimes dull to large currents which are affecting the public mind throughout the country. It is sometimes the best place to judge, and sometimes the worst. The short session of Congress, with its important legislation and its various developments in different directions, has not left the situation just as it was at the beginning. People are conscious of a little different atmosphere, even if they cannot define it. Whether it is of any deep significance depends on developments yet to be made. The two views which have been outlined give present impressions. If they are a little nebulous it is because just now the air is a little thick. In three months it may all clear up.

Barnum as a Practical Joker

AT A MEETING of Universalist clergymen, to which denomination Barnum belonged, he was called upon for a few remarks. He was always ready, and at the conclusion he stated with all seriousness that he had just received reliable information that at the United States Mint in Philadelphia brand-new quarter-dollars could be bought for a short time at twelve and thirteen cents apiece. He saw that his statement had caused a sensation, and at the close of the meeting a reverend old gentleman called him aside and said:

"Mr. Barnum, I am opposed to all forms of speculation, but I have been thinking that if I can purchase those quarter-dollars for the price you name I might make an honest penny. Do you see anything wrong in it?"

"Nothing at all; but tell me how you expect to make a profit?"

"If the quarters cost me only twelve and thirteen cents, why, I can readily sell them again at par, can I not?"

"Certainly," replied Barnum without a change of countenance, "but if you pay twelve and thirteen cents—that is twelve plus thirteen, wherein lies the profit?"

On another occasion Barnum notified the dealer from whom he bought a large amount of supplies that half the pepper he sent him was peas. The dealer indignantly denied the charge, and quite a warm correspondence followed, it being finally ended by Barnum, who inquired whether half the letters in the word "pepper" were not p's.

In his fine mansion at Bridgeport was a beautifully furnished apartment which was called the "Carey Room," it being set apart for the sweet poetesses, Alice and Phœbe Carey whenever they visited Bridgeport. Barnum and his family were very fond of those gifted writers, as were all who knew them.

"Alice was the more thoughtful," said he, "while Phœbe was always bubbling over with good spirits and wit. I never knew a brighter woman. One day I was taking her and some friends through my museum. At the head of the stairs was the cage containing 'The Happy Family,' which included owls, cats, mice, serpents, and other creatures generally mortal enemies, but all living in perfect harmony, mainly because we kept them so stuffed with food that they had no temptation to prey upon one another. The cage stood directly at the head of the stairs, and just as we reached the top a big serpent stretched its head toward Phœbe. Forgetting the glass thickness that separated them, she was so startled that she uttered a scream, and would have fallen backward down the steps had I not caught her. Looking up to me she said, 'Thank you, Mr. Barnum; but remember that I am not the first woman that the serpent has caused to fall.'"

HANS' HENS

A Monologue

By Charles Battell Loomis

DID I tole you aboud my jungest son, yes? He is an imertader. De udder day my oldes' boy who is goin' to be a Padarefski vas knockin' der scales off der biano, an' der secon' son who had been fishin' was knockin' der scales off a fish, an' so liddle Karl he runs him into der grocery store unt knocks der scales off der counter.

Ain' dot silly? I shoost made der feerst two boys do dot scales bizziness so dot I could make up dot vun aboud Karl. Und a funny t'ing aboud id iss dot I haven't two udder boys at all. Only shoost Karl, unt he iss my nephew.

My mudder-in law she is my aunt. She vas my aunt ven I vas born but she didn't get to be my mudder-in-law until I married Katrina. Katrina iss her daughder unt my vife. I vish dot Katrina's mudder vas only my aunt yet—ain'd id? Dere is someding about a mudder-in-law dat ubseds peeble. Shoost to look at Katrina's mudder you vould t'ink she vas no vairse dan an aunt, but dat iss pecause she neffer vould haf come to liff mit you. Eef I am cross mit Katrina my mudder-in-law alvays takes Katrina's sides unt makes me sorry she vas not my aunt only, alretty yet. She says dot she objectut to cousins becomin' vifes, unt I say dot I objec' to aunts becomin' mudder-in-laws, unt so it goes from vairse to bad until I vish dot Katrina had married out of der family.

De udder day I took my vife unt her mudder to zee Kellar, unt he dit zome vondairful tricks, unt at lezt he made der vanishing lady trick. After der show vas over I vent to see Kellar unt asked him if he vould take some money avay from me to make my mudder-in-law vanish, unt vot do you suppose he said? Dot he couldn't do id pecause she vasn't a lady.

Of course, I see der choke pecause I haff lived in deez condry t'irty year unt I know my mudder-in-law, but ven I vent home unt tole Kellar's funny choke to her she does not at all der point zee. She is so mat unt uses such langwitches dot I tole her dot if she didn'd look out she vould spoil der pleasure of her visit mit me, unt dot make her so mat dot she say she vill not stay to be insultit, unt she vent home. So I write to Kellar how much I owed him, pecause eefen if my mudder-in-law vas not a lady she had vanished.

I vant to ask you for der remetty for my schickens layin' so funny. I haf a dozen of schickens, unt a neighbor tells me dot if I don'd vant dem to be stoled I make dem roost high. Unt I ask him how I shall teach dem to roost at all, unt he say, "Get a rooster, unt ven dey see him roost dey vill become roosters, too." But I guess dot iss hiss choke.

But I make der perches ten feet high unt dot iss all righd; der hens go up dair unt sit down, but in der morning dey are so high dey are afrait to come down unt so dey lay deir eggs up dere. Dey are splendut schickens unt lay big eggs, better as der groceryman has, but de eggs fall so far dot de yolk run out of der shell der minid dey hit der grount. Now I don'd know vot to do. Eighd, nine, ten eggs a day iss laid, but dey is all broken ven dey hid der grount. Of course, uff dere vas no grount dey vouldn'd get breaked, unt dot giff me an idea. I dell Katrina dot der grount iss too hard unt I ought to get swan's down, unt she say better I get der schickens's down.

But ven nearly sixty eggs iss all smashet on der floor of der hen-house I make up a plan dot is all righd. I buy me tvelff boys' caps for fifty cents abiece unt I fastens dem on tvelff poles so dot dey come under der hens, unt ven I go oud again dere iss an egg in each cap. Vot iss der use mit prains unless a man uses dem. De reason zome peebles don'd have success mit hens is pecause dey don'd use chudgment.

But experience has school poys. De nex' time I buy me some secon'-han' caps, pecause ven I pay me six dollars out for caps to get tvelff eggs it is too much. Unt anyvay der hens don'd lay any more pecause dey are sick from livin' on a perch all der vile. I, too, vould get sick from livin' on a perch pecause I hate fish. . . .

FIRST MORTGAGE GOLD NOTES

We will send you free, on request, our booklet entitled "First Mortgage Bond and Trust Company Investment Methods." It explains the organization of this company, how it is conducted, who compose it, its distinctive branches, which are for the buying and selling of high grade bonds and Chicago real estate mortgages; how we invest for ourselves and sell such securities to others; it tells of the care exercised by our finance committee, composed of five of our directors, in the selection of securities to be offered; how we handle, care for, and protect the interests of investors, men, women, trustees, guardians, institutions or companies, having trust funds. We allow interest, better than any savings bank rate, on partial payments, while you accumulate to fully pay for any specific bond or mortgage selected.

We buy entire bond issues, corporation and municipal. Correspondence invited from parties knowing of contemplated issues of high grade bonds.

We have for distribution a small, Russian leather covered, card case and security register which can be carried in a vest pocket. You won't have to go to your vault or safe to see when your interest or principal on any bond or mortgage matures if you have one of them. They will be sent upon receipt of twenty cents in stamps to cover cost and mailing.

CORRESPONDENTS Responsible parties commanding the confidence of investors can make snug sums by devoting a portion of their leisure time offering such securities as we buy and sell. Those only who favor security before high rate and who are in sympathy with our conservative methods will be selected.

Their Ways and Their Work

THE MODERN HISTORICAL NOVEL—Why Americans have made such a botch of it—Its discouragements to writer and reader.

¶ The writer of an historical novel has a very serious array of difficulties to face. To begin with, he enters the lists against a company of tried favorites, among whom he must count such names as Scott, Dumas, Cooper, Thackeray, Kingsley, Blackmore and Stevenson. In the second place he must encounter a strong prejudice on the part of publisher, reviewer and reader alike. That such a prejudice exists is no fault of the historical novel, but rather of the easy temptations which lie in wait between the writer and his ambition, temptations which latterly have too often compassed his downfall. He will presumably be guided, by his reading and his natural inclination, to imitating—in no offensive sense—the work of some one of the masters. He will strive for the rapid action and brilliant entourage of Dumas; he will plunge into local color as did Flaubert in Salammbô, or he will pause to reconstruct, to body forth anew, some vital force of the century as did Scott with Louis XI in Quentin Durward; the unlucky James, last of the Stuarts, in the Fortunes of Nigel, or Cromwell in Woodstock. It is nothing against the worth of his enterprise, but it is very much against the likelihood of his success that he should be an American of the present generation, approaching a past with which he is less and less in sympathy—whatever he may believe—from a distance which widens not with the years alone. The reason we have never found the "American Novel," in the sense in which we long since found the English novel, in, say, Fielding's Tom Jones, is that the artist who should consciously set about the creation of such a novel, a novel representative of the country at large, would be at a loss where to begin. We had the civilization of the Puritans; and Hawthorne, born of Puritan ancestry, and steeped in the Puritan past which still shadowed New England of his time, gave us The Scarlet Letter, in which the dour Puritan melancholy glooms over every page. We had a brief return to a primeval civilization in California of '49, and it gave us Bret Harte. We had the patriarchal civilization of the plantations—and, well, no one has given us that. Those civilizations are now dry dust, blown to the winds; there is no immediate likelihood of another Scarlet Letter or another Luck of Roaring Camp. And what do we get in their place? Why, we get Miss Mary Wilkins' stories of New England, Mr. Thomas Nelson Page's or Mr. Joel Chandler Harris' stories of Southern reconstruction, a story of New York, Chicago, Boston or San Francisco society or slums, a story of New Mexico, "the country God forgot," a story of the Tennessee mountaineers, the Alaska miners—everything, anything, much of it praiseworthy from every standpoint, all of it interesting from some standpoint, but none of it National, none of it American in the broadest sense.

The writer of the historical novel is bound by the same limitations. He cannot trace back his past, step by step of a familiar path. He cannot, as Scott did, change the dress of his peasant or his gentleman, and draw him from the life for the same character in another century. A New England farmer of to-day, tired, discouraged, impoverished by the competition of the West, could never masquerade as a Pilgrim father; he would be ludicrous, inadequate.

TWO NEW STORIES OF THE CIVIL WAR—Grant in fiction, and a dashing romance of Virginia chivalry and idealism.

¶ Recently we have had the historical novel in a new guise. Mr. Wister in the preface of The Virginian—as excellent a piece of writing, by the way, as is to be found in that excellent book—maintains that in the true sense his work is deeply historical, that his pages are the record of a society swept clean from the face of the country never to return. True, undoubtedly; but one may answer that in another sense such a record is historical only in the sense that the work of the poet at sixty lamenting his lost youth

How Would You Like To Own

OFFICIALLY APPROVED BY THE REGENTS OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK.

CHARLES DUDLEY WARNER

was the first to bring such a library within your reach in a superb set of forty-six books. It is, in truth, the WORLD'S BEST LITERATURE, and the largest private libraries cannot equal it in scope. With it you need never again be ignorant of any literary subject. The not only includes masterpieces, but gives CRITICAL ESSAYS on noted authors by greatest living writers.

WHAT PURCHASERS SAY

DR. E. W. KELLOGG, Hartford:
"A wonderful conception wonderfully executed."

HON. LYMAN J. GAGE said:
"The volumes composing The World's Best Literature form in themselves a valuable library."

P. D. ARMOUR, Chicago:
"Gentlemen—I gave Armour Institute of Technology a set of the Warner Library and took one for myself, because I am convinced that it is the most valuable set of books for private or public library now to be had. The beauty of the reproduction of famous paintings is equal to the excellence of the contents of the great work."

LUTHER LAFLIN MILLS:
"The Warner Library I would not be without. It is a wonderful and invaluable work—giving to the reader the literary masterpieces of all the nations of civilization and placing him in touch with the world's greatest thinkers and writers of the past and present. In a few volumes it makes accessible to him what otherwise he could obtain only by slow search in thousands of books.
"Having myself enjoyed its advantages, I cannot refrain from writing of it with enthusiasm."

Sixty Centuries of Books

20,000 Pages In these wonderful forty-six volumes will be found the brightest thoughts of the greatest authors—complete novels and chapters in fiction, humorous sketches, poetry, philosophy, history, travel, science, oratory, letters and essays. Translations from Persian, Hindu, Greek, Latin and all the modern languages are included. In short, the thousands of large pages fairly teem with interest and delight.

7,500 Authors This is the only work containing a complete "Dictionary of Authors," giving correct pronunciation of the name and the relative rank of each writer, his character, the names of his books, and dates of publication. This unique feature is of immense value.

5,000 Subjects In the matter of poetry alone nearly 1,000 complete masterpieces are given, many of which no private library and none but the largest public libraries contain. The other topics cover every range of thought. Many come from rare and forgotten volumes of bygone days.

800 Illustrations Photogravures of famous scenes and paintings, portraits, art plates, color reproductions of beautiful manuscripts—all these form a wealth of attractive material profusely illustrating the Warner Library.

2,500 Synopses of Books This valuable feature is unique with the Warner Library. Brief descriptions of all the world's great books are given in the space of a few hundred words each. No one has read or can read all the books which come up in the course of conversation. But these synopses will give the busy man the gist of them all; not only novels such as "Robert Elsmere," "Ben Hur," or "Quo Vadis," but poems, dramas and technical works.

Course of Reading A systematic course of reading and study, equal to a four years' university course, has been prepared. It not only gives the system of reading, but furnishes the material itself, through the pages of the Library, and by means of an admirable Index. It is both teacher and text-book.

is historical. Not to quibble on the word, it seems doubtful if the writer of fiction embodying his own experience can rightly name his method historical, though admittedly the result may become historic and material for the student of history. With another generation age will lend it a finer flavor of antiquity and a truer charm of romance than ever the author could evoke from a book-learned past.

Just this line of distinction, with just the severances we might expect, divides Mr. Churchill Williams' Captain from Mr. George Cary Eggleston's Master of Warlock. Both are stories of the Civil War with certain points of resemblance and certain similar devices of plot, but widely divergent aims and methods. In both stories the action revolves largely around two young men, fast friends, of different temperament, one a dreamer and student, one the doer. In both stories there are fascinating young women who dare much for the cause: Mr. Eggleston's Agatha and Mr. Williams' Beatrix both become nurses in the Southern hospitals; and both young ladies finally clear away the misunderstandings which separate them from their lovers.

So much of resemblance is perhaps natural. On the other hand, the Captain is the story of Grant's days at Gravois and his Mississippi campaign. It is intended that Grant, who was known at Gravois in the interval of his retirement from the army as "the Captain," should be the central figure of the action which goes on about him but which he touches at the edges only; his name is given to the book, it is his portrait which is to be painted. Such an effort is a difficult, a thankless, almost an impossible task. When Dumas dealt with Richelieu and Louis he dealt with names and traditions. He had a certain tone to preserve, but he was at liberty to put any words in his characters' mouths, to attribute to them any motives, to impute to them any acts which went along with the unfolding of his narrative. And as a writer of narrative par excellence—or as Stevenson called himself, an Epick Writer—he was too good a craftsman to mistake his opportunities. There were no painfully culled anecdotes of the great Cardinal, no shrinking from a free use of plastic license; Richelieu or Mazarin, Louis or Anne of Austria, Henry or Chicot, they entered into the story, they went to the building of the piece. Mr. Williams cannot so handle Grant. Public opinion would not let him—there is too great a mass of circumstantiated anecdote, there are too many men alive who remember Grant in the flesh, for any but the highest genius and courage to make the attempt. And it would be even then an attempt of doubtful outcome. The result for Mr. Williams is a tight, traditional drawing of Grant, and a sparing introduction of his presence, except under the safest circumstances, in the narrative. The reader is in the dilemma of neglecting Grant for the story or neglecting the story for Grant.

Mr. Eggleston, who was educated at Richmond College and served in the Confederate Army, writes out of his own experience as did Mr. Wister, and by avoiding the temptation to introduce Lee, Jefferson, Lincoln or the larger personalities which dominated the times, escapes these dangers and difficulties. Stuart, the cavalry raider, a brilliant and dashing figure, but of no national reputation in the sense that Lee or Grant have reputation, he uses freely and tactfully with no jar on accepted prejudices. Stuart is a figure of interest and attraction in his pages, but one who appears never for his own sake and only as the narrative demands. He is a serviceable working character in the mechanism of the plot. Mr. Eggleston, too, has the advantage of Mr. Williams in his more fluent and precise style—a style which has no sudden drops, which is always adequate to the conduct of a swift and complicated narrative. A failing which may be forgiven a veteran is a disposition to philosophize on the chances of war. However, these digressions are few and brief, and, taken in the mass, they undoubtedly aid in the admirable effect attained of a complete and united society animated and moved by common ideals under a common understanding, in which the characters move of their own volition, indeed, but under the compulsion of something stronger than any individual initiative. Mr. Eggleston was aided in this work, as we have pointed out, by his personal knowledge of actual conditions, by his sympathy with a high-spirited, if now overruled, idealism, and by the existence of the material at hand, which every artist who wishes to work for more than passing local results must have: a firmly founded and widely understood set of beliefs, prejudices and desires, an organized and completed society.

WAS REFUSED LIFE INSURANCE

Rejected on Account of "Coffee Heart"

Life insurance companies have fully established the fact that the use of coffee causes an organic derangement of the heart, shortening the long beat and imperiling life. For this reason habitual coffee drinkers are refused life insurance in many cases. A well-known merchant of White's Creek, Tenn., proprietor of a large store there, says:—"Three years ago I was examined for life insurance and to my surprise was rejected because my heart action was at times out of place 15 beats in 60.

"I consulted several good doctors and was invariably asked by them 'Do you drink ardent spirits? use tobacco? or drink coffee?' To the first I answered 'Very little,' to the second 'No,' to the last 'Yes,' and they would all say 'Quit coffee.'

"I determined to do this. I had read about Postum Cereal Coffee and bought and used it, and I liked it as well as the best of real coffee, and as a result of its use in place of coffee I find myself without a skip in my heart action, and I can get insurance on my life cheaper by 25 per cent. (notwithstanding the advance in age) than I could when I first commenced using Postum." Name furnished by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Oddities and Novelties of Every-Day Science

DURING the last fifty years the production of vegetable food in this country has grown faster than the population, whereas the available supply of animal food to-day is considerably less per capita than it was in 1850. Such, at all events, are the conclusions drawn by experts of the Department of Agriculture, who have figured out some interesting facts in this line.

With the exception of chickens, there are to-day fewer domestic animals of every food-producing kind in the United States than there were half a century ago. On the other hand, while the population during that period has increased three and a quarter times, the production of barley has been multiplied by 24, of wheat by 7.5, of oats by 8.5, of Indian corn by 5.5, and of potatoes by 5. But the output of rye, buckwheat, peas and beans, sweet potatoes, and sugar has considerably diminished per capita since 1850.

The enormous increase in the production of barley seems odd, in view of the fact that this cereal, formerly so important as human food, has been almost entirely driven out of such use by potatoes. But, of course, the phenomenon is explained by the fact that nearly all of the barley now raised is being converted into brewers' malt. California is the greatest producer of barley in this country, Minnesota second, and Wisconsin third.

In earlier days nearly all the people in the United States were food-producers; almost every family had its own garden patch, at least; but, with the increasing density of population, the older States have acquired a growing proportion of non-producers of food, who must be fed by the food-producers. Relatively, the consumers of food have increased faster than the producers of food.

It is a curious fact that the District of Columbia raises more sweet potatoes than any State of the Union, though its area is only sixty square miles. The greatest corn-producing State is Illinois, which also bears off the palm for oats. Of other cereals, most wheat is raised in Minnesota, most rye in Wisconsin, most buckwheat in Pennsylvania, and most rice in Louisiana. Michigan stands first in beans and peas, and New York in potatoes and onions.

New York is first in apples, Pennsylvania in cherries, and Maryland in strawberries. California is far in the lead in pears, besides producing nearly all of the apricots and more plums than all the other States put together. New York is first in raspberries and currants, and is second only to California in grapes. Nearly all the almonds come from California; all the home-grown cocoanuts are raised in three counties of Florida; domestic English walnuts are almost exclusively from the Golden State, and more than half of the pecan nuts come from Texas.

PALM BEACH AT HOME—How human ingenuity has improved upon Nature with a perpetuated natural palm leaf.

HUMAN ingenuity has improved upon Nature in the production of palms, and the so-called "perpetuated natural palm leaves" have supplanted the natural growth in many restaurants and other places of popular resort. But it was reserved for a recent inventor to devise a method, which he has patented, of constructing artificial palms in sections. These may be placed one upon another in such a way as to make a tree of any desired height, and holes are provided in which green sticks (representing the leaf-stems) are inserted, a real palm leaf being attached to the end of each stick. The sections of trunk are wrapped with cocoanut fibre, so that the effect shall be wholly realistic.

Sectional palms of this kind are used extensively at the present time for the decoration of churches at weddings, being set up in the chancel as a background for flowering plants and cut flowers. It is not practicable, ordinarily, to convey into the church real palms of sufficient height for the purpose, and the counterfeit ones produce the same effect.

How to Paint a House Cheap

And Have it Guaranteed to Look Better, Wear Longer and Cost Less Than the Best White Lead Paints.

Never Fades, Cracks, Chalks, Peels or Blisters and is Not Affected by Gases. Fifty Sample Colors and Illustrated Booklet Prepaid to Any Address Absolutely Free.

The cost of painting the house and barn, outbuildings and fences is a heavy burden. Cheap paints soon fade, peel or scrape off and white lead and oil costs so much and has to be replaced so often that it is a constant expense to keep the bright, clean appearance so desirable in the cozy cottage home or the elegant mansion. The following are a few of the large users of Carrara Paint:

The Waldorf-Astoria, New York, One of the Most Magnificent Hotels in the World, Has Used Tons and Tons of the World-Famous Carrara Paint.

Pennsylvania R. R. Co.; Pullman Palace Car Co.; Chicago Telephone Co.; Central Union Telephone Co.; Field Museum, Chicago; Kenwood Club, Chicago; Cincinnati Southern; C. & E. I. R. R. Co.; Denver & Rio Grande R. R.; Wellington Hotel, Chicago.

Thousands of private residences and buildings, public and private, all over the country. From railroad box car to elegantly furnished general offices of the great railways; from race track fences and stables to fancy club house; from plain brick walls and stone fences to tin roofs and interior finish of stately hotels; from country barn or hay shed or cheap outbuilding to farm residence, suburban home or luxurious city residence.

Carrara is used because it lasts longer, never fades, never cracks, never blisters, never peels, covers more surface than the highest-priced paints and costs less than the cheap mixed paints that injure instead of protect. There is but one Carrara. It is made by the Carrara Paint Agency, General Offices, 857 Carrara Bldg., Cincinnati, Ohio, and anyone having a house to paint should send for 50 free sample colors and our handsome booklet, showing many buildings reproduced in all the colors just as they are painted from this great paint that has stood the most rigid tests for 25 years and, bear in mind, that it is the only paint ever manufactured that is backed by a positive guarantee in every case. Distributing depots in all principal cities. Write to-day and save half your paint bills in the future.

As a further measure of convenience and economy at church weddings, paper flowers are used nowadays in place of real ones for decorating the upper parts of floral arches. Nobody can possibly tell the difference; there is a saving of many costly roses or orchids; and, what is most important, much of the work can be done in advance, leaving only the filling out of the design with real blossoms for the morning before the ceremony. Of course, the real flowers are employed for the lower portions of the arches, and wherever else they are likely to be examined.

The rose trees commonly used, and with such beautiful effect, at church weddings and in ballrooms are usually artificial, in part, at least. Set in pots, they have all the appearance of the natural article, the trunks being real enough; but the foliage and flowers, though not themselves an imitation, are merely fastened to the trunks by thrusting the branches and stems through loops of wire.

AN INSECT AUGER—A cricket with an arsenal that would fit out a small boy's pocket-knife.

AMONG the species of animals and insects brought to light by scientific exploration of the island possessions of the United States none perhaps is more remarkable than the changa, or mole cricket (scapteriscus didactylus), of Porto Rico.

This fierce and mysterious insect, which in Porto Rico destroys more than a hundred thousand dollars' worth of growing crops annually, and which thus far has defied attempts at its extermination, has four jaws, each provided with six strong teeth and a blade. It has also four eyes. In excavating, the changa rotates its big head like an auger, thus smoothing the walls of the passageway.

The joints and tips of its legs are provided with spadelike teeth. Its ears—at least its auditory organs—are at its elbows, protected by a raised fold. Hair on its body protects it from moist earth. Between this hair and the body air-tight compartments prevent the changa from drowning when freshets descend upon its habitat. It is most at home when under the surface of the earth. It can fly, however, but does not venture out save on the darkest nights.

In attacking cane or tobacco plants it first severs the roots with its powerful mandibles and then pulls the plants part way into its corridors. The result is that a sugar cane or tobacco field with plants six inches above the ground one day will, on the next day after the changa has attacked it, show perhaps but two inches above the surface. After the changa has satisfied its hunger it has a mania for destroying every growing thing within reach. A colony of these underground pests will in a night destroy an entire crop of cane, tobacco, rice, cabbage, tomatoes or turnips. Having accomplished their work of devastation, they will emerge and start on an overland trip to the next farm.

HASH À LA FILIPINO—The new ration which the Government is furnishing soldiers in the Philippines.

THE War Department has just sent to the Philippines, as an experiment, 10,000 cans of a new kind of army ration. It is called "roast beef hash," and is confidently expected to solve the long-puzzling problem of furnishing to our soldiers in the field a perfectly healthful and appetizing article of meat diet.

Soldiers must have meat, and during a campaign many difficulties are in the way of furnishing it. Cured meat will not do; it must be fresh. To drive cattle in sufficient numbers along with an army is not ordinarily practicable. In the Philippines frozen beef from Australia is made to serve to some extent, where troops are not far from the seaports, and it remains in good condition for about twenty days. But in active service in the field canned meat is the only thing that fills the requirements.

Tinned meats for military purposes obtained a rather bad reputation during the last war with Spain, but since then the Commissary Bureau of the War Department has been experimenting with a view to the production of something more satisfactory, and the "roast beef hash" referred to represents the final and successful result. It is quite as good and appetizing as any dish of hash served on the tables of well-to-do people, and it contains a considerable proportion of potatoes and onions—ingredients which are of important value because of their healthfulness. Provided with a few cans of this hash the soldier can get along very comfortably for a good many days, so far as food is concerned, though cut off from supply trains.

LEARN TO WRITE SHORTHAND

STENOGRAPHY AS IT SHOULD BE TAUGHT, AND AS NO OTHER MAN EVER TAUGHT IT.

The name "Page-Davis Company" has always stood for the highest standard of correspondence instruction.

Students enrolling with this institution are placed under the direct, personal instruction of Robert P. Rose, the official reporter of the last Democratic National Convention and the only stenographer accompanying the late President McKinley throughout his great western tour.

The beginner is given the advantage of expert, practical instruction from the very start and he therefore learns nothing that he has to undo later in the course.

Our graduates write expert shorthand and READ it.

Our graduate stenographers are not timid for fear of incompetency. Their proficiency makes them self-confident.

Our graduates are not only competent, but are absolutely sure of their ability.

A business man never refers to one of our graduates as "a beginner."

Employers do not find it necessary to "educate" our graduates.

We will double the speed of stenographers of any other system and qualify them for expert court reporting.

Our book, "Progress in Shorthand," mailed free. It tells everything.

Deafness Overcome

Louisville man originates a simple little device that instantly restores the hearing—fits perfectly, comfortably and does not show.

190-page book FREE: tells all about it

Since the discovery of a Louisville man it is no longer necessary for any deaf person to carry a trumpet, a tube or any such old-fashioned device, for it is now possible for any one to hear perfectly by a simple invention that fits in the ear and cannot be detected. The honor belongs to Mr. George H. Wilson, of Louisville, who was himself deaf and now hears as well as any one. He calls it Wilson's Common Sense Ear Drum, is built on the strictest scientific principles, containing no metal of any kind, and is entirely new in every respect. It is so small that no one can see it, but nevertheless it collects all sound waves and diverts them against the drum-head, causing you to hear perfectly. It will do this even when the natural ear drums are partially or entirely destroyed, perforated, scarred, relaxed, or thickened. It fits any ear from childhood to old age, and aside from the fact that it does not show, it never causes the hearer irritation, and can be used with comfort day or night.

It will relieve deafness whether acquired from catarrh, scarlet fever, typhoid or brain fever, measles, whooping cough, gathering in the ear, shocks from artillery or through accidents. It not only relieves, but stays the progress of deafness and all roaring and buzzing noises. It does this in a simple, sure and scientific way. The effect is immediate.

Let every person who needs this at once send to the company for its 190-page book, which you can have free. It describes and illustrates Wilson's Common Sense Ear Drums and contains many bona-fide letters from numerous users in the United States, Canada, Mexico, England, Scotland, Ireland, Wales, Australia, New Zealand, Tasmania, India. These letters are from people in every station of life—clergymen, physicians, lawyers, merchants, society ladies, etc.—and tell the truth about the benefits to be derived from the use of this wonderful little device. You will find among them the names of people in your own town or State, and you are at liberty to write to any of them you wish and secure their opinion as to the merits of the only scientific ear drums for restoring the hearing to its normal condition.

Write to-day and it will not be long before you are again hearing. Address, for the free book and convincing evidence,

GETTING ON

Life Rules of Leaders

By Arthur Twining Hadley

President of Yale University

TELL nothing but the truth to any one. If a case arises where it is hard to be both truthful and courteous, put all the thought you can spare upon solving the problem.

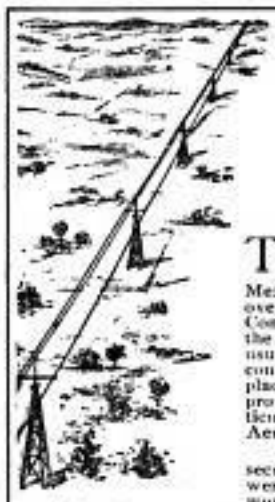
Tell the whole truth to yourself. If you have made a mistake, face the facts squarely. Do not worry about it, for a mistake is seldom fatal unless it has been repeated. But do not excuse it, for this means that you surely will repeat it until it becomes fatal.

Do not think about one piece of business when you ought to be thinking about another; and above all things, do not think about any business when you ought to be sleeping.

Believe in people's good intentions, even when you cannot approve their actions or concur in their judgment; but beware of concurring in their judgment or approving their actions merely because you believe in their good intentions.

Believe in your friends, in your associates, in your work. Believe in God just as fully as your intellectual constitution will allow—not necessarily as the subject of a creed, but as an unseen ruler of the universe, who is somehow going to bring things out more squarely than our limited vision can comprehend.

By General W. A. Bancroft



President of the Boston Elevated Railway

BE INDUSTRIOUS. To do this keep in good health. Get adequate sleep; get adequate exercise in the fresh air; be moderate in eating and drinking. Better totally abstain from the use of alcoholic drinks, and even from tea and coffee. There are times when a busy man must work hard for a long period and become thereby exhausted. When this is necessary, plan to recuperate, and recuperate. For a busy man so to care for his health means many sacrifices. For example: One may have to give up an attractive evening's entertainment for the sake of making up one's sleep; one may have to forego the pleasure of meeting agreeable acquaintances for the sake of taking suitable exercise in the open air. But in order to be for the greatest portion of the time in the best condition to do hard work it is essential to preserve one's health. It is not, therefore, enough to resolve to be industrious. A man who disregards the rules of health may do half again as much work as another man of the same capacity who regards these rules—but the first will not last.

Try to deal fairly with every one, and try, if possible, to satisfy every one that it is your intention to deal fairly with him. Sometimes it is not in a person's power to do what he knows is just, and yet it may be his intention to be just.

Be attentive to small things—that is, never neglect to do anything because it seems trifling or unimportant, if it can be done as well as not.

Do perfunctory things as soon as they can be done, but be thoughtful—that is, do not do a thing simply because it can be done to-day. It may appear to-morrow that it ought not to have been done to-day. Reflection may show conclusively that this is so. One ought to have a reason for doing whatever one does.

110 Miles of Steel Towers

THE largest order ever placed for steel towers has just been executed by the Aermotor Company, Chicago. The order was for 1200 steel towers to support large electric cables. These towers are to be erected in the interior of Mexico, to carry electricity from an immense water power plant up to the mines, over 100 miles distant. The order for these towers came to the Aermotor Company unsolicited. The reputation of the Aermotor Company for building the best steel towers, for windmill and other purposes, brought them this unusual order. When the engineering and mining experts, who were placing the contract, were making up their specifications for these towers, they found no place in the construction of the Aermotor tower where they could suggest improvement. The sizes of some of the parts were changed to meet their particular needs, but the design of the towers remained precisely the same as the Aermotor Company perfected it years ago.

It was of very great importance to the company buying these towers to secure the greatest possible strength with the least material. These towers were to be placed about 500 feet apart. The weight of the long span of cables would be a very heavy load, to say nothing of the enormous side strain which might come upon the towers. Then, too, the contingency of one or more of the cables breaking, and throwing unequal strain upon different parts of the towers, had to be considered. The Aermotor Company guaranteed these towers to stand until the 3-inch, extra strong wrought iron pipe in the top should bend over. They stood this very severe test without the least indication of buckling in any part of the tower.

The item of freight was another important consideration. These towers, as built by the Aermotor Company, made over 75 carloads. No other concern could have furnished towers of anything like the same strength with less than 100 cars of material.

Testing the Towers.

The Aermotor Company has a very great advantage over all others in the manufacture of steel towers. It was the first in the field, and had all the most vital features fully covered by patents before competitors were through laughing at the idea of a steel tower. The Aermotor tower was designed by mechanical experts who knew what points were essential to secure the greatest strength with the least material.

The tops of the corner posts of the Aermotor towers are dovetailed into each other and securely clamped together. This makes them as solid as though they were welded into a single piece. This patented device in the Aermotor tower brings all of the strain directly upon the corner posts where it belongs. The braces and girts have nothing to do but hold the corners in line. Because other makers are not able to adopt this feature, they are compelled to use a large amount of extra material in their towers, and even then their towers are not so strong. Weight often indicates weakness rather than strength. All the weight not needed serves only to bring additional strain upon the parts which must bear it.

The best steel tower, like the best bicycle, is the one which secures the greatest strength with the least possible material. The Aermotor tower is strong, safe and durable. Every pound of steel which is put into it is used to the best advantage. A tower twice as heavy, but poorly constructed, would be weaker.

The tower is a very important consideration in buying a windmill outfit. If the tower goes down, the best windmill will be worthless.

WRITE FOR OUR WINDMILL BOOK

We have a book that tells all about windmills. It begins with the Dutch windmills of 1400 and ends with the Aermotor of 1903. It contains 125 pictures to show you what windmills should do and what they should be. It tells all that invention has done for them. When you read this book you will know all that anyone knows about windmills. You will know the right kind from the wrong kind and know all the differences. HOW SHALL A YOUNG MAN SUCCEED?

The most helpful thing is a good working knowledge of the great science and art of advertising. It will make him keener, brighter—more efficient all the rest of his life. He can turn his knowledge into money. Many "ad-writers" earn $20 to $100 a week, and more. And few employees have so good a chance for advancement. The position is pleasant, lucrative and dignified. My method of instruction is so simple and complete, that any man, or woman, with a good command of the English language can, in three months, acquire sufficient knowledge to begin to earn money, though I keep in touch with my students, and help them, and advise them for a whole year. To those who are interested enough to forward 6 cents to cover mailing, I will send, free, booklets and other matter, including, among other things, "How Shall a Young Man Succeed?" "The Ill-Fortune of Brother Bill," "Other People's Brains," "Who Should Study Advertising," "Why Advertising Should be Studied," "Why and How Advertising can be Taught."

Be methodical—that is, have a method for doing things that have to be done repeatedly, and have that method the best one that you can devise, or that can be devised for you, with the resources under your control.

Study the conditions with which you have to deal. If you are an employee, do your utmost to carry out the plans of your employers. Study their habits of mind, so far as you can do so intelligently. Endeavor to make suggestions. In other words, endeavor to think for them. If they do not adopt all your suggestions it may be that some ought not to be adopted. It may be, of course, that you have not the information upon which to think. It may be that you have not made your suggestions clear. It may be that your employer has not had sufficient time to consider them. It may be that he knows of some reason, unknown to you, why your suggestions should not be adopted. But it is for your interest to keep on thinking and suggesting. If you are in an independent business, or have to deal with a community yourself, study the community—its institutions, its political, commercial, social conditions; compare it with other communities of a corresponding character and then make use of the information so obtained.

Do not leave duties to others which you ought yourself to perform. What can be delegated ought to be delegated only to competent and faithful persons, and so far as is in your power select no others; but do not fail to make use of a competent and faithful person simply because you have not selected him.

Be sure of the character and capacity of your advisers. Get the best advice from the best men whom you can reach.

Be civil to every one and keep control of yourself.

Avoid giving offense. Sometimes to do one's duty it is necessary to give offense, but do not give it needlessly.

By John H. Converse

Be useful; do everything that needs to be done as there is opportunity, whether in your particular department or not.

More Work for Inventors

By Nixon Waterman

WITH witeless telegraphy to stimulate the mind
We ought to set to work at once, nor rest until we find
A lot of undiscovered things to amplify our joy
And do away with many cares that bother and annoy.

A trackless railway route would save a mountain of expense,
A boatless line of steamships, too, would surely prove immense;
And let some mind evolve for us a go-less kind of go
So we can travel 'round the world yet stay at home, you know.

And since it costs so much to live we scarce can save a cent,
A foodless dinner is the thing some genius should invent;
And, after that, if we would have existence truly cheap,
Some grand philanthropist should make a bedless kind of sleep.

To-day the trouble is that things are as they have to be,
Whereas we'd rather have them as we'd rather have them; see?
(These verses seem so tangled that the author here explains
It's all because they're fashioned from a brainless kind of brains.)

STOP the LEAK with SYSTEM

There are tremendous leaks in modern business—leaks in the office, in the factory, in the store. System alone can stop them.

In many business houses the methods of our grandfathers are still continued. Expenses are out of all proportion to the amount of business transacted. System alone can set things right.

There are weak spots in the best equipped concerns. System will remedy the evil.

It will increase the earning capacity one hundred per cent. It will decrease expense. It will improve efficiency.

System is the watchword of modern commercial success. The great exponent of this modern idea is a 96-page monthly, so brimful of ideas and clever systems that any business or professional man can get many dollars' worth of assistance, no matter what his business, from every number.

The United States Fidelity & Guarantee Company say:

"Since the first of the year, when we subscribed to your magazine, we have completely changed our methods of bookkeeping, and have been guided solely by the suggestions contained in SYSTEM. We find the work is more simple, and, better still, there is less chance of error."

The general articles will help any man—business or professional. The special articles for one's own work no man can afford to miss.

Systems actually used in large successful factories, offices, stores, banks, publications, professions, are described in detail. And experts show how these same systems can be adapted to your business or profession—no matter what it is—how large or how small.

The rapid mobilization and concentration of the German armies on the frontier, after war had been declared against France in 1870, were entirely due to the smoothness with which the railway system was worked. Not many months elapsed before the position of Bleichroder as the chief financial adviser of the Government was still more signally recognized. Before the conclusion of peace, and whilst the headquarters of the German army were still at Versailles, Mr. Gerson Bleichroder was summoned to that place to give his opinion as to the amount of the indemnity to be demanded from France and as to its utilization. No equally huge financial transaction was ever carried through with greater facility. It fully bore out the prediction of the Berlin banker on whom, in return for his manifold services, a patent of nobility was conferred. Herr von Bleichroder remained at the head of his firm, which he had raised to its present position of importance, until his death in 1893, when the management of the business devolved first upon his cousin, Privy Councilor Schwabach, who died about five years ago, and then upon his two sons, Hans von Bleichroder and Dr. Georg von Bleichroder. The former was killed not many months ago in a motor-car accident, and Dr. Georg von Bleichroder is now the chief partner. The standing of the firm at the present time is maintained through its participation in the deals of the "Rothschild group" and through judicious abstention from the craze of financing industrial undertakings which has reduced many prominent German banks to the level of mere promoting concerns.

One of the best known of German financiers is the son of the founder and present head of the Direction der Disconto Gesellschaft, Privy Councilor Adolf von Hansemann. This bank also owes no inconsiderable part of its importance to its connection with the Prussian Government, in which the founder of the company, David Hansemann, held the post of Minister of Finance until his death in 1864. His son Adolf joined the board in 1857 and represented the family interests during the years of office of his father. The financial operations following the conclusion of peace in 1871, and even more so the growth of German foreign trade, helped to raise the Disconto Gesellschaft (as it is usually called) to the leading position it now holds. It introduced German capital into Italy, Chili, Brazil, and latterly also in China, where its affiliated banks act as important aids to German commerce.

A German banker whose name was well known and respected all over the civilized world, Johann Georg von Sienens, one of the founders of the largest German banking institution, the Deutsche Bank, died early in 1902. His career, since he joined the directorate of the new company in 1870 at the age of thirty-one, shows, perhaps more clearly than that of any other German financier, a truly wonderful change which the consolidation of the Empire effected in the commercial position of the company. It was the aim of his life, and therefore became the main purpose of the Deutsche Bank, to cultivate and extend the trade with oversea relations among whom many Germans had already found new homes, but had in the process lost sight almost completely of the growth of the commerce of their native country. The new bank became not only a pioneer of German industries, but also an important factor in the foreign relations of the Empire, which it helped by the introduction of German capital into Turkey in Asia Minor, thereby securing the German Government a much more influential position with the Porte than it ever held before. The Anatolian Railway and the Bagdad Railway, when finished, will be monuments to Herr von Sienens' activity, a fact which was appreciated by the Emperor when he raised the financier to the Prussian nobility two years before his death.

The Deutsche Bank has had a strong footing in British South Africa ever since the goldfields were discovered at Witwatersrand. The late Mr. Adolf Goerz, who founded the famous firm which bears his name as a limited liability company, was practically the pioneer of the vast interests now controlled by the mother institution in the Transvaal and in German Southwest Africa. The Dresdener Bank, another powerful group of Teutonic capitalists, is represented in equally extensive mining and industrial investments in

Majestic

PLENTY OF HOT WATER

This style of MAJESTIC solves the hot water problem where a city water supply is not available. The reservoir shown on the left is entirely of copper, tinned inside and nickel plated on the outside. It holds 17 gallons and has no faucets to leak. Its great superiority lies in the fact that while cooking an ordinary breakfast the water will come to a boil, and when it boils a child can move the reservoir away from the range—into the position indicated by dotted lines—by turning the crank toward the range (see arrow in illustration). Properly used this reservoir is good for 25 years without a leak.

Every need suited. The above is only one of many styles of Majestic Ranges. Others meet different conditions—all embody right principles of construction and are sold by first-class dealers generally.

If you do not find a Majestic dealer in your immediate vicinity, write us. We will give you the name of the nearest one and send you our BOOKLET showing many different styles, with valuable information about cooking, ranges and proper arrangement of the kitchen. Also 100 recipes by famous cooks.

the Transvaal gold-fields by the Brothers Albu. The British ruefully admit that the gold-mining industry of South Africa—Anglo-African as it is often called—is more German than British.

No sketch of the money kings of the modern world would be complete without an account of the greatest of all the industrials of the Old World. Krupp, of Essen, has long been a household word throughout the world. The cannon king, whose batteries did almost as much as the breechloading needle-gun to found the German Empire, was much more than a gun-maker. Only thirty per cent. of the output at Essen was dedicated to the service of the God of War. But as inter arma silent leges so the roar of the Krupp cannon has drowned the praises which would otherwise have paid tribute to this veritable Vulcan of the industrial world.

The story of the creation of the Krupp dynasty is one of the heroic romances of the nineteenth century. It is a story of indomitable perseverance, of farsighted patriotism, triumphing after interminable delays over almost inconceivable difficulties. When Krupp the Third died last November the newspapers of the world were filled with glowing accounts of the magnificence of the estate—richer and more important than many a kingdom—which he left to his heirs.

Krupp's works at Essen had practically converted a village of 10,000 inhabitants into a Birmingham or Pittsburg with a population of from 100,000 to 150,000. The number of workmen on the pay-roll of the firm numbered 46,000. Nearly 40,000 cannon cast in the Krupp foundries were to be found in the arsenals of every State from China to Peru. Krupp owned great steel works near Magdeburg, an artillery range at Meppen, and the Germania shipyard and dock at Kiel. The firm owned and worked three large coal mines in Germany, and many iron mines in Germany and in Spain. A fleet of steamers owned by Krupp had their headquarters at Rotterdam. His agents traveled more like ambassadors than commercial travelers in every part of the civilized world. To feed the forges of this German Vulcan four tons of coal and coke were consumed every minute of every day in the livelong year. Emperors were eager to do Krupp honor, kings sat at his table. Titles the Krupps disdained; to be plain Herr Krupp was sufficient distinction for any man. Finally it was recorded with awestruck breath that Krupp was the richest man in Germany, paying income taxes these last years on an income of $5,000,000 per annum.

The whole of this gigantic establishment was built up on the foundations laid a hundred years ago by Frederick Krupp—Krupp the First. It is noteworthy that the incentive to begin the manufacture of steel came to the first Krupp in the shape of a desire to rival Sheffield, which then was the leading steel-making centre in the world.

Krupp was born at Essen and there in 1818 he built a small furnace and began the manufacture of steel. In 1822 he found that he had lost a fortune and impaired his health. He then moved with his family into a little one-story cottage which now stands in the centre of the works at Essen. There he lived in sickness and comparative penury for four years, and there he died in 1826, leaving his son Alfred, a lad of fourteen, to carry on the business, to support his mother and the younger children. He had no capital; his only assets were a factory and four workmen.

Years afterward when Krupp was famous throughout the world, Alfred, then Krupp the Second, ordered that the little cottage, where he had spent hundreds of sleepless nights, should be put in exactly the same shape as it was originally. He said, "I desire that it should be kept intact so long as the factory exist in order that my successors, like myself, may look with pleasure upon this memorial, this origin, of the great works."

Alfred Krupp the Second was fortunate in having a noble mother. It is noteworthy that the success of the Rothschilds and of the Krupps alike may be traced back to the character and capacity of a woman. Mrs. Krupp was her son's best friend and business adviser. Like Mr. Carnegie he did not marry till his mother died. Mother and son for twenty-six years labored hand in hand to build up from such small beginnings the greatest iron and steel works in the world.

It is a curious coincidence that as it was a desire to rival English steel makers which spurred Krupp the First to begin steel making, it was the lucky sale of a patent for making silver-plated spoons to an English firm which gave Krupp the Second the capital with which to realize his father's ambition. He set to work to manufacture the best steel in the world. No good steel could be made, he said, excepting from good iron, and from the first he aimed at making his works self-supporting. It was not till twenty-one years after his father's death that he began making guns from cast steel. He made his fortune in making railway plant; his weldless steel for car-wheels alone made him a fortune. What he made in manufacturing articles of peace he spent in making weapons of war. So far from being encouraged, the Prussian War Office did all it could to damp his ardor. Twelve years passed before, in 1859, he received an order to supply Prussia with 300 cannon. In 1866 his guns aided in the defeat of Austria, and in 1870 they consummated the overthrow of the French Empire.

From that year all was plain sailing. But the obstacles over which he had to triumph before he reached that point were almost inconceivable. It was very surprising that officialdom, especially Prussian officialdom, which is nothing if not paternal, looked askance at the proposal that the batteries of the King should be armed by a private manufacturer. Most Governments make their own cannon, but Germany, which owns its own railways, and is so jealous of private enterprises as not to allow a man to hire his own cart to carry his neighbor's goods, depends for its artillery upon a private firm, which supplies at the same time all the armies of all its rivals.

Krupp the Second reigned till 1887. When he died he handed over the works which he had inherited from his father sixty-one years before to his son Frederick, who died last November. He began with four workmen; when he left the works to his successor there were more than twenty thousand men on the pay-roll. He reigned over his men very much as a Prussian king reigns over Prussia. He was benevolent and intelligent, but he was an autocrat. The management of the business he deputed to a cabinet of fourteen heads of departments presided over by a chairman whom he named. But the works were his works—no one ever was permitted to forget that; the name of the man on horseback was Alfred Krupp. He looked after his men in his benevolent, paternal fashion; the works at Essen became the model industrial establishment in Germany. It was a kind of German Pullman. The sick fund, the pension fund, and the insurance fund which he founded, the first two in the fifties, the last in 1877, became the model of the Imperial social reforms of the close of the century. He built model workmen's houses, started a coöperative society, and supplied his men with all the appurtenances of civilization in the shape of hospitals, baths, schools and libraries. The contribution of the firm to these various funds, savings banks and so forth is said to amount to $1,000,000 per annum.

When Krupp the Second died and Krupp the Third came to the throne a change came o'er the spirit of the dream. Frederick Krupp was an able man with artistic tendencies. But he had not the energy of his father. He died last November and the Kaiser did public honor to his memory. Never before had a Money King been laid to rest with an Emperor as chief mourner.

"What are you talking about, Jenny?" demanded her mother sharply.

"Why, I married Tom Burster half an hour ago. He's putting the notices in all the papers for to-morrow morning. Everybody'll think I changed my mind and shook Frothingham. And I did, too!"

"Jenny!" exclaimed her father. "Tom Burster!"

"And he's coming here to dinner, if you don't object," she continued. "If you do, why I'll join him and we'll go away and give you a chance to cool off." She caught her father by the beard. "What do you say, Daddy? Say yes, or I'll pull."

"Yes," replied her father with a huge sigh of relief—his daughter was contented; her and their vanity would be spared; Tom Burster would not demand or want a dower; he was not only independent, but also one of the most forward young "self-made" rich men in Chicago. "You've got more sense than all the rest of the family put together," he exclaimed proudly, patting her on the head.

And in an absent, reflective tone she said: "I always felt I'd have some use for Tom sooner or later."

8 Ever Blooming ROSES FREE

TO get you interested we will send you absolutely free, all charges prepaid, the following eight roses: They are not cheap, common roses; they are the choicest and most famous varieties. They are healthy, well-rooted plants; well packed, and we guarantee that they will reach you in perfect condition; accompanying each lot of plants there are full directions for planting, care, etc.

CLIMBING METEOR—It has been called perpetual blooming, climbing, General Jacqueminot. It is a free, persistent bloomer, and will make a growth of from 10 to 15 feet in a season; is blooms all the time. Its flowers, deep, rich red and are much larger than Meteor and are richer in color. It is just the rose to train up the veranda or around windows.

THE BRIDE—The largest white ever-blooming rose grown. The color is a delicate creamy white, very full flowers, measuring from 3½ to 4 inches in diameter.

DUCHESS DE BRABANT—This rose combines exquisite perfume, beautiful coloring and a matchless profusion of flowers and foliage. Soft, light rose, with heavy shading of amber and salmon.

BRIDESMAID—The bud is of exquisite shape and contour, so solid and firm, and stems are so long and stiff that no other rose will compare with it in keeping qualities after being cut. It is a bright pink, and is the same color all the time, under every condition of the weather and surroundings.

CLOTHILDE SOUPERT—It is a strong, vigorous grower. The flowers are large, double and beautiful in form, borne in sprays, and the color blends from a soft shell-pink to a pure satiny white.

THE UNIQUE ROSE, MME. FRANCESKA KRUGER—The striking color of this handsome rose places it at once in the front as a bud producer in the open air. In its shading of deep, coppery yellow it stands unique and distinct from all others. The flower, when open, is of good size and very symmetrical. One of the finest roses to plant in masses and clumps.

SAFRANO—Bright apricot-yellow, changing to orange and fawn, sometimes tinted with rose; valued highly for its beautiful buds; fragrant and a rampant grower.

MARIE VAN HOUTTE—Pale yellow, edge of petals often lined with rose, well formed, of good habit, and in every respect a most charming sort. The finest Tea Rose for outdoor culture.

Tints rather than colors, subdued effects rather than pronounced contrasts, these are what constitute the charm of stained shingles, and make even the low cost house a thing of beauty. No house, no matter how cheap or ordinary in architecture, can justly be regarded as commonplace if the shingles are stained to match the woodwork or general color tone of the building.

Shingletint is a scientific combination of linseed oil, coloring matter, creosote oils and the necessary drying agents, and its use produces the most artistic and durable color effects known on Shingles.

every 125 miles for coal and every 90 miles for water, but the 20 horse-power travels 150 miles with one filling of gasoline and lubricating oil. With the improved cooling system the only loss of water is by natural evaporation, consequently one filling of the water tank will suffice for several days.

Winton Touring Car

The Winton is a practical, symmetrical and handsomely appointed touring car, with greater enduring qualities than the railroad locomotive, greater than any other automobile manufactured or sold in America.

Every mile in a Winton is a mile of comfort. Body of carriage is suspended on long and elastic springs—there is a long wheel base—tires are large and resilient—upholstery of seats the most luxurious ever made part of automobile equipment—backs of seats are high—tonneau accommodates three persons comfortably—front seat is divided, giving a snug and secure position to the driver. These, and many other features which combine to insure the greatest possible degree of comfort in riding, make you think rough roads do not exist.

Lubrication is automatic; there being no oil cups or gauges to call the operator's attention from the road ahead. Transmission gears are secure within a dust-proof case and run in an oil bath. The motor, differential, water pump, etc., are similarly encased and protected. Price of WINTON TOURING CAR, complete with two full brass side lamps, detachable tonneau, etc., $2,500.

Visit any of our branch or agency depots and the many features of Winton excellence will be fully demonstrated.

PLAIN FIN—Paper-Hanger

A Tale of a Man, a Punt and an Inn

By F. Hopkinson Smith

THE man was a little sawed-off, red-headed Irishman with twinkling, gimlet eyes, two up-curved lips always in a broad smile, and a pair of thin, caliper-shaped legs.

His name was as brief as his stature.

"Fin, your honor, by the grace of God. F-i-n, Fin. There was a 'Mac' in front of it once, and an 'n' to the tail of it in the old times, so me mother says, but some of me ancisters—bad cess to 'em!—wiped 'em out. Plain Fin, if you plase, sur."

The punt was the ordinary Thames boat: a long, narrow, flat-bottomed, shallow craft with tapering ends decked over to serve as seats, the whole propelled by a pole the size of a tight-rope dancer's and about as difficult to handle.

Chartering the punt had been easy. All I had had to do was to stroll down the path bordering the river, run my eye over a group of boats lying side by side like a school of trout with their noses up-stream, pick out the widest, flattest and least upsettable craft in the fleet, decorate it with a pair of Turkey-red cushions from a pile in the boathouse, and a short mattress, also Turkey-red—a good thing at luncheon hour for a tired back is a mattress—slip the key of the padlock of the mooring chain in my pocket and stroll back again.

The hiring of the man was more difficult, well-nigh impossible, for days after my arrival at Sonning-on-Thames, except at a price per diem which no staid old painter—they are all an impecunious lot—could afford. There were boys, of course, for the asking; sunburnt, freckle-faced, tousle-headed, barefooted little devils who, when my back was turned, would do handsprings over my cushions, landing on the mattress, or break the pole the first day out, leaving me high and dry on some island out of calling distance; but full-grown, sober-minded, steady men, who could pole all day or sit beside me patiently while I worked, hand me the right brush, or tube of color, or palette, or open a bottle of soda without spilling half of it—that kind of man was scarce.

Landlord Hull, of the White Hart Inn—what an ideal Boniface is this same Hull, and what an ideal inn—promised a boatman to pole the punt and look after my traps when the Henley regatta was over; and the owner of my own craft, and of fifty other punts besides, went so far as to say that he expected a man as soon as Lord Somebody-or-Other left for the Continent, when His Lordship's waterman would be free, adding meaningly:

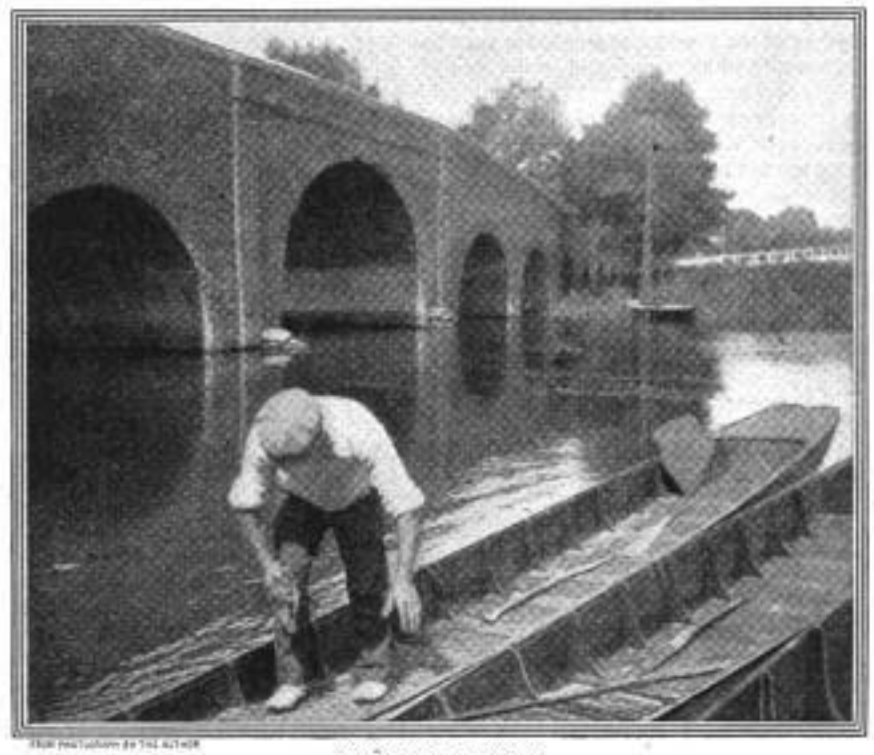
"Just at present, zur, when we do be 'avin' such a mob lot from Lunnon, 'specially at week's-end, zur—we ain't got men enough to do our own polin'. It's the war, zur, as has took 'em off. Maybe for a few day, zur, ye might take a 'and yerself if ye didn't mind."

I waved the hand referred to—the forefinger part of it—in a deprecating manner. I couldn't pole the lightest and most tractable punt ten yards in a straight line to save my own or anybody else's life. Then again, if I should impair the precision of my five fingers by any such violent exercise my brush would wabble as nervously over my canvas as a recording needle across a steam gauge. Poling a rudderless, keelless skiff up a crooked stream by means of a fifteen-foot balancing pole is an art only to be classed with that of rowing a gondola. Gondoliers and punters, like poets, are born, not made. My own Luigi comes of a race of gondoliers dating back two hundred years, and punters must spring from just such ancestors. No, if I had to do the poling myself I should rather get out and walk.

Fin solved the problem—not from any special training (rowing in regattas and the like), but rather from that universal adaptability of the Irishman which fits him for filling any situation in life, from a seat on a dirt cart to a chair in an aldermanic chamber.

"I am a paper-hanger by trade, sor," he began, "but I was brought up on the river and can put a punt wid de best. Try me, sor, at four bob a day; I'm out of a job."



I looked him over from his illuminated head down to his parenthetical legs, caught the merry twinkle in his eyes, and a sigh of relief escaped me. Here was not only a seafaring man, accustomed to battling with the elements, skilled in the handling of poles, and acquainted with swift and ofttimes dangerous currents, but a brother brush, a man conversant with design and pigments; an artist, keenly sensitive to straight lines, harmony of tints and delicate manipulation of surfaces.

I handed him the key at once. Thenceforward I was simply a passenger depending on his strong right arm for guidance, and at luncheon hour upon his alert and nimble, though incurved, legs for sustenance, the inn being often a mile away from my subject.

And the inns!—or rather my own particular inn—the White Hart at Sonning.

There are others, of course—the Red Lion at Henley; the old Warboys hostelry at Cookham; the Angler at Marlowe; the French Horn across the black water and within rifle-shot of the White Hart—a most pretentious place, designed for millionaires and spendthrifts, where even chops and tomato sauce, English pickles, chowchow and the like, ales in the wood and other like commodities and comforts, are dispensed at prices that compel all impecunious, staid painters like myself to content themselves with a sandwich and a pint of bitter—and a hundred other inns along the river, good, bad and indifferent. But yet with all their charms I am still loyal to my own White Hart.

Mine is an inn that sets back from the river with a rose garden in front the like of which you never saw nor smelt of: millions of roses in a never-ending bloom. An inn with low ceilings, a cubby-hole of a bar next the side entrance on the village street; two barmaids—three on holidays; old furniture; a big fireplace in the hall; red-shaded lamps at night; plenty of easy chairs and cushions. An inn all dimity and cretonne and brass bedsteads upstairs and unlimited tubs—one fastened to the wall painted white, and about eight feet long, to fit the largest pattern of Englishman. Out under the portico facing the rose garden and the river stand tables for two or four, with snow-white cloths made gay with field flowers, and the whole shaded by big movable Japanese umbrellas, regular circus-tent umbrellas, their staffs stuck in the ground wherever they are needed. Along the sides of this garden on the gravel walk loll go-to-sleep straw chairs, with little wicker tables within reach of your hand for B. & S., or tea and toast, or a pint in a mug, and down at the water's edge seafaring men like Fin and me find a boathouse with half a score of punts, skiffs and rowboats, together with a steam launch with fires banked ready for instant service.

CAUGHT UNAWARES

And the people in and of this White Hart Inn!

There are a bride and groom, of course. No well-regulated Thames inn can exist a week without a bride and groom. He is a handsome, well-knit, brown-skinned young fellow, who wears white flannel trousers, chalked shoes, a shrimp-colored flannel jacket and a shrimp-colored cap (Leander's colors) during the day and a faultlessly cut dress suit at night.

She has a collection of hats, some as big as small tea-tables; fluffy gowns for mornings; short frocks for boating; and a gold belt, two shoulder straps and a bunch of roses for dinner. They have three dogs between them—one four inches long—well, perhaps six, to be exact—another a bull terrier, and a third a St. Bernard as big as a Spanish burro. They have also a maid, a valet and a dog-cart, besides no end of blankets, whips, rugs, canes, umbrellas, golf sticks and tennis bats. They have stolen up here, no doubt, to get away from their friends, and they are having the happiest hours of their lives.

"Them two, sor," volunteers Fin as we pass them lying under the willows near my morning subject, "is as chuck-full of happiness as a hive's full of bees. They was out in their boat yisterday, sor, in all that pour, and it rolled off 'em same as a duck sheds water, and they laughin' so ye'd think they'd split. What's dresses to them, sor, and her father? Why, sor, he could buy and sell half Sonnin'. He's jist home from Africa—or he was, the week he was married—wid more lead inside him than would sink a corpse. You kin see for yerself that he's made for fightin'. Look at the eye on him!"

Then there is the solitary Englishman, who breakfasts by himself, and has the morning paper laid beside his plate the moment the post-cart arrives. Fin and I find him half the time on a bench in a cool place on the path to the Lock, his nose in his book, his tightly furled umbrella by his side. No dogs nor punts nor spins up the river for him. He is taking his holiday and doesn't want to be meddled with or spoken to.

There are, too, the customary maiden sisters—the unattended and forlorn—up for a week; and the young fellow down from London, all flannels and fishing-rods—three or four of them in fact, who sit round in front of the little sliding wicket facing the row of bottles and pump handles—divining rods for the beer below, these pump handles—chaffing the barmaids and getting as good as they send. And always, at night, one or more of the country gentry in for their papers, and who can be found in the cozy hall discussing the crops, the coming regatta, the chance of Leander's winning the race, or the latest reports of yesterday's cricket match.

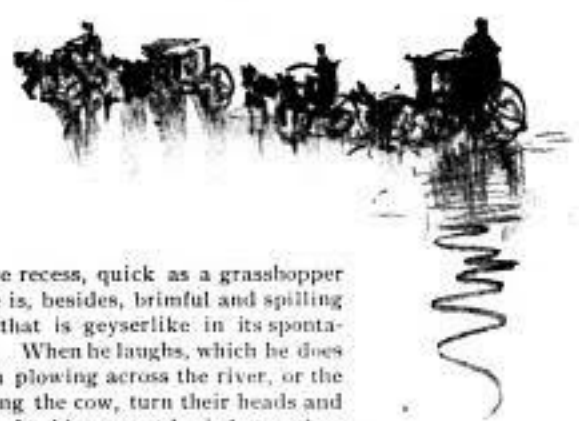
Now and then the village doctor or miller—quite an important man is the miller—you would think so if you could see the mill—drops in, draws up a chair and ventures an opinion on the price of wheat in the States or the coal strike or some kindred topic; the coming country fair, or perhaps the sermon of the previous Sunday.

"I hope you 'eard our Vicar, sir—No? Sorry you didn't, sir. I tell yer 'e's a nailer."

And so much for the company at the White Hart Inn.

II

YOU perhaps think that you know the Thames. You have been at Henley, no doubt, during regatta week, when both banks were flower-beds of blossoming parasols and full-blown picture hats, the river a stretch of silver, crowded with boats, their occupants cheering like mad. Or you know Marlowe with its wide stream bordered with stately trees and statelier mansions, and Oxford with its grim buildings, and Windsor dominated by its huge pile of stone, the flag of the Empires floating from its top; and Maidenhead with its boats and launches, and lovely Cookham with its back water and quaint mill and quainter lock. You have rowed down beside them all in a shell, or have had glimpses of them from the train, or sat under the awnings of the launch or regular packet and watched the procession go by. All very charming and interesting, and, if you had but forty-eight hours in which to see all England, a profitable way of spending eight of them. And yet you have only skimmed the beautiful river's surface as a swallow skims a lake.



Try a punt once.

Pole in and out of the little back waters, lying away from the river, smothered in trees; float over the shallows dotted with pond lilies; creep under drooping branches swaying with the current; stop at any one of a hundred landings, draw your boat up on the gravel, spring out and plunge into the thickets, flushing the blackbirds from their nests, or unpack your luncheon, spread your mattress and watch the clouds sail over your head. Don't be in a hurry. Keep up this idling day in and day out, up and down, over and across, for a month or more, and you will get some faint idea of how picturesque, how lovely and how restful this rarest of all the sylvan streams of England can be.

RAREST OF ALL THE SYLVAN STREAMS OF ENGLAND

If, like me, you can't pole a punt its length without running into a mud bank or afoul of the bushes, then send for Fin. If he isn't at Sonning you will hear of him at Cookham or Marlowe or London—but find him wherever he is. He will prolong your life and loosen every button on your waistcoat. Fin is the unexpected, the ever-bubbling and the ever-joyous: restless as a schoolboy ten minutes before recess, quick as a grasshopper and lively as a cricket. He is, besides, brimful and spilling over with a quality of fun that is geyserlike in its spontaneity and intermittent flow. When he laughs, which he does every other minute, the man plowing across the river, or the boy fishing, or the girl driving the cow, turn their heads and smile. They can't help it. In this respect he is better than a dozen farmers each with his two blades of grass. Fin plants a whole acre of laughs at once.

On one of my joyous days—they were all joyous days, this one most of all—I was up the back water, the "Mud Lark" (Fin's name for the punt) anchored in her element by two poles, one at each end, to keep her steady, when Fin broke through a new aperture and became reminiscent.

I had dotted in the outlines of the old footpath with the meadows beyond, the cotton-wool clouds sailing overhead—only in England do I find these clouds—and was calling to the restless Irishman to sit still or I would send him ashore . . . wet, when he answered with one of his bubbling outbreaks:

"I don't wonder yer hot, sor, but I git that fidgety. I been so long doin' nothin'; two months now, sor, since I been on a box."

I worked on for a minute without answering. Hanging wall-paper by standing on a box was probably the way they did it in the country, the ceilings being low.

"No work?" I said aimlessly. As long as he kept still I didn't care what he talked or laughed about.

"Plinty, sor—an' summer's the time to do it. So many strangers comin' an' goin', but they won't let me at it. I'm laid off for a month yet; that's why your job come in handy, sor."

"Row with your Union?" I remarked listlessly, my mind still intent on watching a sky tint above the foreground trees.

"No—wid the perlice. A little bit of a scrimmage wan night in Trafalgar Square. It was me own fault, sor, for I oughter a-knowed better. It was about three o'clock in the mornin', sor, and I was outside one o' them clubs just below Piccadilly, when one o' them young chaps come out wid three or four others, all b'ilin' drunk—one was Lord Bentig—jumps into a four-wheeler standin' by the steps an' hollers out to the rest of us: 'A guinea to the man that gits to Trafalgar Square fust: three minutes' start,' and off he wint and we after him, leavin' wan of the others behind wid his watch in his hand."

I laid down my palette and looked up. Paper-hanging evidently had its lively side.

"Afoot?"

"All four of 'em, sor—lickety-split and hell's loose. I come near runnin' over a bobbie as I turned into Pall Mall, but I dodged him and kep' on and landed second with the mare doubled up in a heap and the rig a-top of her and one shaft broke. Lord Bentig and the other chaps that was wid him was standin' waitin' and when we all fell in a heap he nigh bu'st himself a-laughin'. He went bail for us, of course, and give the three of us ten bob apiece, but I got laid off for three months and come up here where me old mother lives and I kin pick up a job."

"Hanging paper?" I suggested with a smile.

"Yes, or anything else. Ye see, sor, I'm handy carpenterin', or puttin' on locks, or the likes o' that, or paintin' or paper-hangin' or mendin' stoves or tinware. So when they told me a painter-chap wanted me, I looked over me perfessions and picked out the wan I tho't would suit him best. But it's drivin' a cab I'm good at; been on the box fourteen year come'next Christmas. Ye don't mind, do ye, sor, my not telling ye before? Lord Bentig'll tell ye all about me next time ye see him in Lunnon." This touch was truly Finian.

"He's cousin, ye know, sor, to this young chap what's here at the inn wid his bride. They wouldn't know me, sor, nor don't, but I've driv her father many a time. My rank used to be near his house on Bolton Terrace. I had a thing happen there one night that—more water? Yes, sor—and the other brush—the big one? Yes, sor—thank ye, sor. I don't shake, do I, sor?"

"No, Fin; go on."

"Well, I was tellin' ye about the night Sir Henry's man—that's the lady's father, sor—come to the rank where I sat on me box. It was about ten o'clock—rainin' hard and bad goin', it was that slippery.

"'His Lordship wants ye in a hurry, Fin,' and he jumped inside.

"When I got there I see something was goin' on—a party or something—the lights was lit clear up to the roof.

"'His Lordship's waitin' in the hall for ye,' said his man, and I jumped off me box and wint inside.

"'Fin,' said His Lordship, speakin' low, 'there's a lady dinin' wid me and the wine's gone to her head, and she's that full that if she waits until her own carriage comes for her she won't git home at all! Go back and get on yer cab wid yer fingers to yer hat and I'll bring her out and put her in meself. It's dark and she won't know the difference. Take her down to Cadogan Square—I don't know the number, but ye can't miss it, for it's the fust white house with geraniums in the winders. When ye git there ye're to git down, help her up the steps, keepin' yer mouth shut, unlock the door and set her down on the sofa. You'll find the sofa in the parlor on the right, and can't miss it. Then lay the key on the mantel—here it is. After she's down step out softly, close the door behind ye, ring the bell and some of her servants will come and put her to bed. She's often took that way and they know what to do.' Then he says, lookin' at me straight, 'I sent for you, Fin, for I know I kin trust ye. Come here to-morrow and let me know how she got through and I'll give ye five bob.'

"Well, sor, in a few minutes out she come, leanin' on His Lordship's arm, steppin' loike she had spring-halt and takin' half the sidewalk to turn in.

"'Good-night, Your Ladyship,' says His Lordship.

"'Good-night, Sir Henry,' she called back, her head out of the winder, and off I driv.

"I turned into the Square, found the white house wid the geraniums, helps her out of me cab and steadied her up the steps, pulled the key out, and was just goin' to put it in the lock when she fell up agin the door and open it went. The gas was turned low in the hall, so that she wouldn't know me if she looked at me.

"I found the parlor, but the lights were out; so widout lookin' for the sofa—I was afraid somebody'd come and catch me—I slid her into a rockin'-chair, laid the key on the hall table, shut the door softlike, rang the bell as if there was a fire next door, jumped on me box and driv off.

"The next mornin' I went to see His Lordship.

"'Did ye land her all right, Fin?'

"'I did, sor,' I says.

"'Had ye any trouble wid the key?'

"'No, sor,' I says; 'the door was open.'

"'That's queer,' he says; 'maybe her husband came in earlier and forgot to shut it. And ye put her on the sofa——'

"'No, sor, in a big chair.'

"'In the parlor on the right?'

"'No, sor, in a little room on the left—down one step——'

"He stopped and looked at me.

"'Ye're sure ye put her in the fust white house?'

"'I am, sor.'

"'Wid geraniums in the winder?'

"'Yes, sor.'

"'Red?' he says.

"'No, white,' I says.

"'On the north side of the Square?'

"'No,' I says, 'on the south.'

"'Fin,' he says, 'ye left her in the wrong house!'"

It was I who shook the boat this time.

"Oh, ye needn't laugh, sor; it was no laughin' matter. I got me five bob, but I lost His Lordship's custom, and I didn't dare go near Cadogan Square for a month."

These disclosures opened up a new and wider horizon. Heretofore I had associated Fin with simple country life—as a cheery craftsman—a Jack-of-all-trades: one day attired in overalls, with paste-pot, shears and ladder, brightening the walls of the humble cottagers, and the next in polo cap and ragged white sweater, the gift of some summer visitor (his invariable costume with me), adapting himself to the peaceful needs of the river. Here, on the contrary and to my great surprise, was a cosmopolitan; a man versed in the dark and devious ways of a great city; familiar with life in its widest sense; one who had touched on many sides and who knew the cafés, the rear entrances to the theatres and the short cut to St. John's Wood with the best and worst of them. These discoveries came with a certain shock, but they did not impair my interest in my companion. They really endeared him to me all the more.

After this I was no longer content with listening to his rambling dissertations on whatever happened to rise in his memory and throat. I began to direct the output. It was not a difficult task; any incident or object, however small, served my purpose.

The four-inch dog acted as valve this morning.

Somebody had trod on His Dogship; some unfortunate biped born to ill luck. In and about Sonning to tread on a dog or to cause any animal pain is looked upon as an unforgivable crime. Dogs are made to be hugged and coddled and given the best cushion in the boat. "A man, a girl and a dog" is as common as "a man, a punt and an inn."

Instantly the four-inch morsel—four inches, now that I think of it, is about right; six inches is too long—this morsel, I say, let out a yell as shrill as a launch whistle and as fetching as a baby's cry. Instantly three chambermaids, two barmaids, the two maiden sisters who were breakfasting on the shady side of the inn gable, and the dog's owner, who, in a ravishing gown, was taking her coffee under one of the Japanese umbrellas, came rushing out of their respective hiding-places, impelled by an energy and accompanied by an impetuousness rarely seen except perhaps in some heroic attempt to save a drowning child sinking for the last time.

"The darlin'"—this from Katy the barmaid, who got to him first—"who's stomped on him?"

"How outrageous to be so cruel!"—this from the two maiden sisters.

"Give him to me, Katy—oh, the brute of a man!"—this from the fair owner.

The solitary Englishman with his book and his furled umbrella, who in his absorption had committed the crime, strode on without even raising his hat in apology.

"D——d little beast!" I heard him mutter as he neared the boathouse where Fin and I were stowing cargo. "Ought to be worn on a watch-chain or in her buttonhole."

Fin had his hand on his lips keeping his laughing apparatus in order until the solitary disappeared down the path to the trees, then he leaned my way.

"I know him, sor," he whispered. "He's a barrister down in Temple Bar. He don't remember me, sor, but I know him. He's always treadin' on something—something alive—always, sor, and wid both feet! He trod on me once. I thought it was him when I see him fust—but I wasn't sure till I asked Landlord Hull about him."

"How came you to know him?"

"Well, sor, he had an old lady on his list two years ago that was always disputin' distances and goin' to law about her cab fares. I picked her up one day in St. James Street and druv her to Kensington Gardens and charged her the rates, and she kicked and had me up before the magistrate, and this old ink-bottle appeared for her. She's rich and always in hot water. Well, we had it measured and I was right, and it cost her me fare and fifteen bob besides. When it was figured up she owed me sixpence more measurement I hadn't charged her for the first time, and I summoned her and made her pay it and twelve bob more to teach her manners. What pay he got I don't know, but I got me sixpence. He was born back here about a mile—that's why he comes here for his holiday."

Fin stopped stowing cargo—two bottles of soda, a piece of ice in a bucket, two canvases, my big easel and a lunch basket—and moving his cap back from his freckled forehead said with as much gravity as he could maintain:

"I ought to have been a barrister, sor; I started as one."

The statement did not surprise me. Had he added that he had coached the winning crew of the regatta the year before, laid the marquetry floors of Cliveden (not far away), or led the band at the late Lord Mayor's show, I should have received his statements with equal equanimity. So I simply remarked, "When was that, Fin?" quite as I should had I been gathering details for his biography—my only anxiety being to get the facts chronologically correct.

"When I was a gossoon of twenty, sor—maybe eighteen—I'm fifty now, so it's far back enough, God knows. And it all happened, too, not far from that old ink-bottle's place in Temple Bar. I was lookin' at it wan day last winter when I had a fare down there that I took up in old Bond Street. I did the sweepin' out and startin' fires. Wan day wan of the clerks got fired because he couldn't serve a writ on another barrister chap who owed a bill that me boss was tryin' to collect. Nobody could git into his rooms, try every way they could. He had nigh broke the head o' wan o' the young fellers in the office who tried it the day before. He niver come out, but had his grub sent him. This had been goin' on for a month. All kinds o' games had been put up on him and he beat 'em all.

"'I'll do it,' I says, 'in a week's time or less.' The manager was goin' through the office and heard the laugh they give me. 'What's this?' he says, cross-like. 'Fin says he kin serve the writ,' the clerk says. 'I kin,' I says, startin' up, 'or I'll throw up me job.'

"'Give him the writ,' he says, 'and give him two days off. It kin do no harm for him to try.'

"Well, I found the street and went up the stairs and read the name on the door and heard somebody walkin' around, and knew he was in. Then I lay around on the other side o' the street to see what I could pick up in the way o' the habits o' the rat. I knew he couldn't starve for a week at a time, and that something must be goin' in, and maybe I could follow up and git me foot in the door before he could close it, but I soon found that wouldn't work. Pretty soon milk come and went up in a basket that he let down from his winder. As he leaned out I saw his head, and it was a worse carrot then me own. Then along come a man with a bag o' coal on his back and a bit o' card in his hand with the coal yard on it and the rat's name underneath, a-lookin' up at the house and scratchin' his head as to where he was goin'.

"I crossed over and says, 'Who are ye lookin' for?' And he hands me the card. 'I'm his man,' I says, 'and I been waitin' for ye—me master's sick and don't want no noise. I'll carry the bag up and dump it and bring ye the bag back and a shillin' for yer trouble. Wait here. Hold on,' I says; 'take me hat and let me have yours, for I don't git a good hat every day, and the bag's that dirty it'll spile it.'

"'Go on,' he says; 'I've carried it all the way from the yard and me back's broke.' Well, I pulled his hat over me eyes and started up the stairs wid the bag on me shoulder. When I got to the fust landin' I run me hands over the bag, gittin' 'em good and black, then I smeared me face, and up I went another flight.

"'Who's there?' he says when I knocked.

"'Coals,' I says.

"'Where from?' he says.

"I told him the name on the card. He opened the door an inch and I could see a chain between the crack.

"'Let me see yer face,' he says. I twisted it out from under the edge of the bag. 'All right,' he says, and he slipped back the chain and in I went, stoopin' down as if it weighed a ton.

"'Where'll I put it?' I says.

"'In the box,' he says, walkin' toward the grate. 'Have ye brought the bill?'

"'I have,' I says, still keepin' me head down. 'It's in me side pocket. Pull it out, please, me hand's that dirty'—and out come the writ!

"Ye ought to have seen his face when he read it. He made a jump for the door, but I got there fust and downstairs in a tumble, and fell in a heap at the foot with everything he could lay his hands on comin' after me—tongs, shovel and poker.

"I got a raise of five bob when I went back and ten bob besides from the boss.

"I ought to have stayed at the law, sor; I'd be a magistrate by now a-sittin' on a sheepskin instead of——

"Where'll I put this big canvas, sor—up agin the bow or laid flat? The last coat ain't dry yet," he muttered to himself, touching my picture with his finger in true paper-hanger style. "Oh, yes, I see—all ready, sor, ye kin step in. Same place we painted yesterday, sor?—up near the mill? All right, sor." And we pushed out into the stream.

These talks with Fin are like telephone messages from the great city hardly an hour away. They always take place in the open, while I am floating among pond lilies or drifting under widespreading trees, their drooping leaves dabbling in the silent current like children's fingers, or while I am sitting under skies as blue as any that bend above my beloved city by the sea. Often, too, when the delicious silence about me is broken only by the lapping of the water around my punt, the sharpening of a bit of charcoal or the splash of a fish. That his stories are out of key with my surroundings, often reminding me of things I have come miles over the sea to forget, does not rob them of their interest. Somehow it seems to heighten it.

There is no warning given. Suddenly, and apparently without anything that leads up to the subject in mind, this irrepressible Irishman breaks out, and before I am aware of the change, the glory of the morning and all that it holds for me of beauty fades out of the slide of my mental camera and another takes its place. Again I am following Fin's cab through the mazes of smoky, seething London, now waiting outside a concert-hall for some young blood, or shopping along Regent Street, or at full tilt to catch a Channel train at Charing Cross—each picture enriched by a running account of personal adventure that makes them doubly interesting.

"You wouldn't mind, sor," he begins, "if I tell ye of a party of three I took home from a grand ball—one of the toppy balls of the winter, in one o' them big halls on the Strand? Two o' them was dressed like the Royal family in satins that stuck out like a haystack and covered with diamonds that would hurt yer eyes to look at 'em——" And then in his inimitable dialect—impossible to reproduce by any combination of vowels at my command, and punctured every few minutes by ringing laughs that can be heard half a mile away—follows a description of how one of his fares, Ikey by name, the son of the stoutest of the women, by a sudden lurch of his cab—Ikey rode outside—while rounding into a side street, was landed in the mud.

"Oh, that was a great night, sor," he rattles on. "Ye ought to 'a' seen him when I picked him up. He looked as if they'd been a-swobbin' the cobbles wid him. 'Oh, me son! me son! it's kilt ye are!' she hollered out, clawin' him wid both hands, and up they hauled him all over them satin dresses! And where do ye think I took 'em, sor? To Hanover Square, or out by St. James Park? No, sor, not a bit of it! Down in an alley in Whitechapel, sor, that ye'd be afraid to walk through after sundown, and into a shop wid three balls over it. What do ye think o' that, sor?"

Or he launches forth into an account of how he helped to rescue a woman's child from the clutches of her brutal husband; and of the race out King's Road followed by the husband in a hansom, and of the watchful bobbie who, to relieve a threatened block in the street, held up the pursuing hansom at the critical moment, thus saving the escaping child, half-smothered in a blanket, tight locked in its mother's arms, and earning for Fin the biggest fare he ever got in his life.

"Think of it, sor! Fifteen bob for goin' a mile, she a-hollerin' all the time that she'd double the fare if I kep' ahead. But, Lord love ye, sor, she needn't 'a' worried; me old plug had run in the Derby wance, and for a short spurt like that she was game back to the stump of her tail."

. . . . . .

When the last morning of his enforced exile arrived and Fin, before I was half dressed, presented himself outside my bedroom door, an open letter in his hand, not a trace of the punt-poling Irishman was visible in his make-up!

He wore a glazed white tile, a yellow-brown coat with three capes, cut pen-wiper fashion, and a pair of corduroy trousers whose fullness concealed in part the ellipsis of his legs.

"Here's a letter from me boss, sor," he blurted out, holding it toward me. "He says I kin go to work in the mornin'. Ye don't mind, do ye, sor?"

"Of course I mind, Fin; I'll have trouble to fill your place. Are you sorry to leave?"

"Am I sorry, sor? No!—savin' yer presence, I'm glad. What's the good of the country, anyhow, sor, except to make picters in? Of course it's different wid you, sor, not knowin' the city, but for me—why, God rest yer soul, sor, I wouldn't give one cobble of the Strand no bigger'n me fist for the best farm in Surrey.

"Call me, sor, next time ye're passin' my rank—any time after twelve at night, and I'll show ye fun enough to last ye yer life."

Something dropped out of the landscape that day: something of its brilliancy, color and charm. The water seemed sluggish, the sky tones dull, the meadows flat and commonplace.

It must have been Fin's laugh!

THE RESULT OF A MORNING'S WORK WITH FIN

A QUIET BACKWATER

Little Stories of the Stage

By Charles Bloomingdale, Jr.

THE average newspaper man gets a bit of every sort and phase of life in a year's work. From a hanging to a wedding is the mere taking of a car from the prison to the church. A big case in court, a fire, a politician's views, a found-drowned case, a scene of the streets—it's all the same to the newspaper man. And sometimes he's sent out to get "interviews."

MR. HACKETT IN THE PRISONER OF ZENDA

The men and women of the stage furnish the best "talk" for a newspaper. They may be this, that, or the other thing, but they're never dull. There's a relationship between them and the newspaper man, for one touch of Bohemia makes the two kin.

So much for preamble. Here is a little series of anecdotes and reminiscences jotted down offhand. They stretch back through half a dozen years of newspaper life—"interview assignments" crowded in between hangings, weddings, fires, and the thousand little jottings known as "news."

Mansfield and the Blue Pencil

THE two hardest stage folk to get interviews from are Sarah Bernhardt and Richard Mansfield. Bernhardt received nineteen of my visiting-cards before I gained an audience; and Mansfield played me a subtle trick.

We'll tell the last first. Mansfield, bar none, is the least understood of our actors. All sorts of tales with Mansfield in the rôle of unenviable hero find their way into the public prints. As a matter of fact, not one in fifty of these tales is true. But the result of these misrepresentations has been that Mansfield refuses to see interviewers. Yet there's a way to accomplish most things, and Mansfield consented to a chat of three very delightful hours—from midnight to three in the morning. And when, at last, I picked up my hat, I said to him, in the goodness of my heart: "So that there may be no danger of my misquoting you in any particular I'm going to write out this interview in the morning and send it up to you with a blue pencil. What you don't like, use the prerogative of editing."

The next day a column and a half of interview went up to Richard Mansfield in a bulky envelope. There was also inclosed a new blue pencil. I told the boy to wait a half-hour, and in my note I asked that Mr. Mansfield return the interview at his earliest opportunity, as I meant to use it in the paper the next day. Back came the boy in three-quarters of an hour. He said there was no answer.

I waited for two hours, then sent the boy back with another note to Mansfield, asking for the return of the manuscript. The boy returned minus the manuscript. He had a note in his hand—the same one I had sent the actor. At the bottom of it Mansfield had scribbled:

Dear Old Man:
Used up the blue pencil. Please send another.
RICHARD MANSFIELD.

I never saw the manuscript again.

Sarah Bernhardt's Surrender

AFTER eighteen visiting-cards had been sent up to Bernhardt's room within eight days, I scribbled on the nineteenth: "Please see me this time—or send back by bearer the eighteen visiting-cards that have preceded this one."

Then I was ushered into Bernhardt's room.

She was playing with a rose during the ten minutes' talk, and appeared to be half bored and half amused. She lay back in a big armchair and never changed her position once. For a woman supposed to be all nerves she was all repose. We talked in hybrid—here and there a French word grafted on to English—or vice versa. The room was in semi-darkness.

The particular thing she said that impressed me most was when she was asked which, in her estimation, was the greater, tragedy or comedy. "Tragedy," came the answer in a flash. "A clown can make the rustic laugh, but it needs intellectual strength and heart knowledge to make him cry."

Francis Wilson Plays Chess Between the Acts

FRANCIS WILSON combated this assertion one evening when we were chatting in his dressing-room. Wilson prefers to see his newspaper friends behind the scenes. He's usually playing chess with a member of his company. During the time he is dressing or changing costume or waiting he has his mind on that chess-board. Sometimes it takes four or five evenings of snatch moments to complete a game—sometimes a game is over in an evening. Sometimes one player is in the room studying the board—sometimes both. I recollect that one night when Wilson was playing in The Toreador as I stood in the wings I heard him say on the stage to one of the characters: "I moved a pawn—it's your move when you get off." In that way the chess game was hurried to a conclusion; and when one of the contestants was on the stage and the other in the dressing-room, the man in front of the chess-board could be thinking out his play.

But to Wilson's answer to Bernhardt. "She's all wrong," he said, "for tragedy isn't greater than comedy. The every-day life of the average man is tragic, isn't it? Isn't it a grim, unrelenting tragedy this going through life? Then I hold that the fellow who plays comedy gets outside of himself to do it—he 'puts an antic disposition on'—and he must 'act' to do it. Playing tragedy is merely being one's self—and isn't acting. Tell that to Bernhardt next time you see her, with my compliments."

MRS. CARTER IS ANOTHER OF THE ALL-NERVE SCHOOL

William Crane's pet hobby is pinochle between scenes. He's a good talker in his dressing-room, and he can keep his mind on the interview and hold his cards at the same time. He's not a brilliant talker by any means, and impresses one more as a solid and successful business man than as an actor.

Anna Held, whether in her private parlor in the hotel or in her room behind the scenes, wants to talk dress to you from the second you come in until you leave. She is bon camarade at once, has no affectations, and treats you as one of the family. Before you get fairly seated she's rummaging around in closets to show you some new frocks she bought in Paris, and when you say "Very pretty" she mimics you with fine scorn and says: "'Very pretty—very pretty.' There doesn't live a man who could say anything else when he sees a handsome gown. A woman could talk for half an hour on this one ruffle. All you can say is 'Very pretty!'"

Then she bursts into laughter—and shows you another gown!

Faversham's Scheme to Get Rich

WILLIAM FAVERSHAM is merely a big, broad-shouldered, fine-looking Englishman, with a good wholesome laugh, and what may best be described as a "chummy" spirit. He is one of the matinée heroes, who, like Hackett, has no time nor inclination for the feminine worshipers at his shrine. Good sense seems to be his leading characteristic, and even though he has been made the hero of many a newspaper story and some silly girl the heroine, Faversham told me one day that he had the making of a fortune locked in one of his trunks. "What do you think it is?" he said. "Merely a big collection of newspaper clippings in which I figure as the most beautiful ass that ever was born. I have done this, that and the other thing according to these newspaper reports, and were I to sue for libel in any particular instance I could get tremendous damages. Why, my boy, I could give up acting to-day, devote all my time to sitting in court while my lawyers pleaded their cases for suits against the newspapers, and I should find it the most profitable employment that a man could take. I know I should be half a million dollars richer if I ever attempted the libel-suit game—for I'd win every suit."

May Irwin's Hobby is Baseball

MAY IRWIN off the stage and May Irwin on the stage are one and the same person—jolly as she can be, and anything that happens to be on the tip of her tongue is bound to come out. Baseball is her hobby, and she can give you the names, positions and batting order of any team in either League. She never misses a game of ball if she can help it, and always roots for the home team no matter in what city she happens to be. She's a kodak fiend, and on the occasion of her last visit to Philadelphia she showed me a collection of pictures she had taken the previous summer. Many of them were "wading pictures," as she termed them—and there was one lone feminine in each of the series. "Can you recognize the lady?" she asked, after eight or ten pictures had been passed over for inspection. And then off she went into peal after peal of laughter.

"Well, those terribly thin legs belong to Cissie—I mean Cecilia Loftus—Sir Henry Irving's leading woman."

I suggested to her that she allow me to enlarge the pictures so she could use them as three-sheet posters in England. "Wouldn't they make a hit, though? Fancy all England staring!" She paused for a second, and then said solemnly: "There's a world of difference between Cissie and me when we go in wading together."

Mrs. Kendal's Passion for Knitting

MRS. KENDAL has always prided herself on her domestic traits. She always has wanted the dear American public to know her as a model of motherly and wifely devotion.

Mrs. Kendal sent down word when my card went upstairs that she'd see me in five minutes, so I was prepared for a pose of some sort. One always is when one goes interviewing.

There sat the good lady in her room—knitting. She showed me to a chair. "You don't mind my doing this, do you?" she said apologetically. "You see, I knit all my husband's socks—he seems to like mine best, you know—and then, too, I love to do it. If more women of the stage would only look after their husbands' comfort——"

She was still knitting the socks when I said good-by!

Sir Henry Irving likes to interview you while you're interviewing him. He is simplicity itself in dress, speech and bearing.

The last time we met was in a railroad train on the way to Princeton, whither the distinguished actor was bound to deliver his lecture on Bacon.

"What's going to be the future of your country?" he asked. "Twenty years ago I went along what is now the River Drive in New York. I saw nothing but shanties and goats, and clothes hanging out to dry. Now I see magnificent palaces. It's like a page from the Arabian Nights, is this wonderful country."

You ask him a question and he'll ponder over it before answering. Then out pops a question, or a series of them to you:

"How old is Pierpont Morgan? I hear that most of your laboring men own their own homes. Is that true? What is the wage of the average newspaper man? How many years do you think will elapse before America absorbs England?"

He impresses you as a man who never would talk for talk's sake—one who never poses—one to whom life is a serious problem.

Yet there's a twinkle in his restless eyes, and a smile perpetually hovers around his serious mouth.

Reginald de Koven Can't Sit Still

REGINALD DE KOVEN couldn't sit still for two minutes if his life depended on it—that is, when he's being interviewed. Up and down the room he walks, lighting cigarettes and throwing them away.

"YOU DON'T MIND MY DOING THIS, DO YOU?"

"TELL THAT TO BERNHARDT, WITH MY COMPLIMENTS"

NETHERSOLE SEEMS TO EXUDE LANGUOR

He wants everything he says put down in long hand and read to him as he goes along in his talk. Then, too, he has a queer trick of saying: "Now suppose you ask me thus and so, and I will answer so and so."

He continually suggests to you the questions he wishes you to put to him, and continues to walk up and down the room and consume great quantities of cigarettes.

E. S. Willard likes to talk of his work. He, like Sothern, is very earnest, but much more aggressive. His face is that of the student and thinker. I asked him once which of his rôles he best liked. He laughed: "Ask a mother which of her children is her favorite. Her answer invariably will be, 'The last.' So with the actor. His characters are his brain children, and his favorite is the one that has been last born to him. He likes all of his rôles, but he loves the last. It is the Joseph of his brain."

Lillian Russell Can't Take a Joke

LILLIAN RUSSELL in a black silk gown in her room at the hotel was much more beautiful than Lillian Russell bepainted and bepowdered on the stage.

In the course of the chat I asked: "What would you rather be if you were not what you are?" She thought for half a minute: "I think I'd like to be a Dutch wife, knitting coarse socks and surrounded by about fifteen of my youngsters."

The printed interview appeared next day, and the newspaper artist drew the radiant Lillian in a Dutch gown, complacently rocking in a chair, her chubby hands busy with her knitting, and about a hundred Dutch youngsters sprawling on the floor around her.

That day I met Miss Russell on the street. She cut me dead and has never spoken to me since.

John Hare is very quiet and diffident in his dressing-room — modest, unassuming and very careful in his choice of words. He does not, as do the majority of foreigners, say pleasant things of America merely because he thinks pretty phrases will strike pleasingly on our ears. He is bluntly honest, as witness his interviews on American stars.

"You have too many stars in America," he said. "In the two or three years that elapsed between my visits a full score of male stars sprang into the theatric firmament. They do not — with very rare exceptions — display star ability. On our side of the water they would be leading men — some of them merely fair at that. Over here one of your young men plays for three or four seasons and is then made a leading man. Two years of leading — and lo, the following season he's a star! Certainly I can believe that America is a very rapid country." There is a fine touch of irony in his voice, and he taps his long, slender fingers together as he leans back in his chair.

"Your women? A hundred per cent. cleverer players than your men. They have the temperament for actresses, have the American women — and acting comes easy to them."

Mr. Hawtrey's Sameness

A CERTAIN player told me one day that Charles K. Hawtrey was no actor. "Did you ever meet him off the stage?" he asked me. "Yes? And did you ever see him acting? Yes? Well, isn't he the same chap off the stage as he is on — courteous, polished, educated, with manners above reproach, with a voice superbly modulated? In other words, a gentleman to his finger-tips? Well, that's exactly how he is on the stage. He doesn't change a particle. He merely goes before the footlights — possibly changes his clothes, but is Charles K. Hawtrey first, last and all the time."

Though disagreeing thoroughly with my friend the actor as regards Mr. Hawtrey's art, Mr. Hawtrey the actor is much the same man as Mr. Hawtrey in his room. All the good which my friend said of Hawtrey is true. He is the polished gentleman at every turn, but he is also a very clever fellow.

"A CLOWN CAN MAKE THE RUSTIC LAUGH"

"GIVE UP ACTING?"

While taking his art seriously, Mr. Hawtrey doesn't think very highly of it. "I think that acting," he said, "is least among the arts, because it can never stand alone. Painting, literature, music — all those need creative faculties, but the actor can give you — well, here's the way I figure it: the actor appears in a play. Now, any credit that he may get, at least half of it, is due the playwright, for the playwright creates the character. Therefore the actor gets half, but he cannot get all that half unless he should play the whole play by himself — characters, scenery and everything. But there are ten or twelve characters, we'll say, and each of these feeds and rounds out his interpretation. Therefore when it is all said and done the actor doesn't even get half. The painter leaves his canvass to posterity, the musician his opera, the sculptor his statue; the actor leaves but a memory and nothing else."

When Jefferson Will Make His Farewell

JOE JEFFERSON is a quizzical, kindly old gentleman off the stage, and, like Mansfield, doesn't wish to be misquoted. You must promise to bring the written interview to him. Then you read it to him twice. The first time he listens. The second time he suggests. I remember on one occasion spending fifteen minutes with him on one sentence, because it wasn't "symmetrical." "It doesn't hit the ear right," he explained. "There isn't music in it — and every sentence should have a certain note and a certain cadence."

I asked him when he would give up acting. "When they carry me out feet first," he answered. "I can't give it up. I make my seasons short nowadays — play only about ten weeks — two and one-half months. I do that merely to keep on the stage. A good part of the winter I stay in Florida and fish. That's my work. Acting is my recreation — and I must have a little of it every year, just as a fellow has his vacation. Once in a while I paint, too. But all fishing and painting and no acting would make me a very dull old boy indeed. So back I rush to the stage, and find more fun in it than my audiences do."

E. H. Sothern seldom smiles when you're chatting with him. He takes life seriously, takes his profession seriously. He is cultured, courteous, repressed, talks in a low tone, and impresses one as a man of quiet reserve who is generally master of the situation. "All striving," he said one evening — "that is, all honest striving — tends but one way — forward. The actor's calling is much the same as any other calling that has intellectual effort as its fundamental — you must learn more and do more each successive year or you are not worthy of your craft."

Olga Nethersole seems to exude languor — as if she hadn't quite finished her sleep, or else was lacking in physical strength. Her face is pale and listless. "What little strength I have," she said with a smile one evening after the performance, "is a nervous strength. This week I shall have played seven different rôles, and I prefer that to a whole week devoted to one character only. That tires me more than anything else — it's seven times more wearing on me than playing seven different rôles."

Melba Never Puts on Grand Opera Airs

MELBA never puts on grand opera airs, although she sings them. The day I saw her at her hotel she wore a dowdy brown gown, wore no ornament of any kind, and looked poor and ill-taken-care-of. Far from attempting to pose she seemed to be going to the other extreme, and to be thoroughly indifferent to the "power of the press."

"You can stay only five minutes," she said. "I never see any one on the day I'm to sing, and I've made to-day an exception. I have my maid lock the door, and I either go to bed or lie on the couch. Then I make signs to her — don't use my voice a particle if I can help it — give it a complete and absolute rest. So you ask the questions, and I'll merely say 'Yes' or 'No' to them."

Her method is somewhat like Nat Goodwin's. Goodwin nearly always has a headache — or says he has, which is much the same thing.

You catch him in his dressing-room and he shakes hands and motions you to sit on his trunk. Then his unvarying method is: "I've a beast of a headache, old man. You shove anything at all into print that won't hurt me, and I'll subscribe to it. You make up any old interview that you want — only for Heaven's sake don't ask me questions. I couldn't think to-night if my precious neck hung in the balance. Whatever you say is all right, and we'll let it go at that. Don't go — just sit a while and tell me the news. I'm in a listening mood to-night."

James Hackett on the Matinée Girl

THE average matinée hero is usually a namby-pamby sort of an individual. But not so James K. Hackett. He impresses you as a strong, sturdy chap, chock-full of good sense, and the last man in the world to pay heed to a romantic letter from a matinée girl. He has aggressiveness and individuality to a marked degree, and his self-reliance has found an outlet in the past two years in the taking upon himself the managing of his own enterprises. Hackett is now known as an actor-manager, and his dual duties keep him busy.

He said this one evening of the matinée girl: "She's a sweet, irresponsible thing with book knowledge and no world experience. She's in the chrysalis state — and through it we all go, men and women alike. It lasts such a little while, like all the sweet things of life, and when it's gone there's nothing to fill its place. The matinée girl and the fellow of twenty-one alike have the world at their feet."

SIR HENRY IRVING LIKES TO INTERVIEW YOU

Harry Kellar, the magician, is a bundle of nerves — not only when being interviewed, but at all times. Quick, wiry, strong as a bull, and so mentally constituted that he reads everything and at all times. His hobby is palmistry — and he'd rather talk that than magic.

"Never saw such a timid hand in my life as Mansfield's," he said last September. "I can easily believe what he told me: that he gets stage fright every night of his life. But Bernhardt — I don't believe there's a more self-reliant hand in the world than hers. When I read her hand and told her of her self-reliance she laughed and said: 'This is the age of the self-reliant women. Our grandmothers were grandmothers before their time because they sat meekly down and allowed themselves to grow old.'"

Mrs. Carter is another of the all-nerve school. She can't sit still when being interviewed. She thinks quickly and speaks quickly, and has rather positive notions on the problem plays. "The theatre," she said, "is not meant for children, neither is the problem play. For children, the nursery; for grown folks, the theatre. And the play that teaches that the wages of sin is death can never be pretty in the unfolding of plot — but it is positive, unyielding, and terror-striking in its ending and its moral. And that's the educational force of the drama."

Josef Hoffman Starves at Dinner

JOSEF HOFFMAN, the pianist, is the most democratic chap in the public eye. He carries a dollar watch with a cracked crystal and hates course dinners.

One evening about half-past five he sat and chatted in the corridor of the hotel. He had a dinner engagement and he did not relish the prospect.

"I hate course dinners," he said. "Down you sit in front of the oysters, toy with one, get it on your fork, eat it. Then the woman to your right asks your views of Italian music. You start in to chat, and before you know it some waiter has whisked your oysters away, and put a plate of soup in front of you. One mouthful of that, and the lady to your left speaks of the time she was in Berlin two years ago. Has there been much change in the city in two years? You're interested, and begin to talk Berlin to her. Just as you're growing enthusiastic along comes the waiter, takes your soup and deposits the fish. At the same time your vis-à-vis queries to you concerning Strauss — what is Strauss' standing in Vienna? You try to tell her — the conversation veers to waltz music against march music — and Sousa crops into the talk — and away goes your fish untasted.

JULIA MARLOWE'S WONDERFUL SMILE

"And so it goes through the entire dinner — and I never get a thing to eat. Give me a little German restaurant, a good fat steak and half an hour; then I'll come away feeling that the course dinner is a delusion and a snare, made for

THE SHOW-DOWN

By Henry K. Webster

IN WHICH THE DUDDLESTON STONE COMPANY SHOWS THE X. Y. Z. SOME NEW TRICKS IN ROUGH-AND-READY RAILROADING

BUFFALO, N. Y., 5-3-'03.

A. B. Smith, M'n'g'r
The Duddleston Stone Company.

Sir: If I wasn't doing anything but make excuses I would take the trouble to make better ones than the one you've been giving me for a month. At least, I would get up a new one once in a while. Yesterday I wired the General Manager of the X. Y. Z. to know why he did not furnish you with cars to carry my stone. I inclose copy of his reply. Now that I have got you pinned, please understand that unless you get the stone here p. d. q. the contract is canceled, and I'll have damages out of you besides.

Enc. Yours, etc., T. T. COLLIER.

The enclosure follows.

TELEGRAM.

T. T. Collier, Buffalo: Duddleston has had all cars he can use for last month. Reported five times for delaying cars sent to him. What he needs is the stone.

VAN HORN.

It was easy to see from that letter that Collier was mad, and with reason. A man who, while he has been doing his best, has had to stand the kind of abuse they heap upon a dilatory contractor for a public building, a patient man whose patience has been taxed to the breaking point, may be expected to be indignant when he hears that those who have his success in their hands have been sitting back and lying to him. But if you could have looked from the letter on Smith's desk to the expression on Smith's face you would have seen that, if possible, Smith was madder than Collier. For it was not Smith but Van Horn who had lied and he had done it with a coolness, an attention to detail—"Reported five times," etc.—that made Smith feel as though he must do something or burst. What he did was what he had done before in such circumstances: he telephoned out to the quarries for Edwards, the superintendent.

When Edwards came in, half an hour later that morning, he took the situation more coolly. "It's like Van Horn to make a slick and clean job of it like that," he said. Then he lighted his pipe and sat down to think it over.

"They've found out," said Smith, "the X. Y. Z. people, I mean, that we're going to build that belt line and get out from under their thumb. I knew they'd try one of two things when they found out. They might begin to be decent to us and try to square themselves, or they might sail in to do us all the damage they could and perhaps bust us up before we could get our belt line running. Well, it's plain enough now what they mean to do. They've made a good start. It won't break us to be queered with Collier, but it'll hurt. We'll have to stand this thing for six months, anyway."

"Hadn't we better have a show-down?" Edwards asked. "We've been telling Collier the truth, or mighty near to it. They haven't given us more than five cars on any day for a month now, and sometimes only two. When we need fifteen, two don't count for much. Let's get him to come out and look the place over. He can see for himself that we've got the stone, and we can prove we haven't had any cars to speak of by the carbons of our daily car orders. He can see the thing for a month back."

Smith picked up a telegraph blank and wrote: "Van Horn lied to you. Come and see for yourself." "That ought to do," he said, handing it to Edwards.

Collier read that telegram when it came with something like satisfaction. He was going to find out now where the trouble lay; he was going to prove that somebody was an unequivocal liar, and that, to a man in his state of mind, was a pleasant prospect. To tie the knot perfectly tight, however, to put the issue utterly beyond evasion, he telegraphed to Van Horn, word for word, this message just in from Smith, and in the middle of the afternoon he got his reply: "That's all I want. Go and see for yourself." When that message came in Mr. Collier reserved a berth on the night train and wired Smith that he would be out at the quarry next morning.

When Smith got that he telephoned it to Edwards at the quarry and both of them settled down after the day's excitement with a good deal of satisfaction at the outcome. There was really a good deal more than Collier's contract at stake. He was only one of many contractors all about the country who had been hungry and clamorous for stone since the X. Y. Z. had begun denying the company cars, and both the manager and the superintendent had the feeling that this Collier matter was a test case. And now that he was coming in person they were sure that they could convince him that they were not at fault.

They would have been a little less sure about it if they had known of the telegram he had sent to Van Horn that afternoon, and could have read the manager's reply: "That's all I want. Go and see for yourself." They knew Van Horn pretty well, and liked him, too, for even when he played them a low trick he did it in an impersonal way which disarmed resentment. But they knew he was "out for results" and that the means he took to get them were often devious, and they knew that however he might bluff upon occasions, he was too good a player to do so in a situation like this when his hand was sure to be called.

A little before quitting-time that afternoon Edwards, who had been going hither and thither among the men with a terse order here, a suggestion there, occasionally lending his own great muscles to a heavy bit of lifting, climbed to the top of a great mass of rocks and looked over the scene. A seafaring man might have seen in the mighty masts and booms of the score of derricks, and the tangle of guys and ropes, a suggestion of ships lying in a busy harbor; a lad fresh from his books might have fancied that those huge blocks of gray stone, irregularly piled, as they lay in the fading light, were some Cyclopean ruin; but to Edwards it looked like nothing but a quarry.

He nodded his head once or twice in satisfaction. When Collier should stand here to-morrow morning and see what he saw—the newly cut faces in the sides of the quarry, the great piles of stone ready and waiting, the long ranks of men lifting and dropping their heavy iron bars in unbroken rhythm—well, if Collier's eyes were open he would know whose fault it was that he didn't get the stone. But presently he frowned and struck his hands together impatiently. That might do very well as an object-lesson for Collier, but from their own point of view it wasn't so satisfactory. How long was the X. Y. Z. going to keep this up, anyway? If they didn't get cars pretty soon, who would care whose fault it was?

The Duddleston Stone Company owned, had owned, rather, a little switching locomotive which pushed the empties on the single track alongside the biggest derrick which stood in the middle of the quarry, and hauled them out again when they were loaded, but a week before its air-brakes had failed to work at an inopportune moment, and it had run off the stub end of a track, fallen about three feet, and converted itself in less than a second from an inferior little switching locomotive into a cloud of steam and a heap of scrap. The two men had jumped in time to save themselves, and as the engine was near the end of its career, anyway, its loss was not greatly mourned. So long as Edwards did not get more than five cars a day he did not need an engine, for the boom of his big derrick was long enough to load that many without moving them. But in the hope of getting more cars than that, until the new engine they had ordered should arrive, Smith chartered one by the day from the X. Y. Z.

While Edwards stood on his pinnacle looking at the scene below him he saw this little engine hunt the two cars the X. Y. Z. had sent them that day up the track to the place where they were to be loaded. Then he saw an under foreman say something to the engineer, whereupon the engine with a long-drawn screech clattered off over the switches and on to the main track, where it presently disappeared.

Edwards in some surprise clambered down and sought the foreman.

"What did you tell them to do with that engine?" he asked.

"The superintendent telephoned out to them to go out to Sandhurst. There's some trouble on the road out there. It's quitting-time and we don't need an engine for those two measly flats, so I told them to go ahead."

Edwards nodded. It was quite true that they had no further use for a locomotive that day, but for all that he stood for a minute looking uneasily down the track.

"There wasn't anything you wanted them for this evening, was there?" asked the foreman. The big siren whistle on the power-house just then began the song which meant supper and a good night's sleep to the four hundred and more workers in the quarry, and both men waited for the blast to die away.

"No," said Edwards. "No, I guess not."

He went to the office and changed his coat, and then started off for his home near by, but he came back in a minute or two and hunted up the night watchman. "If anything out of the ordinary happens to-night come over and rout me out," he said to him.

He was really puzzled to find an explanation for his apprehensiveness. He could think of no conceivable use to which he could put that engine between now and morning, and they would probably send it back by then. He told his wife about it after supper, and between them they could see nothing to worry about. "I suppose," he said at last, "that I'm sort of skittish because Collier's going to be here in the morning. But Collier isn't coming from Buffalo to see any little one-horse X. Y. Z. locomotive."

He always went to bed early and at eleven o'clock his wife had difficulty in getting him wide enough awake to understand that somebody was ringing the doorbell. He shuffled sleepily downstairs and opened the door, but he got himself together with a jerk when he recognized the night watchman.

"What's wrong?" he asked sharply.

"Nothing's wrong," said the man slowly. "I don't know as I ought to have waked you up. I wouldn't have done it if you hadn't told me——"

"Well! Well!" demanded Edwards. "Let's have it. Is the mill afire?"

"No, nothing's wrong, I tell you," stammered the watchman. "Only they're shoving a whole train of cars up the stub-end track beside the main derrick."

"How many?"

"I didn't wait to count 'em," the man expostulated. "I should say about a quarter of a mile of 'em."

Edwards said he would be at the quarry in a few minutes himself, shut the door after the watchman, and then stood there in the drafty hall thinking the situation out, until his wife called to him. He answered, as his visitor had, that nothing was wrong; then he went back to his bedroom and slowly began putting on his clothes, replying to his wife's questions, when he replied at all, so absently that she soon gave up trying to get anything out of him.

But by the time he got to the quarry he had decided what he must do next, though he was still a long way from the final solution of the problem. "Come in here," he called to the watchman as he unlocked the power-house door, "come in and help me get up steam." That was the first thing to do and they did it as expeditiously as possible, though when the watchman asked him what he meant to do with it he said he didn't know.

He left the watchman to stoke the fires and went into his office, where he sat down to think out the next step. He was a man of no very quick perceptions, and a little meditation was always necessary to him after any new matter had been brought to his attention. It was this fact which led Van Horn to underestimate him. When the watchman first told him they had shunted a long string of empties up the quarry track it struck him merely as a rather grim bit of luck that all those cars should be lying empty on the track when Collier came "to see for himself" in the morning. He was half dressed before he recalled the loss of his locomotive, and he had nearly reached the quarry when it came over him that there was no luck about it, but, instead, some of Van Horn's very good management. Van Horn must know, then, that Collier was coming.

Well, it was easy to make sure of that, Edwards thought, and now in his office he went to the telephone and called up the X. Y. Z. yardmaster.

"You people took away my locomotive this afternoon," he said, "and to-night you've sent me a string of thirty-three cars to load. I can load but five cars from the derrick without an engine, and I'll have to ask you to send me one."

"I'm sorry I can't do it, Mr. Edwards," said the yardmaster with unwonted politeness. "I can possibly spare an engine to-night. And I don't believe we can give you one to-morrow, either, but we will, if possible."

They weren't afraid to show-down all their cards, anyway. Edwards turned back to the 'phone after a minute and called up Smith. Edwards felt competent to run the quarry without asking help from anybody, but when it came to playing a game like this with Van Horn he wanted Smith at his elbow. So when the exchange said that double twenty-two wouldn't answer, he said, "Ring till you get 'em. It's a life and death matter." And at last he got Smith, half-asleep at first, but soon wide-awake enough for anybody. "Come right out to the quarry," he said. "No, nothing's afire, but the X. Y. Z. have got us by the short hairs, I guess, in this Collier deal. They've just given us thirty-three cars and no locomotive."

"All right," said Smith, "I'll come." And Edwards sat down to do some more thinking.

It was an axiom with him that at this quarry you could load only five cars without the help of a switch engine. He had tried all he knew to get an engine and was at the end of his rope. Perhaps Smith could get one. If he couldn't he would have to arrange this case with the view to presenting it to Collier as favorably as possible.

But now as Edwards sat there it occurred to him to doubt his axiom. Was it possible, by any ingenious piece of juggling, with no engine at all, with only the power his big loading derrick could supply, to load that string of thirty-three cars. The problem was like that on the puzzle page of a Sunday newspaper.

He rested his elbows on his desk and ran his hands through his thick hair. But there seemed to be no chance for any juggling; the conditions were too simple. There was half a mile of curving single track between his derrick and the nearest switch, down grade all the way except for a small level stretch about the derrick. Twenty-five yards beyond the derrick the track ended, and just beyond lay a monument of scrap-iron, the earthly remains of his old engine. He could load the first five cars under the derrick, let off the brakes and the whole train would roll down the grade, the five loaded cars pushing the twenty-eight empties merrily along in front of them. But by the time they all got down to the switch those twenty-eight empties would be as far beyond his reach, without an engine to haul them back, as though they were in Chicago. He had a car-puller attached to his derrick, it was true, but he had no half-mile of cable, and even if he could have pieced such a thing together, the curve, amounting to nearly ninety degrees, would make it useless.

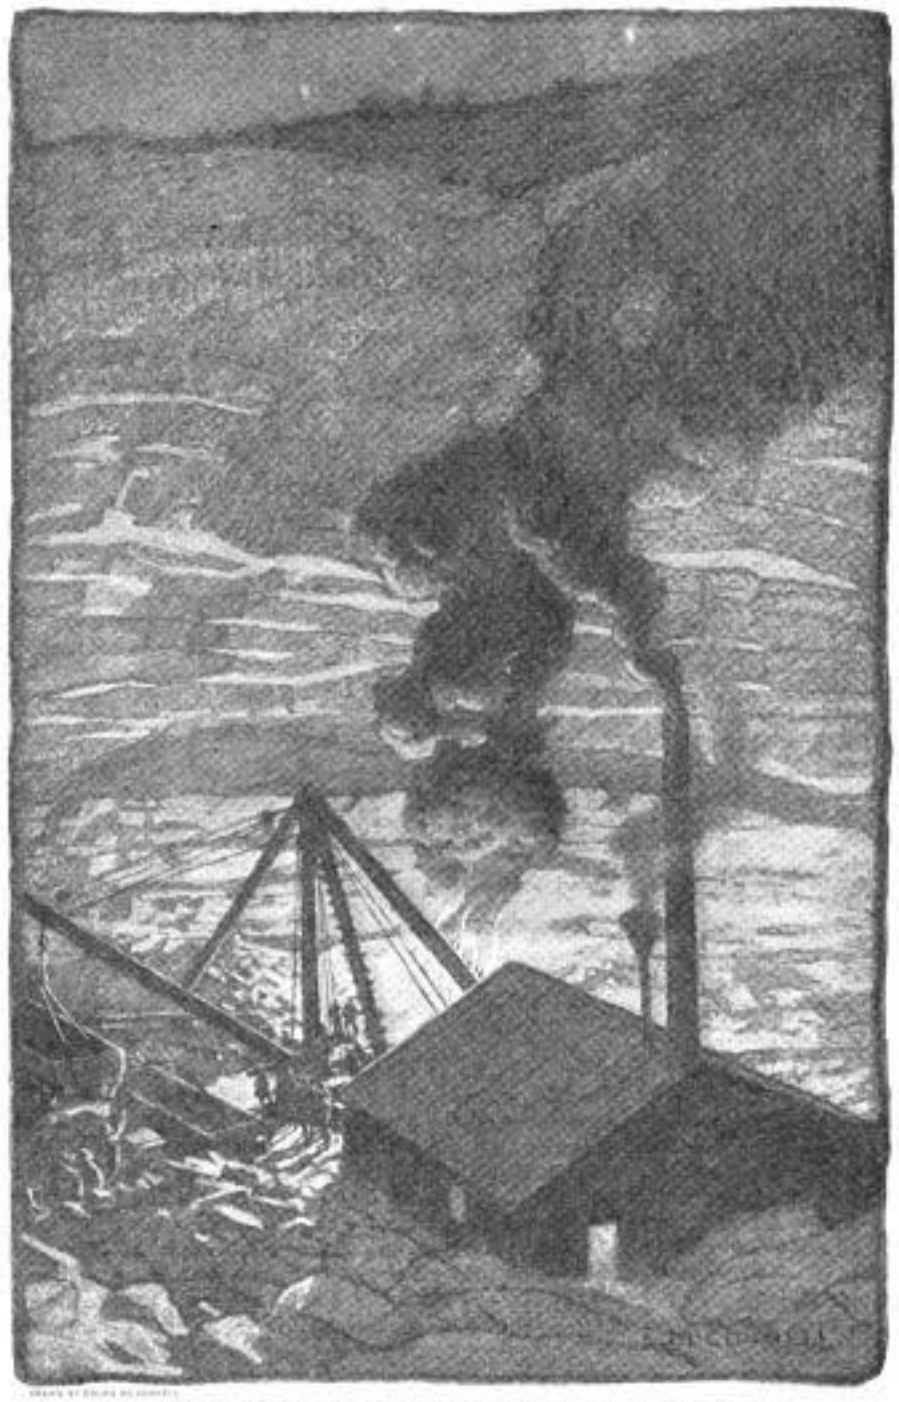
No, that wouldn't work. If only his track extended three hundred yards farther up the quarry! Then he could work the train up past the derrick, load the last cars first, and let them slip down the grade as they were loaded to make way under the derrick for the succeeding empties. But the track didn't extend three hundred yards farther and there was no use—— And then Edwards banged his hands down on the desk, sprang up and flung open the door.

The watchman was on the way over to speak to him and he sung out as he saw him open the door: "There's steam enough, I guess, Mr. Edwards."

"Good," said Edwards. "Go back and blow the old siren. Blow her three or four times to beat the band."

The siren sounded horribly loud as she shrieked out in that quiet night, and before the third blast and its attendant echoes from the faces of the hills had died away the workmen who lived nearest by were stumbling half-dressed out of their little houses and making for the quarry on the run. They were disposed to growl a little at being routed out of bed in the middle of the night for anything less momentous than a fire, but Edwards collected the first two dozen arrivals about the main derrick and made them a little speech.

"Now, in the first place," he said, "this is a case of double pay, and, in the next place, if we get this job done on time we'll knock off at noon Saturday for the day. Is Sykes here? All right, Sykes, get a couple of men to stoke for you and start the engine. You've got steam enough."



During Smith's long, cold ride on the last trolley car to the quarry he went through a variety of moods and came to a variety of contradictory conclusions. That was like him. He was quick; he could reach six conclusions while Edwards was pegging along toward one, and if he had some one with him to point out the right one he did very well, indeed, but he needed the ballast his subordinate supplied him with—and he knew it.

He had seen through the trick instantly, and his first feeling was of quiet contempt for such child's play. It would be easy enough to prove to Collier when those cars had come in. But as he thought further the case didn't seem so easy. Collier was disposed to take it for granted that they had lied and Van Horn had told the truth, and the proofs, which were in the hands of the railroad people, might be hard to get. And then the first thing he would see would be that string of empty cars. The prospect wasn't a pleasant one. Smith could just see the incredulous smile on Collier's face, a smile which his most elaborate explanations would fail to get behind.

And then there were a lot more besides Collier. Suppose the X. Y. Z. shouldn't give them that locomotive for two or three days! Those cars would lie there delayed on their private track, and that sort of thing was a matter of record. When Hibbard began to kick, as he would in a week or two, there would be nothing they could tell him.

Well, there was nothing they could do about it. Smith didn't see what was the use in his coming out here to the quarry in the middle of the night, anyway.

That was his mood as he climbed off the car, walked across the deserted stretch over to the quarry, and began stumbling along the rough path to the office. If Edwards hadn't told him that nothing was afire he would have run, for the sky was lighted up with a great blaze in the quarry, and the shouts of many men, among them Edwards', told him that something unusual was going on.

—STARED IN CLEAR WONDER AT THE SCENE BELOW HIM

Once at the crest of the hill he stopped short and stared in clear wonder at the scene below him. Beyond the big derrick a great heap of blazing pine slabs filled the wide stone pit with light, except where the derricks, the piles of stone and the moving figures of the men cast a tangle of waving shadows. But Smith wasn't looking at the lights or the shadows. The men were working like beavers in the firelight, the big derrick was squealing under a heavy load which rode slowly into the air and hung there bodily between Smith's eyes and the bonfire, rocking a little from side to side like a ship riding at anchor in an easy swell. It was on that load that Smith's incredulous gaze was riveted. It looked for all the world like a freight car, and now as the derrick mast turned in its socket and the thing moved out of its own shadow, there was no doubt about it. It was a freight car, a big gondola! As they lowered it to the ground more or less gently, Smith counted three more like it standing in ridiculously irregular positions about the quarry.

They were lifting those cars off the track and stacking them in heaps about the yard as if they had been so many hen-coops. Even while Smith stood looking they picked up another one. Two men would crawl under a car lengthwise, each dragging a cable. Then they would make fast the four ends to the big hook hanging at the end of the boom, and then—"Up with her, boys!" in hardly more time than I am taking to tell about it. When they had taken all the derrick could reach they hooked the car-puller cable to the nearest car of the string and hauled up five more.

At last Smith clambered down and found Edwards. "What the devil are you trying to do?" he demanded. "Getting up an imitation of a head-on collision?"

"It does look a little like that," said Edwards. "They have to stand around just as they happen to light. No, I'm just getting them out of the way so I can load the last five first. Then I'll put these back and load them as they come."

Smith's amazement wore off slowly, but at last he began to laugh.

"What's it about?" Edwards asked.

"I'd give fifty dollars to have Van Horn see this," said the manager.

"If he was here," said Edwards more slowly, "I'd give him a ride in one of his own cars like nothing he's ever had before."

They had used up all the space around the main derrick by now, so they passed them along from one to another back into the quarry, and it took a little longer. But at last Edwards, after a glance at the string up the track shouted, "Hold on! Here's the last five. Load 'em up."

They loaded them accordingly, and then another five which they put back on the rails for the purpose.

"Well," said Edwards at last, "Van Horn only had a four flush, after all."

Smith nodded appreciatively. "I guess this cinches Mr. Collier," he said.

Giant Transplanting

UNTIL recently the man who laid out parks about a new house planted for posterity. Now a New York man has developed an apparatus by which a giant tree that has been growing one or two hundred years may be deftly extracted, carried to the desired point and replanted without subjecting it to the slightest injury.

A great trucklike contrivance is hauled to the tree, the roots of which have been partly laid bare by digging. The rear wheels and reach of the vehicle are detached and the long tongue is raised upright. A saddle which fits over huge wheels is forced against the lower part of the tree, and the pole of the truck is then fastened securely to the trunk of the tree. Chains are then so attached to the roots that the lowering of the tongue by means of a windlass or other power provides a giant lever and fulcrum, and the tree is gradually pried out of the ground.

When it reaches a horizontal position the rear wheels of the big contrivance are brought into place, and without further manipulation the tree is ready for transportation.

At the place of replanting it is readily raised upright by simple operations of the same device, and deposited in the new soil. The apparatus is on such a huge scale that the transplanting of the biggest trees growing on the Atlantic Coast may be effected without the necessity of cutting or breaking a limb.

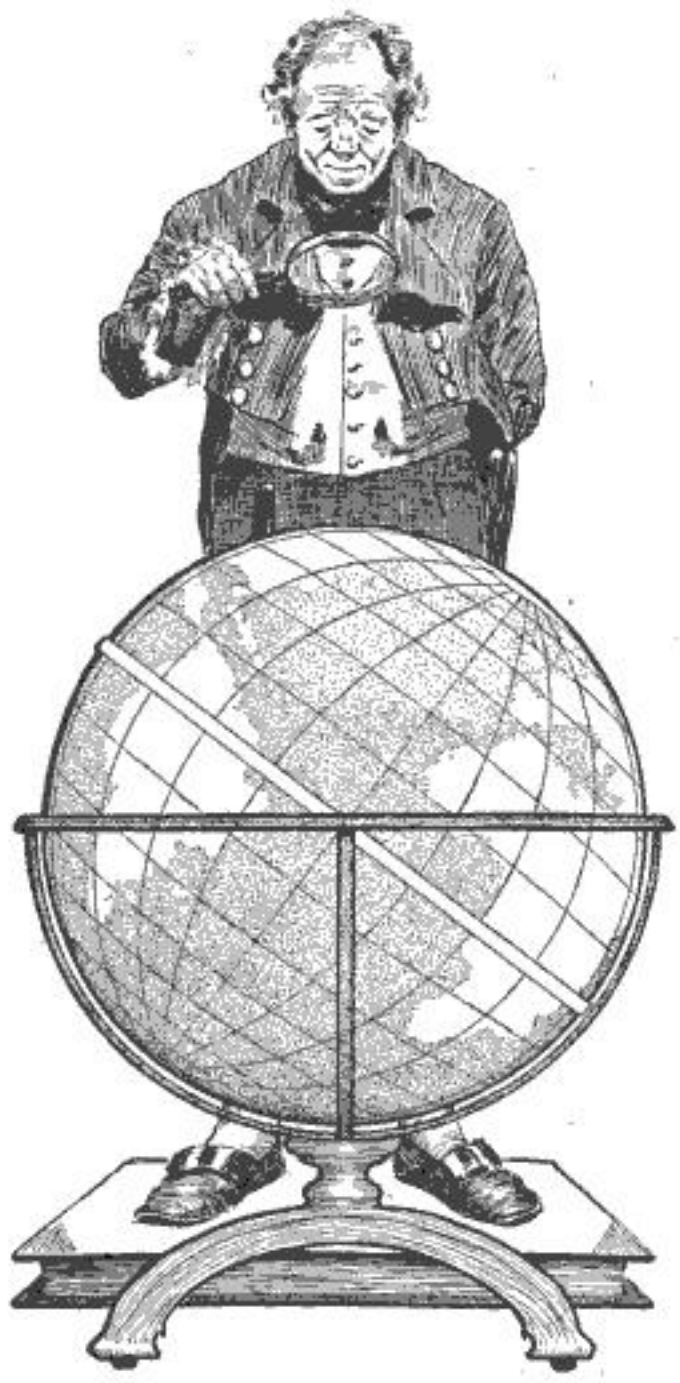
The Balance-Sheet of the Session



By William Allen White

A SURVEY OF THINGS DONE AND LEFT UNDONE BY THE MOST IMPORTANT PEACE CONGRESS THE COUNTRY HAS YET KNOWN

AMERICANS are little given to parades. Clanking swords and rooster feathers have no place in American life. We hate kings, not because they are kings and have power, but because kings are shams, and we hate shams and make-believe. The power of the Government — particularly of the National Government — is not epitomized nor staged for the simple-minded. There is only one regular annual parade, and that occurs at the close of each session of Congress. A few hours before Congress is scheduled to adjourn the President and his Cabinet leave the White House in carriages for the Capitol. They arrive at the north wing of the building, and scoot through the narrow basement doors, and then a black-garbed, set-faced, high-hatted, frock-coated group, arranged hit-or-miss, with the President in front, and perhaps a Secretary, perhaps a Cabinet member, perhaps a supernumerary, beside him, hurries down the caverns of the basement to the elevator that lifts one nearest to the President's room back of the Senate Chamber. The spectacle is a dignified compromise between a ferryboat rush and the arrival of a number of belated pall-bearers. Yet this simple show is the only Government fête that must be celebrated every year. And this occasion, when the President sits in his room near the Senate, ready to sign such bills as may be passed at the last moment, is virtually the only time in the year when the President appears in public solely and entirely as a President; as the head official, and not in some sense the political, social or personal representative of a great people. On the fourth of March this year President Roosevelt, who has a passably good poker face for public ceremonies, could not entirely conceal his satisfaction at the culmination of things in the Congress.

For though much was left undone which should have been done, and that is unfortunate, nothing was done which should not have been done, and that is the surest test of a good Congress or a bad one. And for the President there was this personal satisfaction: it was his Congress. Though it refused to do three important things which he asked it to do, and which he hoped it would do: ratify the Canal and Cuban treaties and enact the Philippine tariff law, it did nothing which was known of men as offensive or even antagonistic to the President. There was no important veto during the whole life of the Fifty-seventh Congress. And this was not because Roosevelt yielded any vital point to Congress, but because on many important matters Congress yielded to the President. The tactlessness of Roosevelt — a diplomatic term for his absolute truthfulness — which has been supposed to offend statesmen during his Presidential incumbency, has been more apparent than real. For no other President of the United States, not even McKinley with all his adroitness, has got more from Congress of what it was at first determined not to give than has President Roosevelt. He may have a breeziness that contrasts with the hushed, formal-garden air of conventional leadership, but so long as the buzz-saw is going it makes little difference whether the sawdust lies in a conical pile or fills the adjacent atmosphere. Roosevelt, while he is sawing wood, likes to keep his sawdust in the air. It is merely a matter of taste. His wood-pile is as large as any one's, and that is the real thing.

Congress this year ended in a double-headed deadlock in the Senate and an angry flash of vicious filibustering, complicated with hissing for the Speaker, in the House. It was all unpleasant. And because the final impression one gets of Congress this year is a sense of bickering and spite work, the taxpayers who foot the bills may be prone to think that the whole short session of Congress has been frittered away in child's play. The truth is that the short session of Congress, from the first of December to the fourth of March, has been one of the busiest and most efficient sessions of Congress ever held. Over a thousand private bills have been passed — mostly private pension bills — and about one hundred and fifteen general acts have become laws. Of course, most of these general acts have been appropriation bills of one sort and another. But some big things have been done. It is possible that no other single session of Congress, and certainly no short session, has made so many laws that may change the current and tendency of American affairs as the short session of the Congress last past. If the session had closed with the enactment of nothing more important than the bill creating the Department of Commerce it would have done a big work. That act and the department which it created are too important to be covered incidentally to another subject, and must be treated separately, but it must be said in passing that no single legislative act since the Missouri Compromise will affect American business, and hence American life, as this act must affect them, as it grows and becomes a part of this Government. Thousands of interests that have known no

Federal regulation and control will be welded to the Government hereafter, and can only grow and develop under the hands of Congress and the President. By the creation of this Department of Commerce literally all the vast field of business will come gradually, during the next twenty years and thereafter, as closely under the supervision and inspection of the Federal Government as the common carriers and foreign commerce and foreign affairs and relations have come during the nineteenth century. For this is a rapidly moving age and a tendency to-day is a marked course to-morrow, and Congress once having taken hold of commerce will not let go.

A Step Toward Socialism

IT MAY be a step toward socialism; if so, well and good: the step will not be retraced. And in the other acts of the Congress just adjourned there are equally distinct indications that the American people have in a measure abandoned the laissez-faire theory of Federal relations with the branch of life we call business. The subconscious moral sense of the people has come to a distinct realization of the fact that crimes are as possible in what we call high finance as they are in lower quarters. Time was when success in business was sacred. The millionaire was by his very millions a curiosity and a subject of awe, and hence of respect. But the millionaire has become so common that reverence for him is gone, and there is a distinct feeling among all classes of American citizens that common honesty must be included in success or the success is spurious. There is a feeling that new crimes deserve new laws. The anti-trust laws, passed by the session of Congress last past, are tendrils of American feeling reaching out for a brace and a protection against the hitherto unbranded and shameless villainy of those who make what is respected as brain-work a cloak for plotting to plunder the people. The law which gives precedence on the dockets of the courts to prosecutions under the anti-trust laws is a bald national confession that the suspected violator of honesty in high places is not worthy of the same consideration in the courts that the law gives to a pickpocket. The law preventing rebate-giving by railroads is not a strong law by itself. The maximum fine possible for conviction for violating the law is ridiculously small. But the amount of the fine is not important. The fact that another law gives the President a right to proclaim the rebates which a railroad is giving to its customers carries much weight. For the moment the amount of rebates each customer of a railroad is getting becomes generally known, those concerns receiving small rebates, or no rebates, will insist on the maximum rebate, and this will mean one of two things: that the railroad will have to favor all its customers with the maximum rebate, at the risk of losing business, or quit giving rebates at all and treat all alike. The natural law of the business world, when it operates freely under the light of publicity, will provide a heavier penalty for the violation of the legal enactment than any Legislature or Congress could impose. Of course, this Congressional enactment against the rebate system gives great power to the Federal Government in making prices. It is a step toward what we have been taught to fear as socialism, or a strongly centralized Government; for not the King of England nor the Emperor of Germany has such power as the Congress just adjourned has put into the President's hands. But the step is taken; the people demanded it. And there is nothing to do but to hope for the best, and to be sure that the public sense of the American people is strong and sane. The demand for these anti-trust laws has been formulating ten years. The clamor and the wrath that accompanied the first appeals to Congress have died away. The Congress that passed these recent laws was a conservative Congress. The leaders in the House and in the Senate are not new leaders, fresh from a crazy populace; the step toward socialism was taken as deliberately and as cautiously as any other progressive movement made by the Republic in all its history. And though this apparently radical step was taken not only by the conservative party in the American Government, but by the conservative wing of the conservative party, after a victory so sweeping that there seemed no danger of the country returning to radicalism; yet, to make sure that there could be no mistaking the real earnestness of the motive behind the action of Congress, the same element of the same party put half a million dollars into the hands of Philander C. Knox, one of the bravest, ablest Attorneys-General that the United States ever had, with instructions to spend it in prosecuting violations of these laws against encroaching corporations. It was the largest appropriation ever made in time of peace by this Government for merely ethical ends. And what is more important, this appropriation of half a million dollars into Attorney-General Knox's hands was one of the few times when an American Congress has recognized one of the vital weaknesses of this governmental machine. That weakness is this: low salaries. It will be worth while to digress a moment and consider this weakness.

The county prosecutor of the average community, on whom nine-tenths of the prosecutions of the county fall, gets somewhere between $1200 and $3000 a year. Going up in the scale, one finds that the Federal District-Attorney gets $4500, and that the Attorneys-General of the several States have salaries ranging from $2500 to $5000. The Attorneys-General of the various departments and bureaus at Washington receive from $2000 to $5000, and at the top of the pyramid stands the Attorney-General of the United States, who gets but $8000, and has to maintain a place in the Cabinet upon that small salary. The average salary of the average public attorney who has charge of the enforcement of laws in this country is probably something under $2500 a year. In three cases out of five which the public prosecutor tries in court he opposes attorneys for the defense who are making annually twice as much money as he is, and are therefore probably twice as good lawyers. Corporations take the best attorneys away from the commonwealth's service. In nearly every town of over 10,000 people every railroad-crossing pays some attorney more than the city or county prosecutor gets. In every State capital every railroad maintains an attorney whose salary is three or four times as great as that of the Attorney-General of the States. And every great railroad has at the head of its legal department men who receive from two to ten time as much money as the Attorney-General of the United States receives. Law is made finally by the courts in this country, and courts are influenced by attorneys. Is it any wonder that the people complain bitterly against the courts, and claim that the corporations get all the favors. What else can the people expect? Court decisions are like everything else in this world: the product of environment and the natural law. Cheap men give the public poor service. Now, all this seems digression from the topic, but this one thought should be set down here for public consideration: With all the salaries that a Cresus could pay, the people might get cheap men, and probably would get them—for those traits which make men popular with the masses, which carry primaries and conventions and elections, are exactly the traits that do not win important lawsuits. So long as the power to select public attorneys remains twenty-two calibre, the hole in the fortress of corporate strength will remain twenty-two calibre, no matter how much noise is behind the explosion. The question which Congress tried to solve last winter stripped naked is this: our government, or democracy, or the people, or majority rule, or whatever it happens to be called, is based on the wisdom of the prevailing will of the mass; that wisdom does not rise to the height of the intelligence of the few in choosing men for technical work. Corporations are governed by their keenest minds. The struggle is between keen minds and third-rate minds, and the balance is the crass power of brute strength, that must always be reckoned with behind the cruder minds. It is dramatically significant, if not prophetic, that the Congress which devoted so much time to laws grappling with corporations, turned casually to the reorganization of the army. The two most important bills enacted into laws, outside the laws governing corporations, were those which strengthened the national militia and put the regular army on a firmer basis as a national fighting machine. If this is treason, "high finance" will have to make the most of it. It is a coincidence in legislation that is at least worthy of meditation and prayer!

To say that the day of judgment is coming, to get one's teeth chattering with fear of the revolution, and to put on one's galoshes to keep out impending floods of gore, is, of course, absurd. For Americans are not revolutionists. But, on the other hand, it is perfectly sane to give fair warning to the men who think that the impudence of stock manipulators is the best expression of American patriotism. For such as these there may be a great rubbing of eyes some day. It certainly will not be a bloody day: for red is not Columbia's color. But it is not the crackle of rifles that hurts, but the ripping ridicule of the men behind the guns. There is little danger of the laws concerning the militia and the army, passed by the recent Congress, bringing about war or even rumors of war. But it is more than likely that, if that portion of corporate wealth that is greedy and insolent keeps on bullying courts and snapping its fingers at law, the bayonets of the American citizen soldiery may be inserted in the posterior draperies of the financial gourmands, while they are being gently but firmly toted back to the dead line of decency amid the ribald applause of the multitude. The incident will hardly shake the foundations of the Republic. But it will give the Yankee a chance to laugh. And in moments of national anger, a laugh in the sleeve beats a noose in the brush!

The Things that were Left Undone

A CONGRESS is like a man in this: that the things he fails to do are as good an index to his character as his deeds. The recently adjourned Congress failed to do two important things: to make a new Philippine tariff law and to enact the Statehood bill. The fight for the Statehood bill was one of the most important struggles that has occurred in Congress for a generation. It was not important in and of itself; but it involved many important things. On the surface, the fight seemed to be merely the endeavor of the East to keep out four Western States, and it appeared that Senator Quay, who was powerful in the National Republican Convention that promised Statehood to the Territories, was merely keeping his word. The facts are that Senator Quay, who is always loyal to his business friends, was trying to help some of them in a business way. A number of gentlemen formerly of Pennsylvania have some railroad propositions in the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona. The propositions look good on paper; but Territories can't vote bonds, and the people who desire to vote the bonds and establish the railroads are hindered by the arbitrary rules of the Constitution. But these things were all under the surface. They did not come out in the debates. Quay's bill provided for the admission of four States: Arizona, New Mexico, Oklahoma and the Indian Territory. Probably these States would send eight Democratic Senators to Washington. That lined up the Democrats solidly for the bill. That also was beneath the surface. Again, there is a queer lust for power in the Senate among the mountain States, States like Idaho, Wyoming, Montana, Utah, Nevada and the like, States with but one or two Representatives in the House, that vote down Massachusetts, or Ohio, or Michigan in the Senate. These States supported the Quay bill, and their reasons were not apparent. But their zeal for it furnished the strongest opposition to the bill from a source that controls the Senate. The very fact that under the Quay bill Arizona, for instance, with a smaller literate American population than a good average county in the East, might balance a State with ten million people, was so clearly unjust that the New England Senators, who manage to get the Puritan conscience into their votes, fought the measure most heartily. And they had the bulk of the American people with them. That half a million people should have eight Senators is unjust. And eventually the American people, seeing in the organization of their Congress such palpable unfairness, would lose respect for its edicts. And there is no truer precept in politics than that any legislature that does not derive its power from the principles of just representation is a menace to the perpetuity of the Government. It was the sense of this precept, working in the public conscience and through it to the Senators, that killed the Statehood bill. This also was not always upon the surface.

Nor was the strength of the forces for the Quay bill always apparent. For one of the strongest sources of strength the bill had in the Senate was the feeling of rebellion that many of the Senators from the Middle and Far West felt against the New England leadership of the Senate. It was that rebellious spirit that inspired Quay. Quay, like Platt of New York, is not of the inner circle. The two are not reckoned among that small coterie of gentlemen who rule the Senate. It used to be called the "best thought of the Senate." But that was laughed out of vogue, and the leadership exists now without a nom de plume.

Theoretically, Quay should have won his Statehood fight. He was a trained fighter. He knew the game from start to finish. He commanded a clear majority. He had the immense advantage of a champion who had never been whipped. The righteous minority was afraid of him. No well-known leader cared to risk his reputation by fighting Quay. Beveridge led the fight; he was a David to Quay's Goliath; Quay despised his youthful adversary, and began to preen himself on his victory and spread his plumage. Whereupon he fell into pits. He made strategical blunder after blunder; he seemed fated to do the wrong thing. The thing we call Fate is blind, perhaps, but she has her instincts, and things always go right in the long run. In Quay's fight for Statehood, with all his power, and with all his experience in the use of power, and with all his prestige, he failed through his own blunders. Sheer decency won, and Beveridge—the youngest Senator—who went into a losing fight and managed it with skill far beyond that which his previous experience had developed and his reputation had credited him with, came out a real leader of the Senate—not in the very first class, but at the head of the second class, with a show for promotion. Fate, or the gods, or the spirit of the scheme of things is always good to the man who not merely dares, but who dares to do right. Fate is more than queer; she is canny.

The only other important thing which Congress failed to do—excepting to ratify the treaties, which was Senatorial work and should not be charged to Congress—was to pass

The American Adventures of a Fortune-Hunting Earl

FROTHINGHAM'S abrupt change of tactics had been caused by a cablegram from Evelyn which reached him at the Barneys even as his diplomatic agent was in the heat and toil of the negotiation with Amzi Hooper. It read:

> Break off everything and return. Have written you New York. Best possible news. Gwen sends love.

"Why didn't she say what it was?" he wondered. And he decided that it must be news of too private a nature to be trusted to the telegraph station at Beauvais. Why had she written if he was to go at once? "I suppose," he concluded, "she was afraid I mightn't obey orders. 'Gwen sends love'—that must mean that the news is about me and Gwen."

But he had no uplifting of spirits—instead, he felt a sense of impending misfortune. He called up Lawrence's office and told one of the clerks that he wished Lawrence to call him as soon as he came in. In a few minutes Lawrence was relating over the wire the favorable progress of the negotiation.

"It's off," said Frothingham. "I want nothing more to do with it. I'm glad it's in good form for the break. I can drop it decently."

This so delighted Lawrence that he laughed aloud. "Hooper's certain to send for me," he said. "I'll give him the shock of his life."

Frothingham cautioned him against any transgression of the most courteous politeness, then went down to luncheon—with Nelly, alone. While she was talking and he looking, all in a flash he understood why the "best possible news" from home depressed him, why "Gwen sends love" did not elate him. He asked Nelly to take him to her school.

"Oh, you wouldn't be interested," she said.

But he insisted, and they set out immediately after luncheon. As they went—in a street car—she explained her work:

When her mother lay dying she said to the man beside whom she had worked for thirty-six years, mostly cloud and rain: "Henry, I don't want a big, showy monument over me. If you should do something for me, build a school of some kind, a school where girls can be taught how to be useful wives and mothers, instead of spending their whole lives at learning." And Nelly's father had put by money, a large sum each year, until his daughter's education was finished. Then he had said to her, "I want you to help me carry out your ma's memorial." And he turned over to her a mass of plans and hints and schemes which he had been accumulating for seven years. "Get up a plan," he had said, "on the lines your ma would have liked. It's a woman's work—it's your natural work. I'll supply the money." And after two years' labor, one year of it abroad, she had perfected a scheme for a great school where several hundred girls could be instructed in all that a woman as a woman should know—housework, sewing, cooking, shopping, marketing, the elements of business and of art, the care of babies, the training and education of children. And she had so planned it that the girls could and should support themselves while they were learning.

Frothingham did not take his eyes from her face as she talked. She seemed to him the most wonderful, the noblest human being in the world. "A fine, a beautiful idea," he said. "But aren't you afraid of spoiling those girls for workingmen's wives? You're educating entirely too much in this country, I should say, as it is. You're making the lower classes restless and discontented. They'll pull everything down about your ears the first thing you know."

Nelly smiled—he saw that she was not seeing him at all, was looking far, far past him. "I'm not worrying about the consequences," she said. "If we did that we should never move. You must remember that we haven't any classes here, but are all of one class—we differ in degree, but not in kind. One can't look into the future. I only know it was intended for the light to shine on the whole human race and that it's our duty to help all we can. And knowledge is light, and ignorance is darkness, isn't it? I'm not afraid of light, anywhere. Whether it's little or much, it's better than darkness."

He looked at her strangely. "I had never thought of that," he said in a low voice. Then, after a moment: "How good you are! I didn't know there was anybody in the world like you. How generous of you to give your life to these people!"

"No—no!" she protested.

HE LIFTED HIS HAT AND BOWED

They were walking now through a maze of homely streets, lined with flat-houses large and small, and odorous of strong-smelling cookery, of decaying food, of stale whisky and beer—a typical tenement district. "When I first began on this scheme," she went on, "I thought as you do. But I soon saw how false, how foolishly false, that was. And if I had continued to think as at first, if I had gone into the work to patronize and to feed my vanity, I should have injured myself and all whom I wished to help. I should have made a snob of myself and parasites of them."

She paused and into her eyes came a look which he thought "glorious." She went on: "But, fortunately, I got the right sort of guidance from the very start. And I discovered that I had more to learn than these people. I was actually more ignorant than they." She turned her face toward him. "Did you ever think," she asked, "what would become of you if you had all the props taken from under you, and were cast upon the world and were forced to make the fight alone—without a penny or a friend or a relative or any outside help of any kind?"

"Thought of it? Well, rather!" he exclaimed. "And I know what would happen to me—jolly quick!"

"That was my first discovery—about myself. I found that I was in the world without any fit equipment to live. I found that if the props were taken from under me I'd be no match for the working-people, that I'd perish or else have to live on the charity of rich people by doing the sort of puttering work they give the poor of their own class. And I said to myself: 'You are a fine human being, aren't you—to pose as the superior of those who are independent and self-respecting? You call them ignorant, yet they are conforming to Nature's laws and to the conditions of life infinitely better than you, with your boasted intelligence and your fancied refinement.' I saw that I was not a real woman, as my mother had been, but was only a parasite on the labor and the intelligence of others."

"And what did you do?"

"I went to school with my girls. And——" Her face lighted up with enthusiasm—"Oh, you don't know what a—a magnificent—sensation it is to be conscious that one can swim alone on the sea of life without fear of drowning or of having to call for help. You spoke as if I were giving these people something. Why, I owe everything to them! It is they that gave and are giving. And I am and always shall be in their debt."

He tried to think of some satirical phrase with which to lessen the impression what she had said was making upon him. But he could only blink into the flooding light which seemed to him to surround her and to blaze upon his pettiness and worthlessness and the tawdriness of all upon which his life had been based. In his own country, in his surroundings of alternating dullness and dissipation, his naturally good mind had become a drowsy marsh with pale lights gleaming in it occasionally here and there. Unconsciously, he had been slowly rousing ever since he landed in New York. The people he had met were like enough to those he had met at home, and also like enough to the people of the real America from which they were offshoots, to form for him a mental bridge on which he could pass from his England of narrow and bigoted caste to Nelly's America of alert and intelligent and self-respecting, level-eyed humanity. And he was now feeling in this restless Chicago the fierce impact of energies and aspirations of which he had had no conception, of which he could never have a clear conception. Through the eyes of this earnest, unaffected girl, with her lived ideal of self-forgetfulness, he had been getting confused, dazzling glimpses of a new world.

But he did clearly see and feel that he loved her. And she now saw in his curiously changed face what was in his mind. She looked away instantly—her expression was uneasy, almost frightened. "Here we are—at the school," she said nervously as they turned a corner and came in sight of three great buildings—plain yet attractive—which faced three sides of a broad lawn, in the centre of which a large and most artistic fountain was playing.

He never could give a clear account of that school. He remembered the manager—a Mr. Worthington, with a strong and serious, yet anything but solemn face, with rather homely features except a pair of extraordinary eyes. He remembered many classrooms where all sorts of feminine enterprises were going forward with energetic informality. He remembered many girls—uncommonly clean, bright, well-dressed girls with agreeable voices and manners. He remembered many smiles and other evidences of health and spirits. He remembered many babies—all in one big, sunny room, chirping and crowing and gurgling, balancing on uncertain little lumps of feet or crawling toilsomely. "Practice babies," Nelly called them, and he thought, "If this is the way her girls succeed with mere 'practice babies,' what won't they make of their own?" Finally, he remembered—Nelly. All his other memories were a hazy background for her tall, graceful figure and wonderful, luminous face. Her he never forgot in the smallest detail of look or gesture.

When they were once more in the street, walking toward the car, he began abruptly: "I came over here—to America—because I was ruined—because we were going to be sold up and chucked out in the autumn. I came—I'm ashamed to put it into words—I'd rather you'd imagine—you can, easy enough. It's often done and nothing's thought of it—at least, on our side of the water. This morning—in fact, just before luncheon—I got a cable from my sister. Our luck has turned, and——"

"I'm very glad," she murmured as he paused.

"I don't wish to go back," he went on impetuously, his drawl gone. "I wish—it's you I want. And I ask you to give me a chance. I don't think I'm such a frightfully bad sort, as men go. And while I ain't fit for you to walk on, where's the man that is? And perhaps if I were less fit I couldn't care for you—all the height from down where I am to up where you are."

The storm which had burst from deep down within him, deeper far than he thought his nature extended, was so sweeping and whirling him that he could not see her.

When she spoke it was in a voice that took away hope, but gently soothing the wound it made. "I'm sorry," she said, "and yet I'm—not. No woman could help being pleased to hear what you've said to me, and hear it from such a man as you are. Oh, yes"—this in answer to his expression—"for I've found out what sort of man lives behind your look of irony and indifference. A so much better man than he lets himself know—or show. And I understand how differently you've been brought up, how different your system is from ours. But——"

She hesitated and somehow he felt that he must give her sympathy instead of asking it.

"You remember, I told you that when I began with the school I had the right sort of help?"

He looked away from her and it was black before him for an instant. "That fairish chap with the eyes—Mr. Worthington?" he asked, cutting his words off sharp.

She nodded, her cheeks bright. "I simply couldn't help it," she said. "He was what I longed to be. And he didn't preach the things I believed in—he just lived them."

They were silent for a few minutes, then she went on: "I don't want you to misunderstand. He has never even looked—what I'd like him to—to look and say. I don't know whether he cares or not—perhaps not. Sometimes I think he cares only for the work, and——"

"He does care—I saw it," interrupted Frothingham, and then he was astonished at himself for being so "ridiculously decent."

"I don't know," she said doubtfully. "Thank you for saying so." She looked at him shyly. "You'll think me queer for telling you about it when he has said nothing to me."

"I understand why you tell me," Frothingham answered. "It was—like you." He smiled faintly, his frequent, self-satirizing smile. "Don't mind me. I'm used to bad luck. I take to it like a duck to water."

Nelly's instinct told her that she had said enough, and they walked in silence. When she spoke again it was of the dance to which they were going that night. An hour and a half later as they were separating for dinner he said earnestly: "Thank you for what you said. And thank you—even more—for what you didn't say."

XV

ON THE way to Mrs. Grafton's ball that night he sent Evelyn a cablegram, asking her to cable him a hundred and fifty pounds he needed to enable him to pay Wallingford and fixing the next day week for his sailing. He might have sailed three days earlier, but he wished to get her letter and so not carry an unsatisfied curiosity on a six days' voyage.

At the ball every one was talking of the Frothingham "exposure" and of Jenny Hooper's marriage. The "exposure" had appeared in but two editions of the "yellow" that invented it. "Wick" Barney had seen it and had lost not a moment in forcing its suppression and a denial, and in warning the other papers. He said nothing to Frothingham, and Frothingham did not know of it then, or indeed until several years had passed. But even if it had not been suppressed and had been everywhere believed, Frothingham's social position would not have suffered. His title was genuine and his family and his position at home were of the best—more. American fashionable society never asks about upper-class foreigners who come to it for no apparent, or rather avowed, purpose. It expects them to be somewhat "queer" in other respects. It assumes that they will be "queer" in money matters—and it has reason for the assumption.

Frothingham did, however, hear of Jenny's marriage—heard of it from Jenny herself. At the Graftons' the dressing-rooms are at opposite ends of the hall from which the grand stairway ascends to the drawing-room and the ballroom. It chanced that Jenny and Frothingham came along this hall from the dressing-rooms at the same time and, to the delight of the few guests and the many servants who witnessed, met at the foot of the stairway. As Frothingham's face habitually expressed nothing beyond a suggestion that he had nothing to express, he and his eyeglass withstood the shock admirably. Jenny had intended to "cut him dead" the next time she saw him. But as she tottered suddenly into his presence on her monstrous tall heels she was not prepared for a course so foreign to her nature as the cut direct. Before she knew what she was doing or saying she had smiled and nodded. She instantly shifted to a frown; but it was too late—Frothingham had spoken, had subdued her with that "perfectly splendid, so aristocratic" monocle of his. "What's the use of throwing a fit over a thing that's past and done?" she reflected. "He's all right in his way. And won't it give Tom and everybody a jolt if we enter the ballroom together?"

Frothingham had called her "Miss Hooper." This gave her the opening. "Miss Hooper!" she said with her jauntiest air. "That's ancient history. I ain't been called that for ages and ages. Why, I'm an old married woman—for Chicago."

"Really," said he, thinking it "some stupid, silly sell or other." He was hardly listening. He was more interested in the rope of pearls and diamonds that swung from her neck to far below her waist. The pearls were large and were once perfect; but each pearl had been mutilated by having a diamond set in it—a very nightmare of sacrifice of beauty and taste in an effort to make more expensive the most expensive.

"Yes, indeed—truly. I'm Mrs——" She stopped short and gave him a look of horror.

"Dear me!" exclaimed Frothingham with satiric sympathy. "Have you forgotten his name, or did you forget to ask it?"

"No—but I never thought of it before—thought how it sounds. My, but it's awful! I'd never in the world have married him if I'd have pronounced it beforehand. Mrs. Burster! Ain't that horrible?" Frothingham had lifted "ain't" from the slough of doubtful grammar to the pinnacle of fashion in fashionable Chicago.

"Oh, I don't know," he drawled, still imagining she was jesting. "It might be worse, mightn't it, now?"

Her eyes flashed at this seeming impertinence. "Yes—it might. It might be Bursted—or 'Busted'—mightn't it?" Then, seeing that her "shot" at his financial condition as described in the newspaper she had read and believed apparently did not touch him, she relented and was in a good humor again. "I've been engaged to Tom for a year or so, on and off," she went on. "When I woke up this morning it came into my head to marry him. And I did it while your lawyer and papa were squabbling." She said this so convincingly that she herself began to feel that it was "as good as true."

The news that she and Frothingham were advancing together preceded them to the ballroom, but had not spread far enough from its doors to impair the sensation made by their entrance with every appearance of friendliness. And the much discussed mystery of that day's doings is here solved for the first time.

The next afternoon Frothingham and Wickham drove up to Barney's door as Nelly and Worthington were arriving on foot. One glance at their faces and he knew that they understood each the other now. "All I accomplished," he said to himself mournfully, "was to force the fellow to play his hand. What ripping luck I do bring—other people!" He paused only long enough to make his passing on seem natural. Presently she followed him to the library where he was standing on the rug before the closed fireplace with a cigarette drooping dejectedly from the corner of his mouth. She moved restlessly about the room, evidently seeking a way to begin telling him something.

"I saw it in your face—at the door," he said, in answer to an appealing glance from her.

She put her hand on his arm and her eyes were wistful. "I know you did, and I hoped—I thought—I saw in your face that you were generous enough to be glad I'm happy."

"No, I can't say that you did. The most I can do is to bear it—without the grin." He seated himself on the edge of the big table and looked at her reflectively. "I say," he began at last, "do you see how it's possible to be in love with two at the same time?"

She nodded, smiling a little. "Yes—I—I think—if I hadn't met some one first—I should have been in love with—some one else."

"That's something," he said in his satirical drawl. But he kept his eyes down and his eyelids were trembling. "Do you know," he went on after a pause full of cigarette smoke, "I've been thinking about—caring for two people and that sort of thing? I don't mind saying to you—you'll understand, I'm sure—there's a girl over on the other side——"

"I'm so glad!" she exclaimed—and then she wasn't.

"I care for her—in a different way, but it's quite a real way. And when I go back home, it may be—you know what I wish to say. I'm telling you because I don't wish you to think I'm disloyal to you"—his expression was half-satirical, half-mournful—"or to her either."

"I appreciate your telling me," she said. "But I'd have understood if you hadn't. I believe I recognize a manly man when I see him, and—you know that's what I think you."

He shrugged his shoulders. "I dare say I'm much like other people. I show every one the side that matches the side they show me."

After a moment he went to her and lifted her hand and kissed it. She stood and turned her face, sweet and friendly, up to him. "I'd rather you'd kiss me," she said.

He winced and paled, and let go her hand. "No, thanks," he replied. "If you don't mind, I'd rather not."

With this Mr. Barney bustled into the room—no one had ever seen him make a slow movement of any kind. At sight of them standing thus suspiciously, he halted and, as they flushed and moved apart, he laughed in such a way that Nelly felt impelled to explain:

"I was talking to Lord Frothingham of my engagement, and he was congratulating me."

"Bless my soul!" ejaculated Barney. "This is news!"

"I haven't had a chance to tell you, father. It's Mr. Worthington."

Barney seemed depressed. "Well—I guess he's all right," he said slowly. "I've got nothing against him. But——" "And," interrupted Nelly, afraid of her father's frankness, "he was telling me of his engagement."

Barney looked at Frothingham sharply. "American?" he asked, showing that he wouldn't like it if he got an affirmative answer.

"No—a neighbor of ours in England," replied Frothingham.

"Delighted to hear it. You ought to have been married and settled long ago. I still think you'd have done better to sell your farm over there and settle down here in Chicago." Barney would have scorned to apply such words as estate and plantation to a farm—though he did call his shop an "Emporium."

Wickham went to New York with Frothingham the next day but one; and on the day after they arrived they had Honoria, chaperoned by Mrs. Galloway, at dinner and at the theatre, and, because Wickham insisted, at supper. It was almost two o'clock when they put the two women into their carriage at the Waldorf and went to bed—Frothingham refused to sit up listening to Wickham on Honoria. He was surprised that Wickham had invited her for luncheon the next, or, rather, the same day—was astonished when he found that she had accepted. His last three days in America were spent in studying—and encouraging—an infatuation.

The morning of his departure came, and the steamer which he assumed must be bringing Evelyn's letter, since it had not arrived on Friday, was just getting in. He decided that he would not put off his sailing to get the letter—"Why wait merely to satisfy my curiosity? Evelyn sent me over here. She knows what she's about in recalling me." He left Hutt to stay until the last moment on the chance of the mail arriving; he and Wickham went down to the pier—Mrs. Galloway and Honoria and Joe Wallingford and his wife were already there. He had a few sentences aside with Honoria.

"I'm so glad you introduced Mr. Barney to me," she said.

He trained his eyeglass upon her mockingly. "Really! How extraordinary!' Precisely what he said on Wednesday."

"Don't be a silly ass," protested Honoria in an unconvincing voice. "He's only a big, nice boy. I'm four years older than he. Or, rather, he's four years younger than I—I don't fancy the word old."

"That's as it should be. If a young chap will marry, he should be several years the younger. She'll keep him straight and bring him up properly. She'll be patient with his ignorance and know how to handle the reins when he frets or frisks. Good business this, you're planning, Honoria."

"Do you think he likes me?"

"Likes? He's positively driveling. Look at 'im!"

AS THEY WENT—IN A STREET CAR—SHE EXPLAINED HER WORK

Honoria's glance met Wickham's—he was at the rail, pretending to listen to Catherine. His "driveling" expression as he came at the call in her eyes seemed to please Honoria mightily. With the last going-ashore gong Hutt came, bringing Evelyn's letter. Frothingham at once read enough of it to interpret her cablegram:

> As you doubtless know, Georgie's father-in-law died in New York a few weeks ago. He left them I don't know how much—something huge. And George is giving Gwen a dot of three hundred thousand. She was just here with the news—she came to me the instant she heard it. As she was leaving she said, "Won't you give Arthur my love when you write?" It's the first time she's spoken of you to me since you left. And when I said, "I'll cable it to him," she blushed—you should have seen her, Arthur—and heard her say, "Oh, thank you, dear!"

"Good chap, George," murmured Frothingham. "The right sort clean through. He wouldn't let Gwen and me be cheated as he and Evelyn were. . . . Poor Evelyn! . . . Gwen and me!" He began a sigh that changed into his faint smile of self-mockery. "Just my beastly, rotten luck—not to be sure it's good luck when it finally does come."

He went to the rail and his glance sought out and rested upon the little group of his friends on the crowded pier across the widening gap between Nelly's land and him. Wickham took Honoria's blue chiffon parasol and waved it; Catherine fluttered her handkerchief. He lifted his hat and bowed. Long after they were lost to him in the merge of the crowd they could make out his loud light tweeds and scarlet bow, and once they caught the flash of a ray of sunlight on his eyeglass—like a characteristic farewell look.

It was five o'clock in a late September afternoon. As usual, on the low table on the porch viewing the Italian garden at Beauvais Hall was the big tea-tray with its array of antique silver and old porcelain, the cake and the toast and the slices of bread and butter. Round it were Evelyn and Gwen and Frothingham—Gwen in a shirtwaist and riding skirt, Frothingham in the slovenly, baggy flannels of an English gentleman in the seclusion of his country-seat. No one was speaking and the quiet was profound. Presently Evelyn rose and went through the open French window into the drawing-room. Gwen was watching Frothingham; he was watching the peacocks as they strutted with tails spread in splendor.

"I'm always wondering that one of those clever, handsome American women didn't steal your heart—if you've got one," said Gwen.

He slowly withdrew his gaze from the peacocks and fixed it upon her with his monocled expression that might mean everything or nothing. She chose to read everything into it and flushed with pleasure. And her left hand, moving nervously among the silver and porcelain, revealed on its third finger a narrow gold band.

He drew a long, slow breath of lazy content and drawled:

"You're so damn comfortable, Gwen!"

Submarine Farms

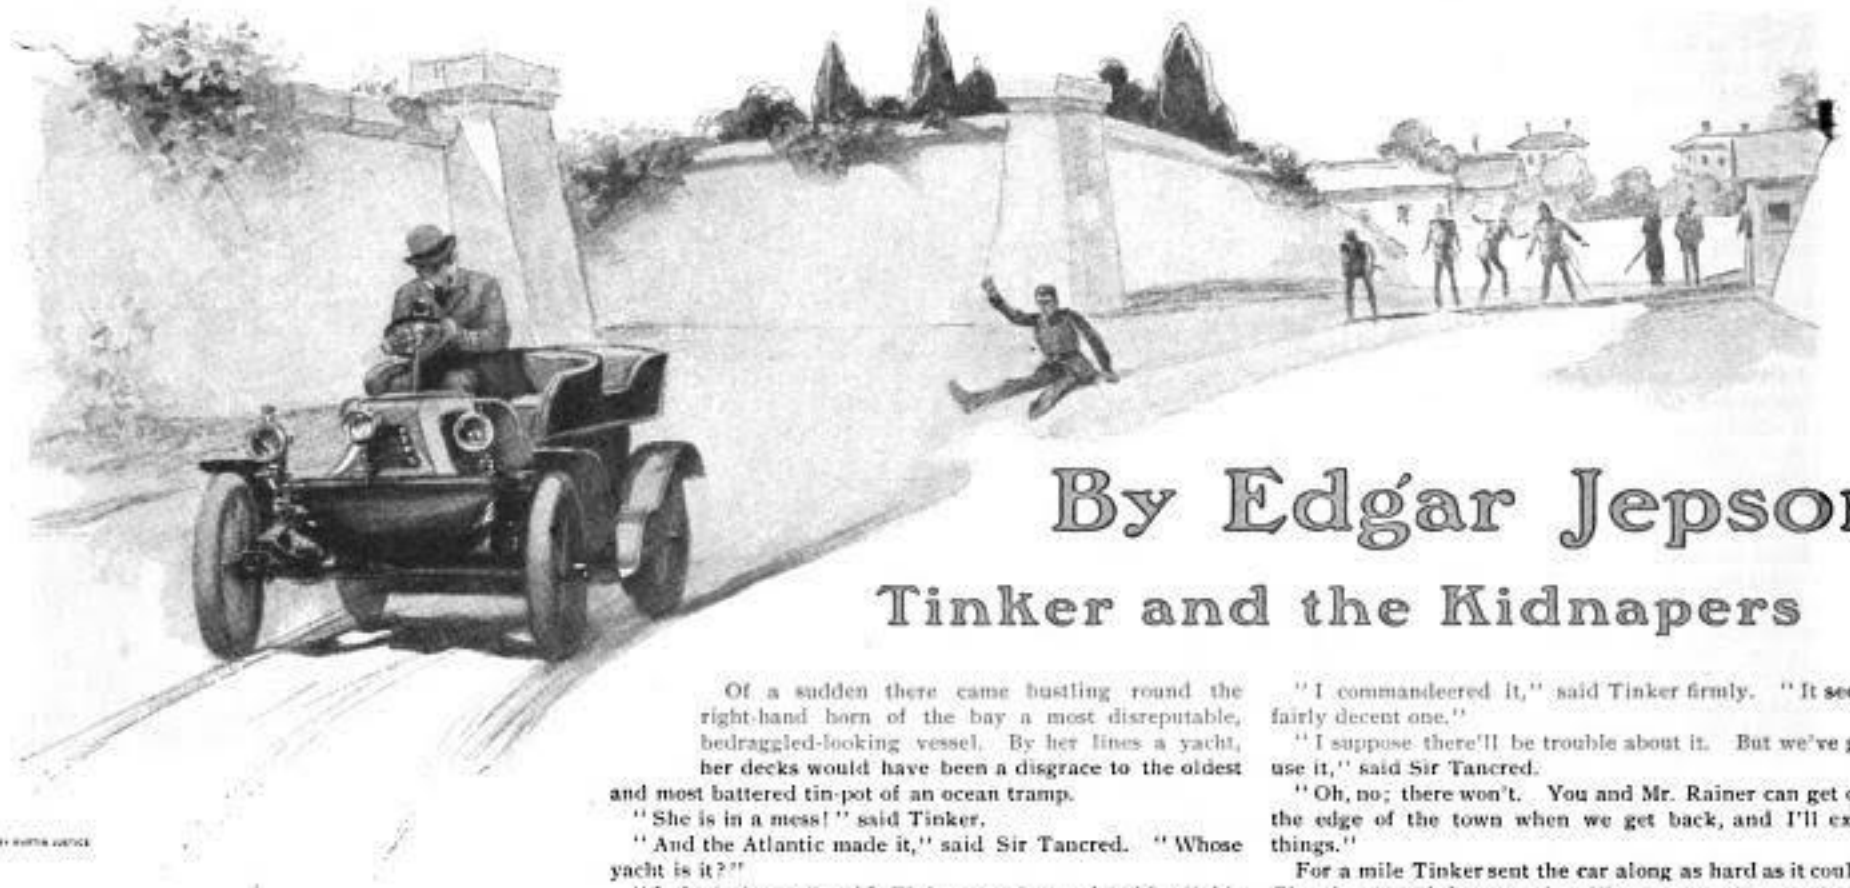
OVER half a million dollars' worth of sponges is now the value of the annual harvest of that protozoa from the Gulf side of the Florida coast.

This extensive sponge cutting is so decreasing the supply, especially of what is known as the sheepswool variety, that the Government is conducting experiments in planting sponges.

The natural sponge ground extends from St. Marks to Tampa Bay, one hundred and fifty miles, and from fifteen to twenty miles from the shore. By means of powerful water glasses the operators survey the sponge-fields and with sharp grappling forks cut and draw up the sponges. They can by this method harvest sponges growing at a depth of sixty feet.

The threatened exhaustion of the Florida coast sponge-fields, therefore, has awakened the United States Government to the desirability of renewing them; and now thousands of sponge cuttings are being planted, some at Sugar Loaf Key, east of Key West, and others at various places in Biscayne Bay.

In planting sponges the cuttings are secured to a support sufficiently durable to withstand salt-water corrosion and devastation wrought by the teredo and other aggressive mollusks.



While experiments in growing sponges have been made previously in other countries, Dr. H. F. Moore, who has charge of the Florida work, says that the experiments undertaken by the United States have demonstrated for the first time the practical utility of the project they forecast.

Ninety-five per cent. of the cuttings planted along the Florida coast have healed and are thriving sturdily.

The cuttings that perished were mostly from yellow sponges. The sheepswool variety, which has a higher commercial value than the yellow kind, seems also to be the hardier.

The Admirable Tinker

By Edgar Jepson

Tinker and the Kidnapers

WHAT did you say you paid your governess?" said Sir Tancred Beauleigh.

"Thirty pounds a year," said Hildebrand Anne.

"She dresses well," said Sir Tancred.

Hildebrand Anne, who was observing the Mediterranean from the wall which runs along the sea front of the gardens of the Temple of Fortune at Monte Carlo, turned his head and eyed his father with a trifle of distrust: "She does dress well," he said thoughtfully. "Sometimes I think that her people must have lost their money, and she bought her gowns when they were rich. Sometimes I think she's only being a governess for fun."

"For fun?" said Sir Tancred. "But I thought her references were all right. Yes; you told me that she carried them about with her."

"Well, she has the nicest kind of face," said Tinker; and his own face was out of the common guileless.

"So her face was her reference, was it?" said Sir Tancred.

"You can forge references, but you can't forge a face," said Hildebrand Anne with the air of a philosopher.

Sir Tancred laughed gently. "My good Tinker," he said, "I look forward to the time when you enter the diplomatic service. The diplomacy of your country will be newer than ever. But don't be too sure that a woman can't forge her face."

"What a lot of forgery there would be if women could forge faces like Dorothy's," said Tinker gravely.

"You seem a perfect well of truth to-day," said Sir Tancred.

They were silent a while, gazing idly over the sea; then Tinker said, "Dorothy is rather a mystery, you know. She never gets letters, only telegrams. She has lots of money, too, and she spends it. I often have to talk to her seriously about her extravagance."

"You do? What does she say?"

"Oh, she laughs. That's what makes me think that she's only a governess for fun. I never knew a girl so ready to laugh. Why, I've only known her to cry once."

"When was that?" said Sir Tancred quickly.

"A few days ago," said Tinker; and he added hastily, "I think I'll go after her and Elsie; they've gone down the Corniche to Mentone."

"Was it the day I had an affair with Le Comte De Puy-de-Dôme?"

"Ye-e-s," said Tinker with some reluctance, and he prepared for trouble. Hitherto his father had said nothing of that timely but eldritch yell. But Sir Tancred was silent.

Presently Tinker said: "She would make you a nice little wife, sir."

Sir Tancred started. "There are times," he said, "when you would take my breath away if I hadn't good lungs."

"I thought that was what you were thinking about," said the ingenuous Tinker.

"If you add thought-reading to your other accomplishments it will be too much," said Sir Tancred with conviction.

Editor's Note—The last of these tales of The Admirable Tinker will appear in an early number. Each is complete in itself.

Of a sudden there came bustling round the right-hand horn of the bay a most disreputable, bedraggled-looking vessel. By her lines a yacht, her decks would have been a disgrace to the oldest and most battered tin-pot of an ocean tramp.

"She is in a mess!" said Tinker.

"And the Atlantic made it," said Sir Tancred. "Whose yacht is it?"

"I don't know," said Tinker, staring at it with all his eyes.

"You ought to," said Sir Tancred with some severity; "you've been on it. It's Meyer's."

Tinker wriggled.

A hundred yards from the jetty the yacht's engines were reversed, and the way was scarcely off her when her only remaining boat fell smartly on the water, and was rowed quickly to the steps. A quarter of an hour later a little group hurried into the gardens—the manager of the Hotel des Princes, a tall, bearded, grimy man, and a short, clean-shaven, grimy man. They came straight to Sir Tancred and Tinker, and the bearded man said quickly: "My name is Rainer, Septimus Rainer. I've just learnt that my daughter Dorothy is your little girl's governess. Where is she?"

Sir Tancred bowed and said languidly, "Miss Rainer is the governess of my son's adopted sister. He made the arrangement and is the responsible person. Here he is."

Septimus Rainer looked at Tinker with some surprise and said feverishly, "Where is she? Where's Dorothy?"

"She went with Elsie along the Corniche toward Mentone after déjeuner," said Tinker.

"Take me to her at once, will you?" said Rainer quickly. "She's not safe!"

"Not safe! Come along!" said Sir Tancred. And his languor fell from him like a mask.

As they hurried through the gardens Rainer said: "It's like this: a week ago I got a cable saying that kidnapers were after Dorothy. I wired to McNiel, my Paris agent, to come straight here with half a dozen of the best detectives, scooped up Mr. Buist, of the New York police"—he nodded toward the clean-shaven, grimy man—"borrowed a yacht, and came myself. We had trouble with the Atlantic, of course, as we were in a hurry; but I've done it seven hours quicker than steamer and train. Has McNiel been here with the detectives?"

"No; he hasn't," said Tinker.

"Sure?" said Rainer.

"Certain," said Tinker.

"Perhaps McNiel did not tell her, not wishing to frighten her, and watched over her from a distance without making his presence known," said Rainer.

"Perhaps McNiel is in it," said Sir Tancred dryly.

"I'm glad I came straight here," said Rainer.

As they passed the Hotel des Princes Tinker said, "I'll catch you up," and bolted into it. He ran upstairs into his father's room and took from a drawer the pocketbook which held their passports, ran into his own room and thrust into his pockets some five hundred francs in notes and gold. Then, sure that he was ready for the worse event, ran smiling down the stairs.

As he came out of the front door his eye fell on a lonely, deserted motor-car. In a breath he had pitied its loneliness, seen its use, and jumped into it. He set it going, and in three minutes had caught up his father and Rainer. Sir Tancred jumped into the seat beside him, and Rainer and the detective into the back seat.

"Whose car is this? How did you get it?" said Sir Tancred.

"I commandeered it," said Tinker firmly. "It seems a fairly decent one."

"I suppose there'll be trouble about it. But we've got to use it," said Sir Tancred.

"Oh, no; there won't. You and Mr. Rainer can get out at the edge of the town when we get back, and I'll explain things."

For a mile Tinker sent the car along as hard as it could go. Then he slowed down, and pulling up at every opening into the hills or down to the shore sent a long coo-ee ringing down it. No answer came back. At the end of two miles his face was growing graver and graver; and at the end of two miles and a half he stopped and said, "They can't have gone farther than this."

The three men looked at one another with serious faces.

"Just too late," said Septimus Rainer.

"Mr. Buist had better hurry back to Monte Carlo, the Hotel des Princes, in case we've missed them. We will go on hard, and he can wire to us at Mentone, Ventimiglia and Genoa," said Sir Tancred.

"That's all very well," said the detective stubbornly. "But I don't like the looks of things. Miss Rainer is governess in your family, sir, a curious thing for the daughter of a millionaire to be. There is a chance, and I'm bound to consider it, of your being mixed up in the kidnaping. What's to prevent you kidnaping Mr. Rainer? I mean no offense, sir, but I'm bound to look at it all ways."

Sir Tancred's eyes flashed, and for a moment he looked as if he could not believe his ears, but he said quietly, "Just as you like. Let Mr. Rainer go back, or both of you go back. Only be quick!"

"Off you go, Buist!" said the millionaire. "I know where I am! Go, man, go!"

The detective got down reluctantly; Sir Tancred said, "Go to M. Lautrec at the Police Bureau, Monte Carlo! He's the best man to set things going!" And Tinker started the car.

Two miles farther on they came upon a peasant woman tramping slowly along with a heavy basket. Tinker stopped the car, and Sir Tancred asked her if she had seen a young lady and a little girl walking along the Corniche between here and Monte Carlo. She said she had seen a young lady and a little girl in a carriage with two gentlemen, and the horses were galloping; oh, but they did gallop; they had nearly run her down. The young lady had cried out as they passed, but she had not heard what she said. It was a long while ago; more than an hour; near Monte Carlo.

"We must follow this carriage! It looks like them! Drive on, Tinker!" said Sir Tancred.

The car rushed along, and Sir Tancred told the millionaire what the woman had said.

"The rogues are hardly up to date to use a carriage instead of a motor-car," said the millionaire.

"What I don't see is how they are going to get them across the frontier. It looks—it looks as if the Italian police were in it," said Sir Tancred, frowning.

"Do you mean to tell me that the Italian police would connive at kidnaping?" said the millionaire.

"No; but some rascal of a detective who could pull a good many strings might be in it. At any rate, if they get them across the frontier, undrugged, the authorities are squared or humbugged. And if they get them to that rabbit-warren Genoa we may be a fortnight finding them."

They were soon in Mentone, and learned from a gendarme that an hour before a carriage had driven fast through the town. It held fever patients for the hospital at Genoa, he said, ill of the bubonic plague: the police and the custom-house at Ventimiglia had been warned by wire from Monte Carlo and Genoa not to delay it or go near it. It had passed just an hour.

"If they're bound for Genoa we can catch them, bar accidents. And Lautrec will have wired there. The rascals have worked out a good scheme; but your coming has spoiled it, Mr. Rainer. Send her along, Tinker!" said Sir Tancred.

The car hummed along, but as it drew near the custom-house at Ventimiglia Sir Tancred said, "By Jove, we're going to be delayed! The guard's turned out!" And sure enough, a dozen Italian soldiers barred the road.

Tinker stopped the car, and a sergeant ordered Sir Tancred and the millionaire to come with him to the officer in charge. Tinker gave Sir Tancred the pocketbook which held their passports; they got out of the car and followed the sergeant into the custom-house.

Presently Tinker heard them talking, heard the conversation grow loud and excited, and caught disjointed scraps of it. Of a sudden his father cried loudly in Italian, "Spies! we're nothing of the kind!" And then in English, "Bolt!"

In a breath the car was moving and half a dozen soldiers sprang forward, crying, "Stop! Stop!"

"It's running away!" screamed Tinker in Italian, and switched it on to full speed.

It jerked forward; and the soldiers ran heavily after it.

"Hold it back! Hold it back!" screamed Tinker; and a simple young soldier caught hold of it behind, and threw all his heart and strength into that effort, only to find himself running fast. At sixty yards he was running faster and shouting loudly. At eighty yards he stopped shouting, let go and fell down. Tinker looked back and saw him sitting up in the dust and shaking his fist, while far behind him his fellow-soldiers danced, gesticulating in the middle of the road.

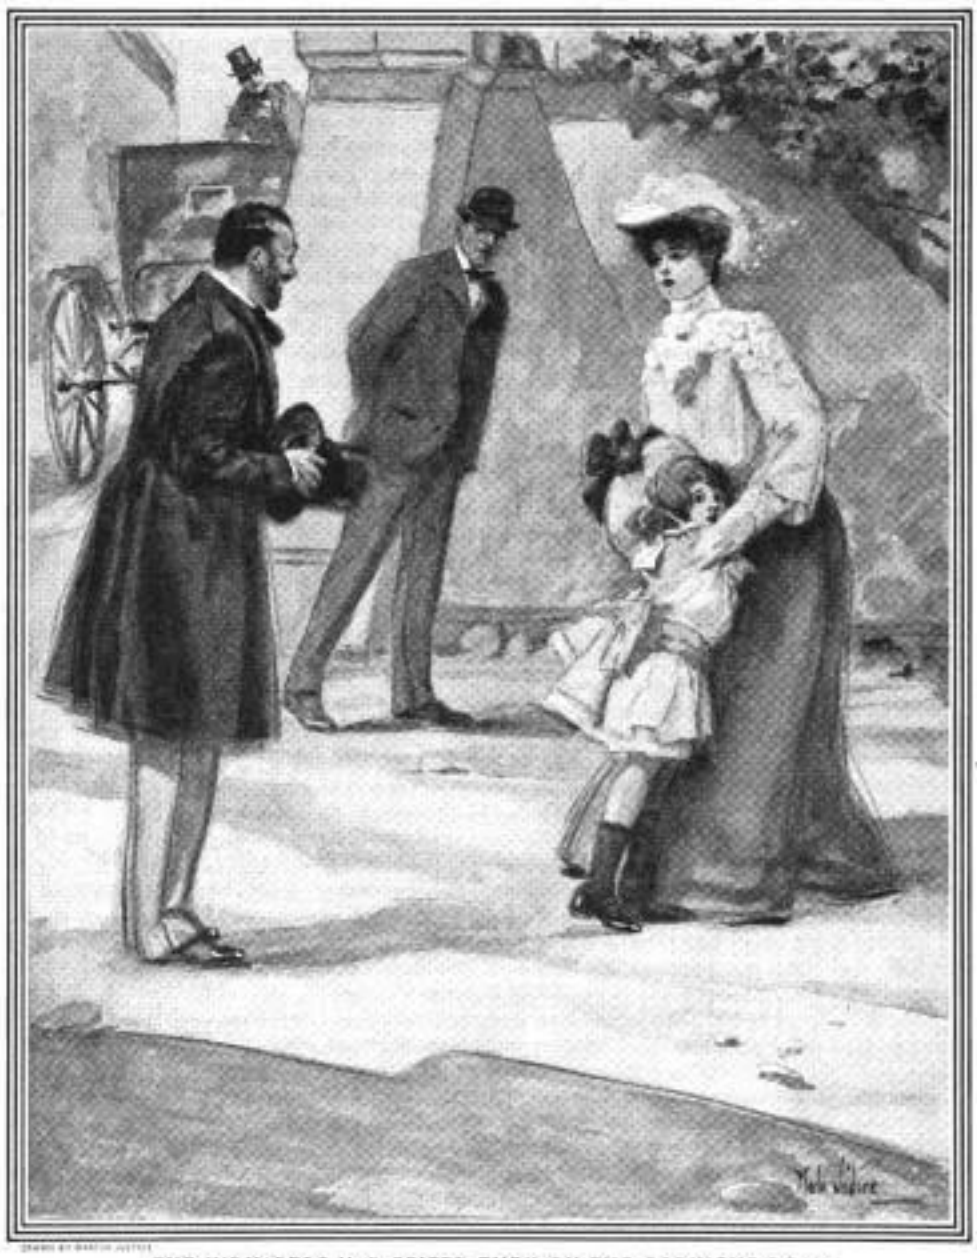
Tinker let the car rip on, slowing down at each branch road for a quick search for traces of the flying carriage. He was excited, determined, but hardly happy. He saw no hope of rescuing Dorothy and Elsie by himself even if he caught the carriage; and since he reckoned that it would take his father and the millionaire two hours at the least to escape from the trap which had been so neatly set for them, they might not rejoin him till far into the night. He kept his eyes about him, and as he was passing a great gap in the hills he saw something fluttering in the road before him, and coming nearer saw that it was a hat.

He stopped the car, sprang down and picked it up. It was Elsie's hat, and he began to wonder how it came there. If she had thrown it out of the carriage the kidnapers would have stopped and picked it up. Besides, the elastic was broken, and she was very unlikely to have broken the elastic in taking it off. He looked up and down the road, and saw fifty yards behind him a road branching off into the gap in the hills. A slow, seraphic smile lighted up his angel face, he stepped into the car, turned it round, and went back to the branch road. At the corner he found a little girl watching a few lean sheep. She had come, she said, but a short while ago, and had seen no carriage; the branch road led to Camporossa. Tinker sent the car slowly down it. For seventy yards the roadway was hard or stony; then came a patch of dust, smooth and unmarked by a wheel-track. Any vehicle going along the road must have passed over it, and a wave of disappointment submerged Tinker's spirit. He stopped the car and stared blankly at the patch; then his eye caught a curious marking on its surface. He jumped down and bent over it; sure enough, the patch had been brushed and smoothed with a bough.

He hurried the car back to the corner, and by entreaties, persuasion, cajoling, a five-franc piece, and even—great concession!—a kiss, he wrung from the little girl a promise that she would wait till dark, if need were, stop every carriage or motor-car that came past, and say, "The kidnapers have gone up this road."

Then, assured that the hat, set to mislead, had put him on the right track, he turned the car for Camporossa. To his surprise and satisfaction he found this road smooth, and sent the car along at full speed. A mile from Camporossa he saw a cloud of dust ahead of him, and knew that he had the kidnapers in sight. He slowed down, for he did not wish to be seen by them. Then when the dust cloud vanished into the straggling town he hurried on again, for the sun was even now setting, and if they pushed on through the darkness he would have to follow by the sound of their wheels.

He came through the town at a moderate speed. Then, a mile beyond it, as he came to the top of a little hill, he saw the carriage moving slowly down an avenue to a house on the left some hundred yards from the road. He stopped the car with a jerk, backed it a little way down the hill, and from the brow watched the carriage drive up to the house. Then the sun set and the swift twilight fell.



He backed the car into a clump of trees and set out across the fields for the house. Presently he came into a deserted garden, overgrown with rank weeds and unclipped shrubs. He hoped devoutly that the scorpions and tarantulas would await the passing of the sunset chill in their lairs. He pushed through the garden without mishap, and came to the house, a four-square, two-storied building, covered with a mat of creepers, some old-time gentleman's country seat. The near side was dark; from the back he could hear the voices of three stablemen. The front, too, was dark; but on the farther side two rooms were lighted, one on the ground floor, one above.

A clatter of excited voices came from the lower window; he stole to within ten yards of it and looked in. Three men were dining at the table: a fair, red-headed man with the high cheekbones of the Scot, a dissipated young Italian, and a small, round, vivacious man who looked French.

"I'm going to marry the girl, say what you will!" the Italian was crying. "Where would your scheme have been without my aid?"

"Pardon, my dear Monteleone, I am going to marry the girl. There would have been no scheme to help if I had not made it," said the little Frenchman. "I rank first—I ——"

A movement overhead drew Tinker's attention; he looked up and saw Dorothy leaning out of the upper window. He uttered the short click which served them as a signal when they played conspirators or Red Indians. She looked straight down at him, but did not start or answer, and he knew that there was some one in the room with her. The kidnapers still disputed vehemently; and he stole up to the wall and began to climb the vine which covered the side of the house. He disturbed a number of roosting small birds; but Dorothy's suitors were putting forward their pretensions to her hand with a clamor which drowned the flutter of wings. He climbed up and up, and Dorothy never stirred; and at last he looked under her arm into the room. Elsie sat at the table staring miserably at the grim face of an elderly woman who sat on a chair backed up against the door.

THE KIDNAPERS HAD SEIZED THEM ON THE CORNICHE ROAD

Tinker looked at the woman and could scarcely believe his eyes; then he laughed gently, slipped over the window-sill, and said cheerfully, "Hullo, Selina, how are you?"

The grim woman started up with a little cry, stared at him, ran across the room, and began to hug him furiously, crying, "Lor', Master Tinker! What a turn you did give me!"

"Drop it, Selina! Drop it!" said Tinker, struggling out of her embrace. "You know how I hate being slobbered over!"

Then he dodged Dorothy and Elsie, saying, "This is no time for foolery!"

"But I don't understand," said Dorothy.

"Oh, Selina's my old nurse. What are you doing here, Selina? I never expected you to turn kidnaper at your age."

"Nothing of the kind, Master Tinker! I'm paid to help save these poor lambs from them Jesuits."

"You've been humbugged, then. You've helped to kidnap my adopted sister and Miss Rainer, the daughter of an American millionaire."

Selina's face underwent a slow but alarming change. "So Mr. McNiel's humbugged me, has he? He's brought me all the way from Paris by a lie about Jesuits having stolen his young lady, to do his dirty, kidnaping work, has he? I'll kidnap him!" she said thickly, and made a step toward the door.

"Do!" said Tinker with warm approval. "You let him have it! Think you're pitching into me like you used to!"

Selina opened the door and went down the stairs with the outraged majesty of a Boadicea, and they followed her. Tinker bade Dorothy and Elsie unbar the front door, and kept himself close behind Selina. She opened the door; the sustained shriek in which the Frenchman and Italian were conversing died suddenly down; and the three kidnapers stared at her.

"You low, nasty scoundrels!" said Selina fiercely.

"Eh? What? The woman's daft! What's the matter?" said McNiel.

"Don't you woman me, you low Scotchman! You ought to be ashamed of yourself, mixing yourself up with these foreign rascals! You that's had a Christian upbringing!"

"You do what you're paid to do!" roared McNiel.

"Il faut agir!" said the Frenchman; and he bounced in a lithe, overconfident way at Selina.

In a flash she had her left hand well gripped in his abundant hair and was clawing his face with her right. He screamed and writhed; and the struggle gave Tinker his chance. He slipped the key out of the inside of the door, thrust it into the outside; as the Frenchman tore himself away yelling he cried, "Outside, Selina!" strengthened the command by a strong drag on her arm; got her outside; slammed the door to, and locked it almost before the kidnapers had realized that he was there. He wrenched the key out of the lock; Dorothy had just got the front door open; he caught Elsie's hand, and crying, "Come along! Come along!" ran down the avenue, followed by Dorothy and Selina as hard as they could pelt.

Three minutes brought them to the car; he bundled them into it, drove it out of the trees, and set it going hard down the road while Dorothy explained how the kidnapers had seized them on the Corniche Road. They came safely to Camporossa, and suddenly they saw ahead of them the flaring light of a motor-car.

"Here's my father, or the police," said Tinker with a sigh of relief; and sure enough in ten minutes Sir Tancred was shaking hands with Tinker and Dorothy was kissing her father.

It had taken them three hours to get free of the Italian authorities, and they had practically turned the Riviera upside down to do that.

It was past midnight when they reached the hotel. As they were going upstairs to bed Tinker succeeded in keeping Dorothy back. "It's all very well you being the daughter of a millionaire," he said with some severity, "but an employer has his rights. I can't lose a governess who suits Elsie so well, straight off, and I shall expect a month's notice."

"But I've no intention of resigning that excellent post," said Dorothy, smiling.

Tinker thought a moment and then said gloomily, "Your father will never let you be a governess. I suppose you expect me to back you up against him."

"That's just what I do mean," said Dorothy.

Poor Richard Junior's Philosophy

¶ Happiness must be given before it can be received.

¶ There are more failures in Delaware than the peach crop.

¶ A man may be provident and yet not have laid in his coffin.

¶ The medical man is the modern oracle: we swallow all he tells us.

¶ The hard part is not to work for success but to wait for it to ripen.

¶ A smart man is never quite smart enough to get the right opinion of himself.

¶ Some people can think only in bed, but we constantly meet with them in society.

¶ The man who says nothing may not win much but he generally has a popular funeral.

¶ Standing behind a counter is all right, but staying there a lifetime is another matter.

The Sheep and the Shearers

THE Chief of Detectives of New York City says that within the past two years its "get-rich-quick" concerns have, to use their own phrase, "trimmed suckers" of no less than forty millions of dollars. He is speaking only of the concerns that are hampered by the fact that their business is unlawful. They operate by "confidential" circulars.

In these confiding appeals they use flatteries, arguments and inducements that, so one would think, would excite only amusement in any reader having a spark of intelligence. How can the dullest fail to see that the possessor of stock or grain or race-track secrets easily transformable into millions would not invite remote strangers to share with him? How can the blindest fail to see the tongue thrust into the cheek, the contemptuous grin openly leering from the eyes?

Yet there are those who marvel at the unequal distribution of property. Yet there are those who charge that inequality wholly upon our social system.

"Get-rich-quick" concerns, and that whole family of which they are the least "reputable" members, raise many interesting moral and mental problems—some of them amusing, some serious, none so serious perhaps as alarmists try to make them. But deeper than any of these problems lies the question, really and honestly, how many people even of the most intelligent classes are capable of managing and safeguarding their own interests?

About ninety-five per cent. of the men who engage in business on their own account fail—and this was true before the combinations arose. On the average the man who works for some large organizer of industrial energy is vastly better off financially than he who has his own independent business. As for the masses of the gainfully employed, what would become of their savings were it not for the insurance companies, benefit orders, savings banks, building associations—all of them organizations expressly made to relieve individuals of the care of their own affairs?

The capacity to work is infinite and splendid. But obviously the capacity to spend wisely and to take care of a surplus is deplorably defective. The wonder is not that property is unequally distributed; the wonder is that the carelessness, the credulity, the rashness of the overwhelming majority of us does not produce even greater inequalities. Indeed, is not here the clue to conditions usually ascribed to the greed of the few and the inadequacy of the laws?

There are, beyond question, some sinister causes for the rapid growth of large combinations. But is not one cause, and that important, the fact that most men work harder, more steadily, more wisely, more profitably for another than for themselves? They will play at ducks and drakes with their own affairs; they will be careful when their sense of responsibility and their sense of the danger of losing the job are roused.

By all means let us have laws against "get-rich-quick" enterprises and "sucker-trimmers" of every kind, including those in politics, finance and commerce. But—how will that solve the real problem?

A social system can punish the robber—ours does so fairly well once it clearly recognizes him. But how can it restrain the man who voluntarily hands over to the robber his pocketbook or his political rights or whatever he has that he doesn't know how to keep? History is not the story of how robbers have ravaged mankind; it is the story of how robbers have taught mankind, an unwilling pupil, to consent to keep that which it could never have lost except by voluntary surrender.

The time spent in hating and dreading oppressors might be not unprofitably used—in part, at least—in educating one's self to make oppressors impossible. And after one has finished calculating how much the trusts have cost him, he might go on to calculate how much his own folly has cost him in the same period.

When General Hancock said that the tariff was a "local question," every one laughed and his supporters blushed. But we all know now—twenty-two years later—that he was right. Some day some one will make a similar discovery about the social question—that it is not a world problem, but an individual problem.

Only a Few Wars Left

IT IS just a quarter of a century since Beaconsfield at Berlin gave the Turk a new lease of life in Europe, and every winter since that time the political almanacs have predicted an uprising in the spring to complete the work then unfortunately interrupted. The "war-cloud" in the Balkans is a little blacker now than usual, and perhaps it may break at last.

Whatever may happen just now, the country of Alexander the Great is a region of unfailing interest because it is one of the few spots on the globe—perhaps the only one—over which a great war is still a logical probability. Notwithstanding the tremendous competition in armaments it is a fact that war on a great scale is becoming obsolete. Business and humanity combined are growing too powerful to permit the peace of the world to be seriously endangered except for very grave cause. It may be said with confidence that if four unsettled questions were out of the way the idea of a great war anywhere in the world could be permanently dismissed.

The first and most serious of these is the Turkish question. That is almost certain to bring on a collision sooner or later: because Russia considers Constantinople and its surroundings worth a war, because the Turks would certainly fight rather than be driven out of Europe, and the condition of the Christian subjects of the Porte is a cause of war always available whenever Russia thinks the time opportune for making use of it. A war involving Russia, Turkey and the Balkan peoples would be a great one, even if it went no further, and it would be hard for some, at least, of the other Powers to keep out of it.

The second danger point is the far East, where there is a prospect that Japan may sooner or later come into collision with Russia, with possible consequences of which the Anglo-Japanese Alliance gives a hint. The third, where the chance of averting the trouble is much better, is Morocco, and the fourth is Austria, where Pan-Germanism and Pan-Slavism are arousing passions that may overcome the tendency of business and civilization toward peace.

These are the only points at which issues are at stake which the great Powers would consider worth fighting about. Some people might add a fifth possibility—the chance of war in America over the Monroe Doctrine. But if we are well prepared, that is a contingency that need not cause any serious uneasiness. There will be no more great wars except when substantial existing interests clash. All the Powers of Europe have too many troubles of their own on hand to go out of their way to hunt new ones over here.

Hard Times for the Old Man

WHAT is to become of the old man?

During the last year or two the question has been brought before the public by the action of several great business corporations that have retired from work such of their employees as have reached the age of seventy. When their service to the company has been long they have been pensioned.

No pension, however, sweetens the bitterness with which a man with his work in full grip sees it taken from him and put into younger and less experienced hands.

"What can these boys know?" he cries. "These are my methods: I invented that system. What do they know about it?"

But out he goes.

Men of sixty—clerks, superintendents, commercial men, teachers—filled the papers a month or two ago with a chorus of complaints that work was denied them, no matter what their physical or mental condition, simply on account of their age. It is a well-known fact that many congregations refuse to call a pastor who is over fifty. The gray old saint must keep his flock; if he lose it no other will come to him before he dies upon the lonely pastures.

It is a singular fact, however, that such of these old men as have ability of brain or body are always put to some use in their later years. You find few idle old men in this country. And fewer idle old women.

"My grandmother," said one vivacious dame of seventy lately, "at my age had long been relegated to the armchair in the warmest corner. Her one employment was to knit stockings. The family tenderly watched and waited on her. She was sound in health but invalided by the fact of her age. Nobody looks after me. I am always frightfully busy. This morning I must make up the accounts of a charitable club of which I am treasurer; this afternoon I am going to tell my Current Events class of my trip down the Volga last year and what I know of the Russian Jews. To-morrow I run down to Washington to talk X. into giving Jem's boy a Consulship. X. and I had a flirtation fifty years ago."

Now the same cause accounts for the cruel shunting aside of the seventy-year-old officials, for the employing of them in odd jobs, and for the merciless picking of every live grain out of all worn-out old brains.

It is the Dominion of the Whole over the Unit: the crushing out of the individual by the Juggernaut Community. The country is advancing on its triumphal way to prosperity. But are we trampling down nothing which is nobler and of more value than prosperity?

Can we afford to lose out of life the calm, the significance of leisurely old age? Are no sounds silenced by the thunder of marching feet, sounds which the world can ill afford to lose?

The Cost of Fuss and Feathers

A RICH man, who has made his money by the handling of other men and who enjoys a large reputation for getting results from his employees, was asked the other day what he considered the most costly waste in business life. "Fuss and feathers," he said.

Brown has big ideas. There is no reason in the world why he should not make good—none except fuss and feathers. By the time he gets through talking about his plans and advertising his details somebody has done the work and got the profit.

Lamont, the humble reporter, did good service quietly. He asked few questions, said little, went ahead. Cortelyou, the unknown stenographer, grasped his duties, performed them and won a Cabinet portfolio. The men of fuss and feathers wondered why they did not do as well.

Modern business is swift. Its orders do not admit of debate or explanations. A word may mean a full day's toil. The president or manager talks in snappy sentences—each means a task. The employee who understands and does the work without questions gets the next promotion.

To a real man of business nothing is more annoying than "How shall I do this?" or "Do you think it ought to be done this way or would you prefer it some other way?" or "I beg your pardon, but I want to be very sure that I caught your exact meaning."

Fuss-and-feathers men think they score by impressing their own importance. They don't. Modern business is argus-eyed. It watches its men keenly, weighs their usefulness, judges by results. Time taken in talk is time taken from work. Modern business uses a stop-watch in the close race for success.

GHOSTLY COUNSEL

Copyright, 1903, by John Watson. Copyright in Great Britain

WHEN it came to Parker's turn to tell his experience he showed some desire to escape his obligation, which was most unbecoming conduct in our only man of business.

"You see," he explained, "I am not a soldier who has had adventures, or a writing man who has got imagination; till five years ago I was a corn merchant in Liverpool and spent my time in the rather exciting but also very prosaic occupation of buying wheat if I thought it was going to rise and selling it if I thought it was going to fall. My capital was not large and the market was apt to play the fool with the wisest — my wisdom was not monumental — so that from time to time I had bad luck, and once at least I was in a tight place. If it came to adventures on the market, and the romance of success and failure in speculation, I could tell some rather interesting yarns, but the corn exchange does not suggest the unseen universe. I think our only point of contact with the supernatural is our futures, which are sometimes shadowy enough and occasionally haunt a man with far more terror than any ghost."

"Quite so, Parker," said our host, "but you left corn and you have been living in that country house of yours which looked like a hotel for ghosts with its secret staircases in the wall, its hidden door in the panels, those lonely rooms in the tower, and that vault beneath the dining-room. Come now, own up. Has not some Laird of the past dropped in when things were quiet to see what kind of man had succeeded him? Has nothing happened at Glasclune?"

"Nothing," said Parker; "I give you my word, and I confess that I am rather disappointed, for I thought that some antique of the past with a troubled conscience would have turned up to confess his sin and add a fancy value to the property. The place is absolutely unromantic in spite of its holes and corners, and my life, after the excitement of the corn market, has sunk into dead commonplace. Golf in the daytime, and a little shooting in season, and in the evening I potter among my books and engravings, which were always my by-occupation. Very uneventful, really: I think you had better call on the Doctor."

"Well," said the Barrister, "if you have nothing to tell it's not your blame, and we don't want barefaced inventions, but country houses have not got a monopoly of ghosts. Some curious things have happened in London chambers, or else two or three of my friends have been uncommon liars; and I have often wondered if nothing strange occurred in those gloomy piles of mercantile offices. I remember, when I was on circuit at Liverpool, going down late one night to have a blow on the landing-stage after getting up a very heavy brief, and I was struck as I came back through your corn streets with their solitude and weirdness. There did not seem to be a soul living in the whole quarter, and I could see passages opening into courts behind, and black entries where there might have been all kinds of shadowy figures. I went down one passage and found myself in a well with offices rising up high on every side, a few hours ago full of life and now silent as the grave. Then suddenly a light was turned on in a room on the third floor, and the eeriness of the situation was complete. Was it a burglar who was trying the safe and felt secure in that lonely place at that early hour of the morning? Or was it a merchant who had grown uneasy about his accounts, and had come down to see whether he was solvent or bankrupt? Or was it some cashier who was manipulating the books and carrying on a cunning fraud? Or was it a merchant who had died years ago and was drawn back to the scene of his former business? Do you know I've never forgotten the impression as I stood in that court with its dim light — for the moon which had been faintly shining on the river had gone under a heavy cloud — and looked up to that room with its mysterious occupant? But I beg your pardon; this is not 'my funeral,' as the Americans say. I've told my story already. Seriously, though, does nothing ever happen in those offices except contracts, and does nothing come in except sample bags?"

Barristers have certainly got a way of extracting the truth, and that turned out to be a very successful cross-examination, in a quite informal fashion, for, whatever might be the reason, Parker was distinctly caught by the graphic night scene and surrendered suddenly at discretion.

"No wonder," said Parker, looking at the Barrister resentfully, "that witnesses break down when you take them in hand; your way of touching on other people's secrets comes near to witchcraft. Well, it was not churlishness that kept me silent, or any suspicion that you would give me away, but simply that the story I must now tell is quite incredible, and you will be entitled to conclude either that my brain was heated through the anxiety of a business crisis or that I had been asleep and dreamt what I supposed happened. The only evidence beyond my own testimony that I can bring forward is Glasclune and my retirement from business, for I had never blossomed from a struggling corn merchant into a modest Scots Laird had it not been for a midnight experience in that very quarter the Barrister so graphically described.

"Personal biography is of no use for our purpose, but if it won't bore you I had better tell you my history, and explain the state of my affairs when the incident happened. My father and mother died in my childhood and I was brought up by a guardian, with whom I lived through my boyhood, but who left Liverpool and ceased to have any responsibility for me when I came of age. As I did not know what I wanted to be, and only found out when it was too late that the one thing I cared for was the army, my guardian, in the plenitude of his wisdom, apprenticed me to a firm of corn merchants, because, as he said with considerable common-sense, people will always want bread, and there must be corn merchants to import the material. Five years I served my time, and I came to know every turn in the rabbit warrens of offices and something about most of the firms. When my time was up the firm, which managed to do a large business on the economical working staff of a cashier, a bookkeeper, an office boy, and seven apprentices, gave me to understand that in allowing me the run of their office and securing from me at least three years' good clerk work, they had done all which an enterprising firm of corn merchants could be expected to do for an apprentice, and that I must secure a situation for myself. As no situation turned up after six months' waiting, and I was now in possession of my very moderate inheritance, my guardian suggested that I should start in business for myself, and secure a senior partner who had large experience and no capital. For three years we worked together, and at the close it had come to pass that I had a very considerable amount of experience and he had all the capital. Our partnership was then dissolved, and he took what business there was into another firm, where he flourished still more abundantly and I was left to look after myself.

"I could not start business on my own account without capital and no one seemed particularly anxious to have me as a servant — at least, there was no frantic enthusiasm in that direction — and had it not been for a certain strange character in the corn market I should have emigrated, or if I had not been too old should have enlisted in a cavalry regiment. But one day, as I was hanging about the street feeling very much down on my luck, some one gripped my arm and I found myself in the clutches of Mr. James Peebles, only partner in the firm of Peebles & Co., who described themselves as corn brokers, and had been about forty years on the market. Mr. Peebles, or 'Jimmy,' as he was known by everybody, and called by most people to his face, was a Scotsman of extraordinary keenness and equal penuriousness. Unmarried, he lodged somewhere in two rooms, dined on a shilling a day, and had amassed a large fortune, which it was understood would be carefully and justly divided, with remarkable provisions against squandering, among a clan of relatives in the hard-headed county of Fife. He was dressed as usual in the shabby gray suit of antique cut which it is certain he had worn for ten years and without which he could hardly have been recognized in the city, and had the familiar stick in his left hand — for he was slightly lame — with which he tapped himself up and down stairs, in and out of offices, and through the Corn Exchange, ever been forgotten or lost no one would have believed in his identity. The sound of the stick was the signal that 'Jimmy' was coming, and the stick itself he used to emphasize his points as he laid down the law on 'futures.' For 'Jimmy' was not really a broker going between merchants, nor was he a merchant himself, but he was a pure, unadulterated speculator, naked and not ashamed. He had one factotum in his office — another Scot almost as curious as himself, who kept the office open and managed such books as 'Jimmy' required. 'Jimmy' never wanted to see any corn and never really possessed any except on paper. He bought for the rise and he sold for the fall; he made his money between the turn of markets, and his foresight was almost superhuman. It did not matter what operations they were carrying on in America, or what surprises they might spring, how disordered the market at home might be, or how sluggish, 'Jimmy' had a scent for what was going to happen, and gathered gain in all kinds of weather. Many a firm in past days had tried to secure his services, and had offered him the most tempting terms, but 'Jimmy' preferred his snug little office of two rooms on the ground floor, at the back of Simpson's buildings, and his independence of speech and action.

"'Weel,' said 'Jimmy,' 'it's just about the time when I take my midday bite, and if ye have no operation in hand, and don't object to share a brandered steak with an old man, we'll step round the corner to the White Horse,' at which ancient eating-house 'Jimmy' had filled a corner at 12:30 for more than a generation.

"'Ye've had hard times, Parker,' said 'Jimmy' when we had broken on the steak, 'and I've been sorry for ye. I've been watchin' ye — there's not much I don't know. There was no man to guide you, and your partner was a verra clever man; maybe too clever as he'll find some day. Your money's gone, I'm judgin', and you've nothing to start with, just so! Weel, I like your appearance, and I count that ye've more brains than they think on the street, though maybe not so much as your late partner, who has one of the biggest low-class, second-rate brains I've ever lighted on; in short, I want to make a proposeetion to you,' and 'Jimmy' was so expansive that he broke his usual rule of never drinking anything, intoxicating or non-intoxicating, except water, and ordered some beer. 'Naebody knows what I'm going to tell you, and ye will be pleased to keep it quiet, but I've resolved to give up business and go back to Fife, for the doctor tells me my course is run. Morrison retires at the same time and he's settling down at Auchtermauchty, where he'll give them trouble in the kirk, if I'm no mistaken, for the rest of his natural life; and, as ye know, there's no business to dispose of. Na, na! The business of James Peebles & Co. begins and ends with me and Morrison, and the office is no what ye call palatial, but it was enough for me and I've a lease o' it for five year. I've never believed in charity, for it just helps wastrels, and if ye want a kirk ye must go to Scotland, but I've taken a notion of doing one good deed before I retire, both ways, you know; it will be my last "future."'

"By this time I was listening with amazement to 'Jimmy's' announcement and imagining the excitement on the market when 'Jimmy' should close his last account.

"'What I have to propose is this: that ye take over the office at the present rent, which is moderate, and that ye do what business ye can, buyin' or sellin' as ye judge the wind to be blowin', for broking is only scrapin', and a merchant, it's no use without a big capital; and Parker, my man, ye'll say nothing aboot it to any livin' soul, for every hospital in Liverpool 'll be after me afore I get out of the city, but I'll start you with a thousand pounds.'

"Within three months I was established in 'Jimmy's' office with a young lad as my solitary staff, and was trying my hand with 'futures.' Unfortunately, it was one thing to succeed to 'Jimmy's' room and another thing to be heir to his acuteness; and before the year was over I had lost most of my little capital and began to be in deep water. The market was in that state that if a man really could discover, which he must do by instinct, which way the tide was going to run he could make a fortune. It seemed to me as if I was more likely to lose the few hundreds that were still left. One day I took my courage in both hands and bought heavily, so that I stood either to win several thousand pounds or to be hopelessly bankrupt. As I sat alone in my rooms that evening I fell into a panic, and indeed I may frankly tell you men, I've never had either the nerve or the brain for the corn business, and you will understand to-night how I've come out so well. As I knew that I could not sleep, and as I had in my office a mass of papers containing reports of the American harvest and statistics of the corn held in store there, and prophecies of the demands and supplies throughout the world and suchlike material on which speculators work, I determined about eleven o'clock to go down to the office and thresh out as best I could the question of policy. The corn quarter was certainly a lonely place when I arrived about twenty minutes to twelve, and I almost hesitated to go into the office, but I laughed at myself as I unlocked the door, for there is not a safer place or a quieter than an office at midnight where there is no jewelry to rob, no securities worth having. I sat down at my table and now I shall describe the place as far as is necessary.

"It consisted of two rooms, both looking upon the court behind. One room opened into a passage leading to the street, and was the office; my room opened out of that, and it had a door into another passage, but this I never used, and it was permanently locked. From where I sat I could see the court in daylight and the footsteps of any one crossing were quite clear, and indeed resonant. For a little I felt ill at ease, for no other reason than simply the remembrance that there was not a human being in all the buildings around, but after I had settled down to my work and had finished a comparison between the visible stock of corn in February of that year and the amount in February of the year before, and had fairly plunged into the ratio between the stock of corn and the price of corn in the different years at the same date, I was quite indifferent whether the offices round me were full or empty. I had just laid down my pencil in order to digest the figures when . . . there was a crash in the outer office, the door of which was open and into which from where I sat I could not look. What could have happened in a room which was certainly empty, and a moment before was as still as death? I crossed the floor, scratching a match as I did so, for I could not afford to have electric light, which was then being introduced. Certainly there was no one in the room. When I lit the gas the explanation of the noise was evident: a large book in which my lad had been pasting extracts from trade journals, and which he had left on a standing desk, had taken into its head to move, and after, I suppose, some futile attempts during the evening had succeeded with the effect of a demonstration at half-past twelve. Why a book which has lain quiet for several hours will at last make for the floor, and why books do not stay still but are perpetually in motion is a problem I have never solved. My experience of books is that unless you have them securely fastened they can't be kept quiet. I locked that book up in a cupboard and went back to my figures, but the interruption had shaken my nerves; and I was conscious of listening, and as soon as you begin to listen at half-past twelve in an empty building you are bound to hear something. One minute it was the gurgling of a water-pipe which seemed to be chortling over my anxiety, another it was the scurrying of some mice which had got in from a neighboring sample room, the third it was the moaning of the wind through a ventilator, which was, of course, bewailing my approaching downfall, and the fourth was the closing of a door which had been left open in some cellar, and whose clang echoed up from below.

"Better to go back to work and finish my calculations, then a walk home through the keen winter air to brace me up. Really, I said to myself, I am getting childish, for now I started at the sound of a step in the passage into which the outer office opened and jumped out of the chair, when there came a loud and imperious knock on the outer office door. Who could be in Simpson's buildings at this preposterous hour, and what did he want with me? When the knock came again I went through the office, and standing carefully within the locked door demanded 'Who is there?' 'Open the door' was the answer with 'the police,' and in an instant I was face to face with a constable, lamp in hand, who had seen the light at that unusual hour and wished to be sure that no mischief was being done. When I had satisfied him with thanks for his vigilance and a trifle for his trouble, and his steps had died away across the court down an opposite passage, I felt more nervous than ever and lonelier. Hurriedly finishing my review, and leaving it for the open air to decide upon my course next day, I had risen to put on my coat when I heard coming, as far as I could judge through the passage by which the constable had left, and entering upon the court, a step I knew well, which indeed was different from any other man's. It was not only the sound of a foot, but the tap of a stick. Was my mind failing, or had sitting in 'Jimmy's' office filled me with imaginations, for I could have sworn by the sound that 'Jimmy' was again among his old haunts. Under an irresistible impulse I turned out the gas and went over to the window. Some one, and that was all I could see, was certainly crossing the court in the direction of our office, and the tapping grew every moment more distinct.

"Why, of course it would be 'Jimmy.' Three days before I had written to him and asked him his opinion of the market, for although he communicated with no person and did no business, but was understood to be working a small farm, I knew he received every paper and report in the department of corn, and that the old warrior would always keep his eye on the battlefield. I was careful not to tell him that I was anxious, lest he should think that I was simply begging, but simply gave him news and invited any suggestion he might make. He had not replied and I was beginning to conclude that he did not wish to take any responsibility. I was not astonished, for 'Jimmy' was not likely to involve himself in a hazardous campaign with which he has nothing to do, but I did feel that after his kindness he might have given me a word of advice. I had done the old man an injustice, for now it was plain that instead of writing he had come up in person to Liverpool, and no doubt, in keeping with his policy of secrecy, had arrived by the last train about twelve o'clock. Then, having learned at my rooms where I had gone, for I had told my landlady lest she should be alarmed, he had been nothing loath to follow me down to the old place. He was just the man to enjoy a visit incognito, and I felt grateful for his trouble.

All this flashed through my mind as the dim figure crossed the court, and before the tapping had actually come to our side I had reached the office door to bid 'Jimmy' welcome, but when I opened it there was no one in the passage. I looked up and down: no 'Jimmy.' I went out to the court, no sound there, and so far as I could see no person. Then I went back to the office and when I entered my room the first sight I saw was 'Jimmy' sitting in his own chair at the table. Of course, I had forgotten the door from the other passage into the private room, and I remembered now that 'Jimmy' used to reach his room that way when he did not wish to show himself on the market lest he should be questioned, and in order that Morrison, who tasted freely but told no lies, might be able to say that he was not in. He was dressed in the old suit and looked haggard, as if fatigued by his long journey, and did not encourage any salutations but plunged at once into business.

"'Your letter came when I was . . . engaged and I did not get free till to-day, and now I've come to tell you to sell to-morrow and go on selling till ye hear that Jeffrey of Chicago has begun to buy. Close your accounts then, laddie, and ye'll be a rich man. Bring me your books.'

"When I returned into the office with the ledger 'Jimmy' was gone, having left by the private door of which he had evidently kept a key and which he had locked after him. When I hurried round by the other passage I could not find him in the court, and when I went through to the street he was not there. There were many ways by which he could elude me, and when next morning he did not appear at my lodgings I was not greatly surprised, for it would only be like 'Jimmy' to come and go in mystery. I followed his advice during the day, and in the evening stood to win a considerable sum, for the market still was falling. Before I went to bed I wrote him a grateful letter, thanking him for his infallible advice, but scolding him for not letting me thank him, and the morning following I received a letter from Morrison which I can give verbatim.

My Dear Sir:

Your letter came four days ago and was read by Mr. Peebles. He intended to answer it at once, but had a stroke two hours afterward, and never said anything again which we could understand. We thought that he was troubled about the letter, but he could give no directions. He died last night without pain at a quarter to one, and I thought it right to inform you, as he always used to speak in kindly terms about you.

"How it came to pass I do not know, but what came to pass, so far as I saw, I have told you, and I had so little doubt that somehow 'Jimmy' had been anxious to help me that I continued selling even when others were afraid to do anything, till one day news came from Chicago that Jeffrey was again a bull. From that hour I never bought or sold a single bushel, but wound up my business and invested the proceeds in Glasclune and some railway stock, and am fairly comfortable with the proceeds.

"Before 'Jimmy' left Liverpool we spent an evening together and he declared his intense satisfaction with his business life.

"'I'll no deny,' he summed up, 'but that corn is a grand business if ye're sure how the market's going. I doubt that Pittenweem'll be wearisome, and I'm feared at times that I'll not be at home in the next world itself unless I'm allowed to try just one operation.' And 'Jimmy' accomplished one on the largest scale."

MOONRISE

By Herman A. Webster

There was a wild bird singing soft and sweet
From tangled thicket dim. All else was still.
Across the valley where the Whippoorwill
At dusk with silver'd note was wont to greet
The sable night, the day with laggard feet
Had crept to rest behind the purple hill,
And with long arms outstretched the lonely mill
Hung like a huge gray shadow o'er the wheat.

Hushed was the cricket's voice — the beetle's droon —
Even the night-wind as it whispered by
Was stilled; yet from a thicket, shade-enfurled,
There was a wild bird singing to the moon
Low on the east horizon, where the sky
Wrapped in its jeweled depths the listening world.

Soul Sonnets of A Stenographer

BY S. E. KISER

I

I wonder if 'twould be a sin if I
  Should think sometimes how pleasant it would be
  If what another has should come to me?
I've never really hoped that she would die,
But if she has to go I wonder why
  I might not take her place? They say that she Has such an awful temper and that he Can't even smoke except upon the sly.

He's worth at least a million—what a pile!
  I'm sick of writing "Gentlemen" and "Sir"—
  I wonder what he ever saw in her?
She's plain and hasn't got a bit of style;
  She has to hide her neck with lace or fur,
And, oh, her voice! It rasps just like a file.

II

I don't wish harm to come to any one,
  But for a week past she's been very ill,
  And if they took her out there on the hill
To lie at rest, and he should, when he's done
The proper thing in mourning, cease to shun
  The pleasant paths and wanted me to fill
  The vacancy she left, I'd gladly will
Away this old machine I have to run.

He must be fifty, may be fifty-five,
  His forehead, like the crab, is going back;
  The skin around his chin hangs rather slack;
But fifty-five is nothing. Sakes alive!
  At that age men are in their prime, they say,
  Or very little past it, anyway.

III

Ah me! how sick I am of all these hooks
  And foolish curlycues I have to write.
  They come to wriggle through my dreams at night,
I'm haunted by the ghosts of copy books:
Life's nothing but a lot of curves and crooks—
  And yet it could be, oh, so sweet and bright
  If things would only happen as they might,
With Fate's approval, ere I lose my looks.

The days might all be sunny days and glad,
  The troubles that I have might disappear,
I might forget the sorrows I have had
  And give up making hieroglyphics here—
I'd stroke his dear, bald head when he was sad
  And gladly cheer him when he needed cheer.

IV

I wonder if I really am fair,
  Or if my fancy only tells me so?
  There are no wrinkles on my brow, I know,
And there's a silky gloss upon my hair:
My arms are plump and white, and I can wear
  A waist without a collar and cut low;
  Upon my cheeks there's just the faintest glow
Except when blushes come to gambol there.

The shoe clerks wonder at my little feet;
  My nose, save when it's cold, is never red;
I'm certain that my figure's trim and neat,
  And those to whom I've been engaged have said
My mouth was very beautiful and sweet—
  But what's the use, alas! She isn't dead.

V

There's Roberts making eyes at me again;
  I wish that he was rich or stood in line
  To get a fortune. Wouldn't it be fine
To just give up and learn to love him then?
I can't help feeling sorry for him when
  His sad eyes turn so longingly to mine;
  By giving just one gentle little sign
I might make him the happiest of men.

He's handsome and he's polished, but, oh dear!
  He has his widowed mother on his hands
    And men need something more than polish, too.
He'll never win importance working here,
  For those who win must boldly make demands
    To be rewarded for the things they do.

The Heroism of Surrender Peaslove—By Joe Lincoln

"DOWN WENT THE SUSIE B. LIKE THE R'YAL GEORGE IN THE READIN' BOOK, 'WITH ALL HER CREW COMPLETE'"

HOW HE SAVED THE CREW, AND THE CAPTAIN, TOO, TO P'IZEN SHARKS WITH THE COOK

"WAIT a minute, Lem," said I. "Fair play, you know. I didn't hear the beginning of the yarn; you'll have to go back and start over again."

The assembled company in the fish-house grinned, and Lem Mullett swung his big red boots off the mackerel keg and turned to me.

"Oh! how air yer?" he said, holding out a sunburned paw and smiling expansively. "Tain't nawthin' much. I was tellin' the boys 'bout old Cap'n Beriah Sanders and the Susie B."

"Yes," said I, "that's what I'm waiting to hear about."

Lem smiled again, bashfully, and looked at the oilskins hanging on the wall, as if for inspiration.

"Wall," he began, "Cap'n Beriah, he used ter live in that big red house down yonder on the lower road. He was a great pompous kind of chap and had been on salt water ever sence he was twelve year old. He'd served in the merchant service and in the navy, and on land, fer a spell, in the Mex'can War. The Mex'can War was his pet. Git the old man started on that and he'd talk the feathers off a chicken. 'Cordin' ter his tell there never was another war like that one, ner any soldiers so brave as them that fit in it. Somebody's hist'ry of that war and the Old Farmers' Almanac was the only books he ever read, and he carried 'em with him wherever he went.

"There was one soldier in partic'lar whose praise he was ferever singin', and that was Philander Newcomb—Winfield Newcomb's dad. Beriah used ter swear that he see Philander, at the battle er Bueny Visty, pick up a Mex'can bombshell that had jest dropped in the ranks, and light his pipe at the fuse. That was the end er the yarn when he fust used ter tell it, but he kept addin' trimmin's till it finished by Philander's heavin' the shell back at the Mex'cans and killin' forty of 'em when it busted.

"Philander died years ago, and, after a spell, Beriah done what he called 'retirin' from the sea.' That is ter say, havin' consider'ble money, he quit goin' long v'yages. But as fer his leavin' salt water fer good, yer might 's well expect a duck ter quit swimmin'. He bought a leetle schooner, the Susie B., and used ter go short fishin' trips along the Cape Cod coast here. It never made much odds ter him whether he caught anything er not; 'twas the idee of havin' men under him and bossin' a vessel's deck that he was after. He had a daughter Elviry and she's reelly the beginnin' er this yarn.

"Elviry was a purty gal with a good deal of her dad's temper and a will of her own. Most of the young fellers 'round here was after her, but she never cared two shakes of a lamb's tail fer any of 'em but Surrender Peaslove.

"Hey? Yus; Surrender Peaslove. Sweet name, ain't it? He was the son of 'Bijah Peaslove. He was born the day that Lee gave up ter Gin'ral Grant, and the old man called him Surrender in honor of the affair. Takin' a mean advantage of the poor defenseless young one, I call it.

"Wall, sir, Cap'n Beriah Sanders was the maddest man on the Cape when he found out that Elviry cared fer Surrender. He fairly jumped and bellered.

"'Peaslove!' he says, 'Peaslove! Ain't that a name ter swap Sanders fer! And if Peaslove alone ain't bad enough, jest tack Surrender on ter the front end of it. I tell you what, Elviry, if that swab with a Feejee name hangs around here any longer I'll—I'll keelhaul him. I will, by Zachary Taylor!' When the old man was specially wrought up he'd allers swear by somethin' er somebody connected with the Mex'can War.

"Wall, he made a mistake when he took that tone with Elviry. She said she liked Surrender and she'd marry Surrender, and if his name was Soup-kittle 'twould be jest the same. The old man tried a new tack.

"'Now, Elviry,' he says, 'don't bring yer father's gray hairs in sorrer ter the grave by marryin' a coward. Yus, he is a coward, too! Where was he when the burglars broke inter his father's house? Up ter Boston, by Santy Anna! and left his pore old father 'n' mother ter be scared purty nigh ter death! Here's Winfield Scott Newcomb beggin' of yer—jest pleadin' of yer, as yer might say—ter marry him. Think of it! The son of a man that lit his pipe at a bombshell and then killed a hundred Greasers with it. And you're tryin' ter throw yerself away on a cowardly puncheon with a name that would scare a puffin' pig.'

"But 'twan't no use. Elviry said Win Newcomb was a big blow-hard, and she was sick er hearin' 'bout Philander and the bombshell. Said she wished he'd blowed himself up instead er the Mex'cans. That was next door ter sacrilege with Beriah, so he vowed he'd lock her up in her room until he got back from his next fishin' voyage. The Cap'n was pretty cute fer an old codger. He thought a week in her room would, mebbe, change her mind, but ter make things sure he decided ter take Peaslove along with him.

"Yer see, Surrender—though he'd fished some—was a builder by trade, but there didn't happen ter be any buildin' goin' on jest then, and the Cap'n knew it. So he see him down ter the post-office, told him he needed an extry hand on the Susie B., an' Surrender said he'd go. Beriah, er course, never told him nawthin' 'bout the row or her bein' locked up.

"So next mornin' Surrender come down ter the wharf. Cap'n Beriah was allers preachin' dis*ci*pline, and he run the Susie B. in reg'lar clipper-ship style. There wan't only six men, all told, on board, but four of 'em was off'cers. Beriah was cap'n, er course, Win Newcomb was fust mate, Sol Burgess was second mate and cook, I was bos'n, and old Jabez Crow and Surrender was fo'mast hands. Newcomb was fust mate 'cause he was Philander's son and Beriah's favorite. He was a great overgrown ca'f, allers braggin', and everybody but the old man despised him.

"We hadn't got out more'n ten mile when who should walk up from the cabin but Elviry. Bein', as I said, nobody's fool, she'd opened her winder an' climbed out. She'd heard her dad tellin' the housekeeper 'bout his cuteness in takin' Surrender along so she'd got down ter the schooner ahead of us and hid in the cabin.

"Beriah raved and jawed, but it wan't no use, for he dasn't take her back home 'cause he knew Surrender 'd leave when she did. Seems as if every blessed thing went wrong that trip. Fust off, one er the dories bust her towline goin' around Race P'int and was all smashed in the breakers. Then we lost our anchor and had ter put in ter Boston fer a new one, an' Sol Burgess didn't show up when we was ready ter sail again.

"Elviry, she offered ter do the cookin', but the old man wouldn't hear of it. By Monterey, he wan't goin' ter have no woman cookin' aboard his ship! So off he goes on a cook hunt and comes back with a darky waiter that he'd come across.

"Wall, we had a fair wind out and when we was 'bout off Plymouth Beriah called the doctor—that's the cook—and says he: 'I'm sick er this mis'rable restaurant shore grub. You make some scouse and doughboys fer supper and have some duff ter top off with.'

"'Yes sah; some what, sah?' says the doctor, lookin' kind er puzzled.

"'Scouse, doughboys and duff,' roars Beriah. 'What ails yer? Have yer ever cooked on a vessel afore?'

"'Well, sah, I—I was cook on a canal boat once, sah.'

"'Jumpin' Zachary Tay—a canal boat! Gimme a handspike, somebody! Gimme a handspike!'

"The old man went fer the doctor and the doctor went for'ard as if he'd fergotten somethin', scared purty nigh white. The skipper chased him round and round the fo'mast, till at last the cook jumped down the companionway and hid behind the locker where the dishes was. Beriah stuck his head down the hatch and bellered: 'You have a big dish er scouse and doughboys ready by supper-time, er I'll p'izen sharks with yer! D'yer hear?'

"There was more trouble that same afternoon. Win Newcomb, he see Elviry and Surrender havin' a confidential chat, and he went and told the old man. There was a big fuss fer a while and then Beriah sent Elviry down inter the cabin ter stay, and set Surrender ter be lookout up for'ard. He didn't do much lookin' out, I guess, 'cause I see him there, later, readin' the jokes in the skipper's Old Farmers' Almanac that he'd found in the cabin and put in his pocket. Beriah was so upset by the whole business that, by and by, when he had the wheel, he run the Susie B. inter a sandbar with a bump that purty nigh took the sticks out of her. Take it all tergether, he was in a reg'lar fume of a temper when he come down ter git his supper that evenin'. And then there was another rumpus.

"It seems that the cook had been sneakin' round all the afternoon tryin' ter git somebody ter tell him how ter make scouse. Fin'lly, Jabez Crow, he said he'd tell him. Jabez never let a chance fer a joke go by, so he told the doctor how ter make it all right, except that he said yer had ter put a ha'f cup er pepper in it.

"Beriah was mighty hungry and he jest sot down and ladled a spoonful er that peppered scouse right inter his mouth. Hot!

Don't say a word! I'd as soon et a mouthful of coals off'n the fire. Talk about times! Fust thing the old man done was fire the dish at the cook, and it took him right back er the head and busted all ter smash. The darky, all streamin' with scouse, put fer the deck and up the shrouds. He never stopped till he reached the crosstrees. Beriah didn't chase him. He was busy drinkin' a quart er two er water, tryin' ter drown out the pepper. We tried ter git the cook ter come down, but he said he was goin' ter stay up there all night.

"We was 'bout at the inner end er Cape Cod Bay then. The skipper had cal'lated ter put inter Provincetown that night, but all ter once the wind died out flat and a fog come up. We drifted round fer a spell and at last the old man lost patience and yelled: 'Anchor her right here. We can't fetch port and we can't cruise.'

"We'd curtained off ha'f the cabin fer Elviry, so me and Jabez and Surrender agreed ter sleep on deck. Me and Jabez took fust watch, and then we give up ter Win Newcomb and the darky, who, 'fore he'd come down from aloft, made us promise not ter let the old man kill him. I turned in but was woke up by the sound er oars in rollocks.

"I went aft and fust thing I see was Win Newcomb curled up in the lee er the house, sound asleep and snorin' like a grampus. That was how he stood his watch. I guessed what was up and went ter the stern ter look fer the dory. She was gone, and I didn't have no shade er doubt the cook was gone with her. I heard him rowin' off in the thick som'ers, and hollered fer him ter come back, but he didn't answer.

"My yellin' woke up Newcomb, and he come pokin' along and says, sleepy and muddle-headed, 'Who yer hollerin' to?' I didn't tell him, 'cause jest then I noticed somethin' cur'os. The Susie B. had left Boston with purty nigh an empty hold—nawthin' in her but a leetle ice and salt—and she'd been ridin' high and light 's a feather. Now she was settled way, way down in the water. I thought er the bump she'd got on the bar that afternoon and knew this couldn't mean but one thing.

"'Help me off with this hatch,' I says ter Newcomb. We got the hatch off and I swung a lantern down and looked inter the hold. There was a reg'lar Noah's ark flood er water in her, jest as I expected. She'd started a plank when she struck in the afternoon, and rollin' in the swell had opened the leak more, and now she was fillin' like a washtub with a hole in the bottom.

"'Wha-wha-what does it mean?' stammers Newcomb.

"'Means that in a mighty short time the fish 'll have a chance ter square up an old grudge,' says I. I called up everybody and told 'em 'bout the leak.

"'All hands ter the pumps,' roars Beriah, like he was commandin' a man er war.

"'Yer can't pump up the whole er Cape Cod Bay with that thing,' I says.

"'Ter the boats, then!' bellers the old man. 'Women and children fust!'

"'Children are scurser 'n snakes' toenails aboard here,' whispers Crow ter me; 'cal'late he must mean Newcomb.'

"Win sartinly did look purty babyfied. His big fat cheeks was hangin' white and flabby, there was tears in his eyes and, take him all tergether, he was a sick-lookin' critter. I told Beriah 'bout the cook's stealin' the dory, and that made him wild.

"'Who let him git away?' he yells. 'Wan't there nobody on watch? Where was the wooden-headed lubber on watch?'

"'Yer needn't look at me, Cap'n Sanders,' I says; 'yer'll have ter ask Newcomb.' Wall, Win, he stuttered and stammered, but fin'lly got it out that he guessed he must er dozed off a leetle.

"Would yer b'lieve it, the old man never said 'Boo.' If it had been anybody else they'd have got partic'lar fits, but 'twas Philander's son, so nawthin' was said. But I could see that it had lowered Win a turrible sight in the skipper's estimation. Fust off he was fer h'istin' sail and tryin' ter git ter land, but there wan't a capful er wind, and we'd have only drifted a leetle and then gone down jest the same. There wan't nawthin' ter build a raft of, and no time ter build one if there had been.

"'I shouldn't care so much,' says the Cap'n, 'if we could only save Elviry. By Santy Anna!' he whoops, slappin' his leg, 'I fergot 'bout you bein' sech a swimmer, Winfield. 'Member how yer told me 'bout your swimmin' the hull length er Long Pond and back? Wall, if yer can swim fur 's that alone, yer ought ter be able ter swim one mile and carry Elviry.'

"'I'm 'fraid Elviry won't be saved if it depends on Newcomb's swimmin', Cap'n,' I says. 'I've known him ever sence he was so high, and he's allers been scared ter go inter water much over his knees. I don't think he can swim at all.'

"The old man looked at Win, waitin' fer him ter conterdict me, I s'pose, but all he done was hang down his head and look foolish. The skipper see how 'twas and yer could tell that his idol was smashed. 'Wall, then,' he says, discouraged like, 'all we can do is drown.' And at that, would yer b'lieve it, Newcomb bust right out cryin'; yus, sir, blubb'rin' jest like a baby! Say, wan't Beriah disgusted!

"'What are yer bellerin' fer?' he roars; 'where's yer blood? Where's yer Bueny Visty sperrit?'

"Jest then I see Surrender comin' from up for'ard, though what he'd been doin' up there I couldn't imagine. He beckoned ter Elviry, and them two whispered tergether, mighty eager. Beriah walked ter the rail and looked at the water.

"'Seems sort er like a fun'ral, don't it?' he says. 'Seems as if we ought ter sing a hymn, er somethin'. I dunno what's customary fer a feller ter do when he's dyin'. I ain't never had no experience, somehow.'

"'Means he never died afore,' whispers Jabez Crow ter me. It took more'n the prospect er drownin' ter keep Jabez from seein' the ridic'lous side er things.

"'I b'lieve folks usually fergives them that's wronged 'em,' Beriah went on; 'wall, I fergive everybody. No, I don't, though!' he roars all of a sudden; 'I don't fergive that cook. Don't anybody ask me ter fergive him. By Monterey! I'll——' He sputtered on 'bout the cook fer a while, and then he went on a new tack. 'We must die like men,' he says. 'That's it! Elviry, you and yer old father 'll die like men.'

"I didn't pay much attention ter his talk fer I was expectin' the schooner ter sink any minute. I know now how a feller feels when he's waitin' ter be hung. Just then Surrender Peaslove come for'ard.

"'Cap'n Sanders,' says he, lookin' mighty grand and noble. 'I'll save yer daughter.'

"'What?' roars Beriah.

"'I'll save Elviry or die a-tryin'.'

"The old man stared at him a minute ter see if he meant it, but anybody could see he did. Heroism was stickin' out all over him, as yer might say. Then Beriah grabbed his hand.

"'Surrender Peaslove,' he says, 'I've been mistook in you. You've got the most outlandish name on the Cape, but you ain't no coward. No, sir, you're as brave as any man that fit in the Mex'can War—'cept one, and'—lookin at Newcomb—'he had a mis'rable, cowardly Greaser fer a son. You're a hero; that's what yer be! And if yer save Elviry I'll let yer marry her, by Santy Anna!'

"It never seemed ter occur ter the Cap'n that, long 's he was goin' ter be drownded in five minutes he couldn't stop 'em marryin' if he wanted ter. But Surrender didn't seem ter think er that either.

"'How air ye goin' to save her?' said the Cap'n.

"'Why, that's easy, father-'n-law!' he yells; 'all we've got ter do is——'

"But he wan't quick enough. There was a lurch, a frightful bowl from Newcomb, and down went the Susie B. like the R'yal George in the readin' book, 'with all her crew complete.'

"But she didn't go fur. Not more'n a couple er feet. Then she stopped and sort er rolled over ter one side.

"'Jest as I was goin' ter observe,' says Surrender, ca'm as could be. 'Cap'n Sanders, if you'd read yer Old Farmers' Almanac as faithful as I done yesterday afternoon, yer'd know that it will be low tide at 'bout ha'f-past two this mornin'. Likewise, if the rest er you fellers had happened ter remember, like me, that the tide in this part er the bay goes out a mile and a quarter, and if yer'd taken soundin's with a fishline same as I done a short spell ago, yer'd know the way ter save Elviry, and also the rest of us. All we've got ter do is ter step overboard and walk ashore.'

"Wall, there wan't nawthin' ter be said. I know one feller that felt like a fool, and I guess there was others. The old man didn't speak a word till we'd waded ha'f-way ter the mainland. Then he says:

"'Surrender, I reckon you and Elviry's sort er beat me, but p'raps it's all fer the best. Anyhow'—with a sott er contented sigh—'I'll live ter p'izen sharks with that cook yit.'"

Power and Control

These essentials of the serviceable and safe automobile are developed in the Cadillac Automobile through new principles of engineering and perfect mechanical construction. The engine is very compact and very powerful; the transmission gear a triumph of mechanics; the steering wheel very sensitive—and absolute in its control; the brakes reliable under all conditions of grade and speed; running gear and body strong, but graceful. The

The Busy Beaver Brotherhood

A Study in Practical Coöperation

By Hayden Carruth

OLD PERFESSOR BUNKER

THE fortunes of the Busy Beaver Co-operative Brotherhood afforded Mr. Milo Bush a good opportunity for the exercise of his narrative powers. The student of social problems might have wished for more particulars concerning the actual working plans of the organization and less about the ingenious Bunker and the ingenuous Ganderfoot; but Mr. Bush was always averse to supplying information on points in which he took no personal interest, so I can only give the account in his own words as follows:

You see, it was old Perfessor Bunker who interduced the igee into the town and started the thing. A great reader the Perfessor was. A stoodent of history, and a hefty thinker. Used to come into Shanks' and set himself down in a cheer and haul out a book and read for two hours, sliding his finger along under each line and sort o' prying up on the hard words, and never peep for the whole time. Then he'd shut up his book and close his mouth very tight and think—a-digesting what he'd read, he used to say. Then after some time he'd sort o' come to and look around, take a long, sliding pull on his whiskers and say: "My friends, the kentry is going to the dorgs," and get up and walk out. And prob'bly outside he'd meet one of Al Doty's dorgs, and take a kick at it, free and furious, him being dead sot agin dorgs, and generally his boot would fly off, on account of him wearing 'em uncommon roomy for corns, and the dorg would grab the boot and streak it for home, Al being a jovial critter and having 'em trained for this purpose. Which, of course, wouldn't improve the Perfessor's temper, and he would go home pretty mad, taking one long step with his stocking foot and two short ones with his boot foot, the same being cowhide, extra heavy. After which Al would take him the other boot in a wheel-barrer, pretending he could hardly push it, and stopping to rest frequent, and with a small part of his dorgs, say about a hundred and fifty, follering behind. A very fine neighbor, Al was, and if there could 'a' been a tax collected on his dorgs it would 'a' paid the national debt.

Well, the old man said so mighty little and looked so mighty solemn that we made up our minds he must be 'bout the smartest man in the place, and when he did say anything we just listened and took it to heart. One day he shut up his book as yoosial, tested his whiskers and found 'em still fast, and says he: "Friends, the kentry is going to the dorgs." "If that's the case," says Abner Blackmark, "I move that one million dollars be, and hereby is, apporperated to wedge on the kentry's boots." The Perfessor looked around with his mouth shut like a time-lock, and then says he: "Young man, if this is a season for yoomer then I am mistaken. The kentry is going to the dorgs. Something oughter be done." "What's your plan, Perfessor?" says Mark Wallis. "I have give the matter some thought," returns the Perfessor, "and think I have some igees on the subject. It is the dooty of every man, I conceive, to put his hand to the plough." "Correct," says Mark. "The rich," continners the Perfessor, "are growing richer, and the poor poorer. Our Republic is being turned into an oilagarshy. Our legislative halls are the haunt of corruption. Men are bought and sold like cattle. Justice has fled shrieking from our courts, and our jedges, gentlemen, barter their decisions for pelf. Our Constitution, gentlemen, that proudest politercal dockerment framed by the hand of man since the people of England wrung the Maggy

Humorous and Serious

Little imagination is required to believe The Angelus human. It has its humorous side too, in the contrasts it brings to each owner. Here are the first and later orders of two men who are members of the Angelus Music Library. Each member has his choice among thousands of compositions and each can change his music as often as he pleases.

First Man who likes popular music, ordered:
4 Waltzes
4 Marches
3 National Airs
5 Operatic Selections
4 Old Songs
4 Coon Songs

One Year Later
he ordered:
4 From Wagner
4 From Beethoven
4 From Liszt
1 From Handel
4 From Chopin
1 From Bizet
6 Popular Airs

Second Man who has studied music, ordered:
Twenty-four rolls including choicest selections from Bach, Beethoven, Haydn, Chopin, Schumann, Mozart, Mendelssohn and Wagner.

One Year Later
he ordered:
Ten favorites from his time-honored old composers and fourteen of the latest popular selections in the library collection.

The first man keenly enjoys symphonies and sonatas, the very names of which were formerly unknown to him. The other man, who ordered some "stuff" in order to please his children and friends from time to time, now appreciates the fun and swing of jolly music when it is properly played. The Angelus has added capacity for enjoyment to each of these music lovers.

THE ANGELUS
EXPRESSION DEVICES

While the beginner is satisfied at first with merely a loud and soft pedal attachment, he quickly understands the expression devices which are found only on The Angelus, and by means of which the performer subdues treble or bass, accents a note or phrase, retards or accelerates a passage without changing the tempo indicator. Every Angelus music roll is so simply but completely marked that the novice can see at a glance how to play with correct time and expression.

The best music stores will gladly show The Angelus and we will mail handsome booklet free.

Carter from the nobles, is being dragged in the mire and made a door-mat of." He shut his mouth with a snap and looked around. We sot in silence, scarcely breathing. The only sound to be heard was Al Doty's dorgs outside, pounding the sidewalk with their tails in unison, waiting for him to come out.

Well, he talked some more, getting us more and more worked up, and then we asked him what was the remedy. "I conceive it lays in one word," says he; "coöperation. The system of competition has been weighed in the balances and found wanting. Through coöperation and all working for the common good we may struggle back to peace and happiness. Let us start the movement here. Let us form a coöperative brotherhood and work for the common weal." Well, he talked for some time, and the end of it was that we organized the Busy Beaver Coöperative Brotherhood. Everybody went in, and we had one store where we could get things in exchange for orders worth one dollar apiece, one being issued to every man for each day's work, no matter what he worked at, so all would be on a level and there wouldn't be no hard feelings and no danger of an oilagarshy. Winter was just coming on, and there not then being a railroad within a hundred miles, we was shut off from the rest of the corrupt kentry and left alone, a band of brothers.

Well, there ain't much more to tell. All would of gone well, and we would have set an example to the world, if it hadn't been for Ganderfoot. Ganderfoot just come along. We didn't know from where, but I reckon it must 'a' been from the corruptest part of the kentry. He was the biggest man you ever seen, over six feet high, and wide. Had a knobby face and considerable lower jaw. Asked about the Brotherhood, and the Perfessor explained it all. Said it was right in his line. Agreed with everything the Perfessor said. Come in with us, and begun to draw his dollar in scrip every day like the rest of us. The Perfessor was tickled. "He is our fust recroot from the capital-ridden kentry," says he. "Others will foller. We are lighting a torch which will yet inflame the world." Ganderfoot drawed his dollar order every day, and at night he played poker. We seen, alars, when it was too late, how wicked it is to gamble. Ganderfoot always won. He finally got several hundred dollars' worth of the scrip. Then one day, just before a big blizzard, he come into the store and with his dollar orders bought all the flour, and bacon, and beans, and sugar, and pertaters and such things that there was, and took them over to his house, leaving nothing but baking-powder, and saleratus, and kyenne pepper, and lemon extract, and yeast cakes, and breakfast food and such stuff. We looked serious, but the Perfessor said it was all right. "He cannot refuse to sell back such as he does not want at the established rate," says he; "I conceive we are brothers." But the next day when we went to him to get something he cocked up his eye at the ceiling and says he: "Gents, owing to the war cloud in Europe the prices of all foodstuffs have advanced one hundred per cent.," at the same time carelessly leaning on a barrel of flour and making a big gun in his belt obnoxiously conspickerous. We withdrew to the front of the room for a conference. "It is all right," says the Perfessor in a whisper; "it is all right. I expected it. As a practical reformer I have a plan to circumvent the grasping scoundrel. We will issue more scrip unbeknown to him. You go ahead and invest what you've got and I'll go and start up the printing-press." So we went back and Abner says to him: "Of course as business men we understand how these here war clouds play hob with the markets. I'll take a sack of flour at the war price." And he produced a handful of scrip. "Owing to the uncertainty in furten affairs and the stringency in the home markets," says Ganderfoot, again cocking up his eye, "only United States legal tenders is now received." Our jaws dropped, and we filed out and sought the Perfessor and related the circumstances. The old man listened with stern lips; then he sot down and the tears bust from his eyes. "Of course you have a remedy for this also?" says we. "There is no remedy in the world for a man who demands cash money," says he. "I conceive we are done up. The oilagarshy has us by the throat."

Then he bowed his head and motioned for the boy to stop the press.

Three weeks later the corrupt and soulless Ganderfoot left town, taking with him the last cent in the community.

Dear Sir:— Providence, R. I., Oct. 27, 1902.

Mr. Knopf's course in Advertising is by far the most practical and far reaching education that any one could expect. I was under Mr. Knopf's personal direction in the advertising business for a number of years, and I don't believe there is a man connected with the advertising business who is more thoroughly conversant with its details in all its branches. A course in Advertising under his direction is bound to prove beneficial.

"LEST WE FORGET"

Due respect for our departed loved ones demands that we erect ARTISTIC and ENDURING MEMORIALS. Marble has proved an unfortunate failure. Moss-grown, broken and tumbled-down slabs appear everywhere. Some cemeteries now prohibit marble entirely. Granite, too, soon gets discolored, moss-grown, cracks, crumbles and decays. Besides, it is very expensive.

WHITE BRONZE MONUMENTS are cheaper and Infinitely Better. They are strictly everlasting. Rust, corrosion and moss-growth are IMPOSSIBILITIES. They CANNOT crumble from the action of frost.

WHITE BRONZE is far more artistic and expressive than any stone. Then why not investigate it? It has been on the market for over twenty-five years and is an established success. It has been adopted for more than a hundred public monuments and by thousands of delighted individuals in all parts of the country. Many granite-dealers have used White Bronze in preference to granite for their own burial plots.

We have hundreds of beautiful designs at prices from $4 to $4,000. We deal direct and deliver everywhere. Distance is no obstacle. Write us at once for designs and information if you are interested. It costs you nothing and puts you under no obligations whatever. Address the Philippine tariff law. The reports of famine in the islands have been officially verified. There is no doubt that Congress believed that famine exists. The fact that Congress appropriated three million dollars—a mere drop in the bucket, by the way—proves that Congress accepted the facts of the famine. In all the debate on the subject no question was raised on the facts. Industry in the Philippine Islands is paralyzed. Agriculture is almost at a standstill. Practically the only sources of revenue for the natives are the salaries of officers of the Government and the money spent by traders. The price of living has risen. A carriage costs as much in Manila to-day as it does on Lower Broadway in New York. And the standard of living has risen since the American occupation. The simple life of six years ago has vanished. The natives have become ambitious with no industry and no agriculture to thrive on. A plague has destroyed their cattle and a pest has destroyed their crops. All the justice in the world can't prevent famine, and with famine the fairest government on earth or in heaven would have to face rebellion. It is the stomach, and not the heart and head, that has changed the map of the world. Injustice, tyranny and misgovernment are but polite names for hunger. The Congress knew these things. It knew also that those who should be able to give exact information said that the tariff bill proposed by the Republicans would give much relief. If instead of ten million people in the Philippines five thousand were starving in, say, some American State, in, say, Michigan, and a reduction of the tariff would save them, that reduction would come in three days. Public sentiment would crucify the Congressman who voted against it, or who came home with an excuse instead of a result for his constituents. But half a dozen men in the Senate literally talked this measure to death in the interest of a local industry, and no one cares particularly. There is no outburst of popular indignation, and when the Congressmen explain that their industries will be crippled by removing the duties on sugar and tobacco, the mere fact that millions of human beings are threatened with suffering and many with actual death by starvation, while American soldiers will be killed in the political disturbances that must follow, these trivial considerations do not convince the people that the Congressmen have acted unwisely. The nation has not come to the stage of civilization where suffering behind the scene becomes part of the dramatic action. Public sentiment in America is perfectly willing to let men suffer most wretchedly if only they will go out of sight to die. Misery of an alien, and to all of us a stranger people, many thousand miles away, has merely a casual interest, even if that people does happen to be under our immediate custodianship. It will take many wars and much more bloodshed than American soldiers have spilled to bring these people as close to us as the African slaves were to the Yankees, and as the natives of India are to England. Imperial power is a natural human desire; but imperial duty must be a matter of slow growth and moral education. It does not spring full-panoplied in any people.

The Balance-Sheet of the Session

There is, however, every reason for Americans to felicitate themselves on their growth in the proper altruistic imperial spirit. The failure of one bill, however vital, does not indicate that the nation is altogether selfish and entirely incapable of the task of governing dependencies. For the one bill that has failed half a dozen excellent laws have been enacted. At the first session of the Congress that just adjourned enough good legislation was accomplished to balance the failure of the tariff bill, serious as that failure is. The passage of the Philippine currency bill at this last short session proved the Congress wise and just. Indeed, there is no doubt but that since the Spanish war the tendency of Congress has been to rise above petty factional and sectional, and even party, jealousies, and to become a National Legislature instead of a meeting-place of selfish delegates from contending States. Since we have acquired the Philippines as a nation we have taken a somewhat larger view of the world, and consequently our own importance in it has rather diminished. Ten years ago it was the American boast that we could get along without is pre-eminently the ideal furniture for summer homes. Ours is hand-made from designs prepared in our own studios, and each piece possesses strength and durability as well as beauty, and a refinement of style not seen in other furniture of this kind. We are this season introducing several new models, and are now prepared to furnish from stock or make to order, in a variety of colors, Chairs, Tables, Settles, Bedroom and Dining-Room Furniture—in fact, to equip the entire house.

Our stock of Cretonnes, Linen Taffetas, and other fabrics suitable for upholstering this furniture has been chosen with especial care, and our collection of Wall Papers, comprising several new picture series for the hall and breakfast-room, is most complete.

Our illustrated booklet, "Summer Ease," mailed upon request.

BROADWAY AND NINETEENTH STREET, NEW YORK

View of New York City from our Property.

NEW YORK'S MILLIONAIRES

have, in many cases, made their fortunes in New York real estate. Shrewd business men are embracing the same opportunity to-day of securing a share in the tremendous increase of values of desirable property being opened up in the suburbs of Greater New York.

Our property,

GRANTWOOD-ON-HUDSON,

on the Palisades, opposite Grant's Tomb, has already become a beautiful suburb; has macadam streets, flag walks, curb, gas, water, unexcelled sewerage system, schools, churches, etc. Sixty new homes built in two years; more going up now. Only thirty-five minutes to down-town commercial districts.

Lots sold in 1899 for $450. Values have since doubled, and should double again, in the same time. Two-thirds of this property has been sold.

Immediately west lies

where we have made the same improvements as at Grantwood. Large number of new houses, likewise new $7,000. R. R. Station, and beautiful Park, now in process of completion.

Lots at MORSEMERE, $350. to $700. At GRANTWOOD, $700. to $2,000.; as desirable for residential purposes as those sold for same price in Harlem or Bronx (in the upper part of New York City) ten years ago, which now bring from $4,000. to $20,000. each.

EASY PAYMENTS: $15. down and $5. monthly, for lots under $700.

These properties have already proven their profit possibilities; but to demonstrate our faith in their future increase, we will guarantee that if the actual increased value within two years from your purchase is not equal to 15 per cent. per annum on your cash investment we will refund the entire cash paid us, with interest at 6 per cent.

If interested, come to New York and visit these properties. We will pay your railroad fare. But don't delay. Take advantage of this opportunity at once. We strongly advise your reserving lots at once, and thereby secure them at present prices.

Write to-day for full particulars. Testimonials from buyers who have already sold at a profit, photographic views, etc.

Wanted!

SALESMEN AND SALESWOMEN

I want you. How much do you earn? Do you want to earn twice as much?

If you will take time to drop me a line I will send you without charge a book which I promise you will give you a genuine surprise by opening your eyes to something new about your own work. You practice the art of selling. Do you understand the science which underlies that art? It makes no difference what your work is—whether it is selling merchandise or promoting big enterprises, I have something of real and tangible value to offer you, help that is help, that will add dollars—hundreds of them—to your income, that will make you twice the business getter you are. This sounds like assurance, doesn't it? It is. I have the best reason in the world for assurance and that is my success in making inexperienced salesmen good ones and good salesmen better. I have made men and women worth hundreds where they had been worth tens. Do you believe you know all there is to learn about the science of selling? I can teach you something about it that will make you admit that this claim of mine is modest. Are you skeptical? If you will just write me a line my reply will tell you whether I can aid you, individually, or not. Won't you write to me just on the chance that you might learn one thing? I want a word from you now, if you are progressive and believe in growing in knowledge and power in your work. It is not only worth your while, but the two cents you put into the stamp will be the best investment you ever made. Write and test me, now, to-day.

the rest of the world. Now we are proud to be a world-power, and though, as in the case of the Philippine tariff bill, we may fall back to the provincial selfishness of a minor power, jealous of the encroachments of our own wards in our own commerce, yet in the main the legislative acts of the American Congress in treating the new dependencies has been manly and wise. If the upward tendency is to continue the character of the men who go to Congress, and particularly to the Senate, must and will improve. Just now there is no place for a sound political economist or a sociologist in Congress. He would have to be a politician first in order to hold his job; and even if he came from a State that cared for a scholar in politics the scholar would have to be a politician in order to get far in Congress. For Congress is a great log-rolling contest. Sheer brain force counts for little. The man with the best ideas in the world would be insignificant in Congress unless he could help men with power to do unimportant things, and get their help to help him with his ideas.

But if the ideals of the people are about to change for the better in reference to their Congress, their ideals of Congressmen will change, and the whole nation will receive a new birth in the spirit. In so much as politics is dirty, and it is not really very dirty, the dirt comes from the people and their low moral standards in other things than politics—in business, for instance. If a national unselfishness in matters political is developed, it will make the nation squarer in everything and life will be better and cleaner than it is now. This may or may not help the Filipinos. But that is not the real concern. The historian who told of the good Samaritan's deeds never did say whether the man who fell among thieves got well from his wounds. He is of no importance; it is America, not the Philippines, that will be the chief beneficiary or the great loser in this little journey on the international Jericho road!

birds to peck at and not for healthy mortals to enjoy.

"Well, I must go upstairs, put on my dress suit—and look forward to a hungry evening."

Calvé's maid came down into the hotel parlor.

"Madame cannot see you," she said, "but says for you to talk to me—I am the same as madame, you know. I have been with her for years and know her thoughts and her feelings. Whatever I say is as madame would say it—so she begs you to interview me and put her name to it in the paper. I am ready, monsieur, whenever you are." But I begged to be excused.

All things must have an ending. One might chatter on of Modjeska and her husband, the Count Bozenta, and of the lively interest they take in American elections; of Marcella Sembrich and her husband, and how she practices four hours a day, the while he plays the piano for her; of Julia Marlowe's wonderful smile when being interviewed; of De Wolf Hopper's jokes and quips and easy way of taking life and passing time when talking for publication; of Helen Marvin's robust laugh, which she cultivated for a character and which stuck to her ever after; of Robert Edeson's dislike of hauling the American flag in a play—"get the spirit of Americanism in the drama," says he, "but don't haul the poor old flag in"; of John Drew's quilted pajamas, and his saying that if he wasn't an actor he'd as lief be a bricklayer as anything else he could think of, and—well, all things must have an ending.

But the men and women of the stage are precisely like the men and women of the same intelligence anywhere else under the sun. They have their little hobbies, their little tricks of voice, their little eccentricities, just the same as other folks have.

They only differ in one little detail from the rest of the world—and that is, that they're more entertaining. They usually have something to say, know how to say it, and are good fellows through and through—the women as well as the men.

Oddities and Novelties of Every-Day Science

THE UNLADYLIKE LADYBIRD — It appears she has a prodigious appetite for very coarse food.

THAT the San Jose scale, which is one of the most destructive of orchard pests, can be successfully combated by importing and propagating the Asiatic ladybird to devour it, is the discovery made by Government entomologists through careful scientific experiments. This is a matter of great significance to the orchardists of America. These specialists at Washington are now raising this alien species of ladybird (chilocorus similis) for general distribution, during the coming spring and summer, throughout the United States.

It has been discovered by actual count that one of these Asiatic insects will devour over 7000 San Jose scale larvæ in a day. When it is realized that the offspring from a single pair of these beetles number about 1000, and that even a larval chilocorus has a daily capacity and appetite for 1500 scale larvæ, the enormous economic value of the Asiatic ladybird in destroying the San Jose scale becomes apparent. In fact, 1000 adult beetles raised by a single pair would devour in one day 7,000,000 scale larvæ, while the daily repast of the matured brood of 1000 pairs of ladybirds would be 7,000,000,000 scale larvæ. Scientifically propagated, the broods number five annually.

Hitherto attempts have been made to induce native American ladybirds to feed on the San Jose scale, but without success. In leading up to the present discovery eminent entomologists from the United States traveled extensively searching for the original habitat of the San Jose scale. This has been found to be in the northern and northwestern frontier of China. There it was discovered also that its natural enemy is the chilocorus similis, and so when imported this Asiatic ladybird instinctively attacks the San Jose scale.

It is suggested by the scientists who are directing these investigations that the San Jose scale hereafter be called the Chinese scale. It is believed that it was brought to California on Chinese peach trees imported by the late James Lick.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN HEATER—A pocket plant that will protect a man against any extreme of climate.

A STEAM-HEATING plant has been devised so ingeniously compact that it may be attached without inconvenience to a man's body, and yet so effective in its distribution of heat that it will, it is asserted, protect the wearer against the most Arctic-like weather.

This portable steam-heating contrivance is designed not only for persons of frail physique but for all classes. It may become of especial value to those exposed for hours at a time to intense cold, and more particularly still to those who thus exposed have no chance to counteract the devitalizing effect of frigid temperatures.

It is believed by the promoters of this new departure in applied science that a man equipped with portable steam heat will be perfectly comfortable riding in the open air against the severest storms.

The radiators of this portable system of heating are formed of pliant, elastic material,

A Trust Builder in Knee Trousers

ROY DUDLEY is the "Promoter" of a "Trust"

Composed of school boys in a Virginia city. In organizing his "combine" he displayed the energy and ingenuity of a Morgan. His dividends amounted to $38.20 the first month.

A few months ago young Dudley started to sell The Saturday Evening Post. He got permission to call upon the employees of two department stores and from 45 of them secured orders to deliver the magazine. The next day he secured 30 more orders from business men. His chum, "Taffy" Wood, became a little envious and wanted to do the same thing, but young Dudley convinced him that to do so would mean "ruinous competition." Instead, he offered to re-sell copies to "Taffy" and to turn over to him a part of the customers already secured, with the understanding that he would get a certain number of new customers. Then he made the same sort of a bargain with Taffy's younger brother.

Three other boys had started to sell The Post before the "combine" was organized. He asked them to join his combination, but they refused his terms and serious trouble was threatened. Next week Master Roy secured 14 new customers in the territory in which his rival was working. Then he offered to "absorb" his competitor by giving him these new customers, provided he would get some more new ones and thereafter buy his copies from the "monopoly." The remaining two boys "compromised" and started work under Roy's direction the following week.

Then Dudley wrote to the publishers explaining what he had done, and offered to place a standing weekly order for three months, provided no new boys were appointed during that time. Within two months he was selling 350 copies a week. One week he sold a thousand copies. This is the record of a boy in knee trousers, ten years old.

Something like 6000 boys are earning money by this plan. Some are making $12 to $15 a week—all are earning money each week. You can do the same. NO MONEY REQUIRED TO START. We will furnish ten copies the first week free of charge, to be sold at five cents a copy. You can then send us the wholesale price for as many as you find you can sell the next week.

If You Will Try It we will send the copies and everything necessary, including A DAINTY LITTLE BOOKLET in which twenty-five out of more than six thousand bright boys tell in their own way just how they have made a success of selling THE SATURDAY EVENING POST outside of school hours.

$300 IN EXTRA CASH PRIZES will be distributed Next Month among our boys.

and may be worn without discomfort either under the hollow of the foot or at the sides of the ankles in the upper part of the shoe or other footwear. The radiators are composed of chambers or tubes through which the heating medium may be circulated by means of pliant tubes. It is designed that these pipes may be carried within the clothing and may be supported at intervals by elastic bands, clasps or attachments to keep them in place. Radiators attached to the hands or at the wrists are supplied with heat by tubes passing up the back and down through the sleeves of the coat. All the tubes ramify from a heater conveniently attached by straps or suspenders, so as to be worn upon the back near the waist-line.

The construction of the heating apparatus is ingenious. From a central chamber containing a non-congealable liquid, such as a strong saline solution, a pipe leads to a heater, consisting of a coil and a novel form of furnacelike lamp, diminutive and light, yet capable of generating much heat. The liquid, after becoming vaporized, is conducted to the distributing system, and by economic appliances does not escape, but in its work of warming the hands, feet or other portions of the body of the wearer keeps up a continuous circulation, passing back to the central heater and again into the distributing system.

By means of a valve the wearer can control the outflow of heat.

PEARLS FROM FISH-SCALES — How the artificial pearls, now so much worn, are made.

PEARLS are more in fashion to-day, and command a higher price, than ever before—a fact which may have something to do with the increased demand for artificial pearls.

For a long time the process of manufacturing artificial pearls was a secret, but recently it has become known. It was well understood that the pearly stuff used for coating the inside of the glass globules employed was obtained from the scales of a little fish called the "bleak," but the rest of the business was a mystery. It is explained that these scales, twenty thousand of which are required to make an ounce of the imitation, are first carefully washed and then ground very fine in a porcelain mortar. The grinding rubs off from the scales their pearly particles, which, when the mass from the mortar is mixed with water and poured on a linen cloth stretched over a tub, pass through the delicate mesh of the fabric, leaving the rest of the material behind.

The liquid is drawn off into glass bottles and left standing until the pearly stuff has settled to the bottom. Then the water is poured off, and there remains only a silver-white substance of high glitter. On drying it shows as a soft silver-gray powder. This, then, is the material that is to be used for converting the globules of glass into pearls.

The workman mixes the pearl powder with a small quantity of colorless liquid gelatine, and introduces it into each glass globule by sucking it up into a glass tube drawn to a point, allowing a drop to fall into the globule, and turning the latter this way and that until its inner surface is quite covered with the solution. Then he allows it to dry; but to prevent the pearly inner coat from becoming detached from the glass, and also to give the artificial pearl greater weight, he fills the globule with melted wax.

Real pearls, unfortunately, are very perishable, and that is one reason why the imitations find such favor.

A HUMAN FLYING FISH — A modern adaptation of Mercury's winged shoes.

UNHEARD-OF feats in swimming may be witnessed during the coming season.

A Massachusetts man has invented an appliance through the use of which it is hoped that one may half-stride, half-swim through water at a speed and with a facility hitherto unapproached.

The mechanism of the device is simple. Wings constructed of light and durable wood are attached at the ankles to aluminum frames fastened by buckles to the feet of the swimmer.

These wings, whose surface is about the area of an ordinary human foot, are hinged. When the swimmer draws his feet forward the resistance of the water pushes the wings rearward, so that only the edge of the wing is opposed to the forward movement of the body. The moment the swimmer kicks out again the wings catch the water and remain at right angles with the ankles.

It is said that these two pairs of swimming wings so supplement the power of propulsion in a swimmer's legs that he can triplicate his speed without any additional exertion.

The REAL DIARY of a REAL BOY

THE REAL BOY IN MARCH

Mar. 7. When my father was a boy he was the best fiter in this town.

Mar. 8. Beany is mad if enny of the fellers go with Lizzie Towle. she likes Beany better than she does enny of the fellers and Beany ought to be satisfied, but sometimes he acks mad when i go down there to fite roosters with Ed. i gess he needent worry much, no feller isnt going to leave of fiting roosters to go with no girls.

Mar. 10. plesent day. old Si Smiths big white dog and a bull dog had an awful fite today. neether licked and they had to squert water on them to seperate them. they dident make no noise, only jest hung write on to each others gozzles. my aunt Sarah said it was dredful, and she staid to the window to see how dredful it was.

Mar. 18. Father wont let me play marbles in ernest. it aint enny fun dreening a feller and then giving them back. i bet father didnt when he was a boy.

Mar. 25. almost as warm as summer, went to church and sunday school. Beany has got a job blowing the organ for Kate Wells. he only let the wind go out 2 times today.

Mar. 29, 186- The toads has come out. fine warm day. me and Potter Gorham have been ketching toads this afternoon. they sit in the puddles and peep. folks think it is frogs but most of it is toads. Potter got 23 and i got 18.

The Reading Table

Two Children's Essays

With an Introduction By Madaline Snow

I HAVE always been an enthusiastic collector of essays, and the more absurd, ill-spelt and imaginative they are the better I am pleased.

Unusual opportunities were afforded me in the indulgence of this hobby by the unexpected call to take the temporary post of a sick friend who has the sole charge of a small, rural school, situated—but never mind where. I'm sure the public will share my conviction, after perusing the following compositions, that the nursery of such talent as herein evinced is not long destined to go unheard of.

The theme, Birds and Beasts Contrasted, was suggested by myself after a course of reading pertaining to the subject, and was truly a revelation to me of the wonderful amount of knowledge that can be stored away in the cranium of one small boy.

That they are genuine is self-evident from the inequality of style, original spelling and fine disregard of punctuation; and I now present them exactly as they came into my hands, altering or omitting nothing except the names. Indeed, it is unnecessary to invent the schoolboy—he is there!

Birds and Beasts Contrasted

I

Both Birds and Beasts are very useful and very intelligent. They can be trained and in many instances they are trained.

The Horse for instance can be trained to take the bit and to back at the word spoken. Compare this with the Hen, which when its Master says chuck! chuck! chuck! It comes running as fast as it can aided by its wings. Also useful for laying particularly if it is a good regular layer so that its Master can have an egg every morning for breakfast. They also lead blind and when they are with them if anyone touches the blind, they will go for them and teach them not to touch the poor blind man.

Compare this with the dog who has a rough shaggy skin, while the Pigeon on the other hand is like a Woodcock, only different in its colour and egg. Compare this with the Ostrich who is a short neck and a heavy head, so that it often has to rest its head in the sand and then the Hunters cannot see it.

Compare this with the Lion, a sly and courageous beast with a long tail and a tuft of hair at the extreme point. When it cannot find any Giraffes or Kamels or other things to eat it goes to the camp and prowls round round and gives one of its awful roars. When the Inhabitant comes out to see what is the matter with it, the sly treacherous Beast makes a spring and an end of it. It will stand behind a tree till a Giraffe or Kamel comes along and then steps out and fight till one or other makes an end of one or other.

Compare this with the Eagle a sly and treacherous beast, which has a nest stuck up very high on a cliff. It often carries off poor innocent children to its eary. They try to get the poor innocent child by means of men and ladders and ropes and things but in vain always, as the nest proves practically the death-chamber of the poor innocent child. The Mother takes on dredful until she is comforted sometimes by her husband, sometimes by the other men who have helped to rescue the poor innocent child.

sed and done if it was not for the Hunter we would be in a bad way. Beasts are covered with fur and hair and have legs like mortals while Birds have only feathers and wings, though some are web-footed but these cannot fly as high as the others and are called Fouls also sometimes poultry & Game as they are easier cought than those which live in trees. There are also Birds of Prey which are not so much use to man such as the Turkey, Peacock, Ostrich and Eagle which .latter often stands for the United States.

Birds hatch their young in eggs while Animals breed, compare for instance the Cat and the Hen. All Animals that are the most useful to man are called Domestic such as the Horse, Cow, Dog, Hen, Cat, Duck, and Chickens and many others.

Animals are more easy to tame than birds and have more gratful natures, a dog will often save your life and a cat purr when you pet it while a Bird will never come near you unless it is caged. Of these the Lion is King and not so easy to be tamed. Another fearce Animal of which the Hunter stands in dred is the Tiger of which the puma is a specimen but if there were more men in the Country like Our Presdent the Country would soon be rid of these wild and trechorous Creatures.

Of all the Animals the Ape or Monkey as it is also called is the most human and it has now been discovered by a man called Darwin that it at one time descended from man but some people doubt this and it is therefore called the Darwinian Theory.

Doves and Lambs are more alike in temperment both having very gentle natures—it was a Dove what saved the Ark and Our Lord is often seen in Pictures with one of these gentle Creatures in his arms and another on his Head. LEOPOLD W. (Aged 10.)

An American Title

WHILE John Hays Hammond, the eminent mining engineer who has been identified with much of the development of the Transvaal, was addressing the American Society for the Advancement of Science, comment was made on his youthful appearance.

"The fact is," remarked one of his South African colleagues, "that, although Mr. Hammond has long held an enviable place at the head of his profession, he is still in his forties.

"His record is typical of American alertness. His entrance into the busy gold-fields of Johannesburg was marked by a characteristic incident.

"As is well known, the remarkable character and extent of the gold-diggings in the South African Republic attracted thither many men of high standing. On the steamer from Southampton to Cape Town Mr. Hammond's fellow-passengers included many titled Britishers, all bound for the same destination, the Rand.

"Upon arrival there Mr. Hammond found himself waiting his turn in a noble line to sign his plain, democratic name to the hotel register.

"In front of him were a Knight Commander of the Honorable Order of the Bath, a Knight of the Exalted Order of the Star of India, two members of the Order of St. Michael and St. George, two barons and one duke. The letters necessary to distinguish these great personages were imposing, and in one case consumed three lines of the hotel register.

"With much interest Mr. Hammond watched the registration of nobility. He realized that though ability would count in the long run, the possession of a commanding title would give the possessor a considerable start over his untitled rivals.

"When Mr. Hammond's turn came to write his name, he registered:

"'John Hays Hammond, A. R. A.'

"His companion was greatly interested and at the first opportunity asked:

"'John, what made you sign "A. R. A." after your name?'

"'Well, you see, one needs a title in this country.'

"'But what do those letters stand for?'

"'"All-Round Athlete,"' replied the mining engineer.

"Within three months from that time Mr. Hammond's genius had landed him in the position of Consulting Engineer and General Manager for the Consolidated Gold-Fields; and serving under the directions of this resourceful American were half a dozen lords and other gentlemen of illustrious pedigree."

THE TRUTH ABOUT BREAD

From London "Chic"

In a recent issue of Chic, one of the big illustrated weeklies for which London is famous, a writer on scientific foods says: "There was never coined a more delusive phrase than 'Bread the staff of life,' because bread is almost the worst of all foods unless the eater knows all about its properties. It is poison to the man in a hurry."

Here follows a long argument.

"'Why not,' asked the dietic experts, 'do for the bread and other cereal foods what the mastication does so that those whose digestions are enfeebled may be fully nourished, that is, derive every grain of nutriment possible from the food and avoid the discomforts of indigestion, the pains after eating, flatulence, acidity, heartburn and the hosts of evils indicating faulty digestion? Why not prepare a food so perfectly that if it be eaten in a hurry, or bolted, it will be as readily digested as if chewed five minutes?

"To convert the starch in cereals into the form of Grape Sugar which is most agreeable to the stomach and which can be immediately taken up by the system as nourishment is what has been done in Grape-Nuts which, for the reasons I have given, is a far more healthful and nourishing food than the best porridge or bread and can be eaten with advantage by persons with the most delicate stomachs.

"This food discovery comes from America, but widespread recognition of its valuable properties is, to my thinking, much hampered by a name which is meaningless, even to the chemist or dietist. I must confess to not understanding the meaning of 'Grape-Nuts' when I first saw it, but an examination of this food discovery reveals it as one of the most important dietetic advances ever made."

Note:—The name is partly derived from Grape Sugar and the term "Nuts" is suggested by the nutty flavor. The entire word is the registered trade mark.

Literary Folk
Their Ways and Their Work

LITERARY LOG-ROLLING — A nimble and thrifty art of long descent that continues to meet with contemporary success.

¶ Some one ought to write an essay on the never-dying art of the literary log-roller. It is a most ingenious and insistent art, perennial and paying in all the ages, and we have no doubt was nimbly practiced by the hewers of cuneiform inscriptions. We humbly suggest it to our contemporary satirists. Just now it mainly takes the form of commendatory letters to the author from his fellow-craftsmen, and from him extracted, with great sacrifice to his modesty, by the astute publisher to be blazoned on title-pages and in advertisements.

The present controversy called forth by President Roosevelt's letter on "race suicide" indicates what far-reaching results might be obtained by a skillful logman. That letter was written by President Roosevelt to Mrs. John Van Vorst after reading in magazine form, and before its publication in the book, the third chapter of her Woman Who Toils. It was immediately followed by another letter from President Eliot, of Harvard, in which he took to task the graduates for the poor showing they make in matrimony. Both letters were the subject of wide and varying comment. President Eliot had not read President Roosevelt's letter when he published his own. President Roosevelt is too frank-spoken a friend of letters and occupies a position too far removed from the possible benefits of literary log-rolling (and log-rolling is essentially a policy of reciprocity) for any taint of interest to touch his name: the suggestion is not here made that anything but the most straightforward and characteristic absorption in the subject at hand for the subject's sake actuated the impulse which prompted his letter. Furthermore, the book cannot have too wide publicity or too much discussion; it treats of subjects which in an industrial civilization ought to be publicly discussed by every thinking citizen. None the less, it will be interesting to watch what use the observant publisher will make of the opportunities thus instructively unfolded to his gaze.

THE WOMAN WHO TOILS — A valuable record of the experience of two women who studied the facts at first hand.

¶ Mrs. Van Vorst and Miss Marie Van Vorst are two earnest young women who gave up the comforts and leisure to which they somewhat impressively inform you they are accustomed, for the value of a first-hand acquaintance with the condition of their working sisters. Indeed, the solemnity with which Mrs. Van Vorst alludes to the "Parisian clothes I am accustomed to wear," and Miss Marie Van Vorst's itemized account of "the clothes I laid aside on December, 1901," inventoried at $447, spoils a little the first flush of sympathy. But it is the only touch of snobbery in the book. The experience was genuine and the record is valuable.

Mrs. Van Vorst made pickles in Pittsburg, shirts in a country mill town of Northern New York and clothes in Chicago. Miss Van Vorst, who shared her determination and divides the honors of the resultant book, made shoes in two of the Lynn shoe shops and cloth in two of the Southern cotton mills. Both shared the life and dress of their sisters and were by them accepted without reserve or suspicion. Both proposed to themselves certain definite questions which in Miss Van Vorst's case are answered by a direct narrative of conditions observed and emotions experienced, to which with Mrs. Van Vorst is added an element of argument and analysis. What brought girls to the factory and the mill? What was their life outside? Where did they spend their money and their leisure? How can they be helped? Do they need help, or is their condition ideal?

In answering these questions Mrs. Van Vorst's style is the more epigrammatic. It does not follow that her pages are the more

Diamonds ON CREDIT

THERE is only one stage of life—that of extreme poverty—where Diamonds are out of place. The wearing of a Diamond is prima facie evidence of easy, prosperous circumstances. If not of actual wealth. A Diamond is the badge of prosperity, and whether in business or society, a requisite of success. To be successful you must look successful, and to look successful you must wear a Diamond.

The* LOFTIS Easy Payment PLAN

has removed every difficulty in the way of an honest person who desires to wear Diamonds. No matter how far away they may be they have only to make a selection from our illustrated catalogue, and have any Diamond ring, stud, brooch, locket, earrings, cuff buttons, a high-grade watch or other article handed to them at their own door and left for examination. All charges for delivery will be prepaid, and if the article is not entirely satisfactory, your money will be promptly refunded. If you prefer to examine the article before paying any money whatever, we will send the Diamond to your Express office, where, if it pleases you in every way, and is much better value for the price asked than you can secure elsewhere for spot cash, you can make the first payment and take the Diamond. In either case, you will have eight full months for paying the balance in equal monthly payments. Remember, that we pay all delivery charges, and refund first payments promptly on return of the goods within a reasonable time.

We are the largest house in the world in our line of business and one of the oldest (Established 1858). We refer to any bank in America. For instance: ask your local bank how we stand in the business world. They will refer to their Dun or Bradstreet book of commercial ratings, and tell you that no house stands higher in credit, promptness, or reliability, and that our representations may be accepted without question. WE GIVE A GUARANTEE CERTIFICATE with every Diamond; make liberal exchanges at any time, allowing full price paid for a Diamond in exchange for other goods or a larger one. On cash sales we make a most startling proposition. We actually permit you to wear a Diamond of your own selection for an entire year at an expense of less than ten cents per week; then if you wish to return it, we refund all of your money—less ten per cent. Write for full particulars.

You will find our prices from 10 to 20 per cent. lower than those of other houses, for we buy and sell more Diamonds than any other house in our line of business and carry a stock of half a million dollars' worth of loose and mounted goods. Please write to-day for our beautiful catalogue and our booklet which answers every question that you could possibly ask in regard to carriages, goods, terms and system. It is worth its weight in gold to any intending purchaser.

valuable, but they are perhaps the more thoughtful, and certainly the more quotable. Therefore the following passages, necessarily much compressed, are drawn from her chapters. They suggest much better than would a long exposition the nature of the problem and the admirable quality of thought that confronted it.

For example, Mrs. Van Vorst notices immediately the quality of the voices about her. "I can hear the sharp nasal voices of the forewoman and the girls shouting questions and answers. . . . My factory companions draw their vocal inspiration from the bedlam of civilization, the rasping and pounding of machinery, the din which they must outdin to be heard."

Experience makes clear to her the magnetism of the factory. "Two days of leisure without sources of amusement make clear to me how the sociability of factory life, the freedom from personal demands, the escape from self, can prove a distraction to those who have no mental occupation, no money to spend on diversion. It is easier to submit to factory government which commands five hundred girls with one law valid for all, than to undergo the arbitrary discipline of parental authority." Says one girl: "'I don't have to work, only if I didn't I couldn't have the clothes I do,'" The same passion for self-ornament is everywhere. Not love of home nor love of man is so strong. "'I'm not working to save,'" was the claim of one girl for all; "'I'm working for pleasure.'" It is a selfishness which defers marriage and cuts all social and family ties. "'I don't have to work; my father gives me all the money I need, but not all I want. I like to be independent, and spend my money as I please.' . . . It means a youth without the peace of protection; an old age without the harvest of consolation." And it cuts down the wages of the girl who does have to work for a living. It is non-professional competition.

Of a piece with her attitude toward her parents is the mill hand's attitude toward marriage. She "trifles with love," she is "fanciful, sentimental, cold, passionless." Lady Jeune, it will be remembered, attributed much of the success of American independence for American women to the safeguard of this cold selfishness.

Other shrewd observations are plentiful. "There is a stimulus unsuspected in working together to get a job done. Before this" (before going on piece-work) "I had to work to make the time pass." Men she finds are the easier masters. "The woman—is always annoying. She bothers and nags; things must be done her way; she enjoys the legitimate minding of other people's business. Aiming at results only, the masculine mind is more tranquil. Provided you get your work done, the man boss doesn't care what method you take in doing it. For the woman boss, whether you get your work done or not, you must do it her way."

Miss Van Vorst's description of what she saw in the Southern cotton mills cannot here be quoted. None the less it should be read. And of the whole book it may be said: no one can help being interested and only an obstinate man can help being benefited.

A REMINISCENCE OF STEPHEN CRANE

—A single sentence illustrative of the original picturesque working of his mind.

¶ Mr. Gosse, we believe it was, gave the first rule for ballad writers: first find your refrain; and Mr. Thomas Bailey Aldrich once explained in All Sorts of a Paper that he always works through a short story to the end, puts the closing paragraph on paper, and not till then does he write the first word. What was Stephen Crane's method the friend who tells this story does not vouchsafe. Often a single sentence will be the core of a long circle of thought, which at the last moment, and in the fitting spot, will finally throw back to its starting place. Perhaps something of this sort was going on in Stephen Crane's head. He sat at the window, a tall block of coarse yellow scratch paper on his knee, his pencil-point stopped short on the line of the last word written.

The sentence stood large and ungainly on the page:

"He walked as though he were stirring lemonade with himself."

Apparently nothing came of that most delectable inspiration, for it is not to be found in the pages of his work.

Your choice of these Booklets will be sent you, complimentary

"Something for nothing" is a proposition which usually invites suspicion, and justly, too. We have something we want to send you for nothing, but we propose to be perfectly frank with you, and tell you just how and where we expect to receive an adequate return for our expenditure. We have the happy fortune to be the publishers of the late Speaker Reed's unique library of

Modern Eloquence

And we know that if you were to read any one of the 500 brilliant After-Dinner Speeches, Lectures and Addresses found in this library of the World's best spoken thought, you would surely be enthusiastic in your appreciation, and would probably never be quite satisfied until you had placed the complete work in your library. This, then, is the plain reason why we are going to mail you, upon receipt of 6 cents in stamps to cover postage, your choice of the booklets described below. All we ask is that you read the first page and we know you will read the rest. In these Booklets, as in MODERN ELOQUENCE itself, each speech is given in full, just as it was delivered. Please indicate your choice of Booklets on the printed form below and mail to us.

ACRES OF DIAMONDS
BY RUSSELL HERRMAN CONWELL

. . I noticed the lady at the time, from the color of her bonnet. I said what I say to you now: "Your wealth is too near to you. You are looking right over it." She went home after the Lecture and tried to take off her collar. The button stuck in the buttonhole. She twisted and tugged and pulled and finally broke it out of the buttonhole and threw it away. She said: "I wonder why they don't make decent collar buttons!" Her husband said to her: "After what Conwell said tonight, why don't you get up a collar button yourself? Did he not say that if you need a thing other people will need it? So if you need a collar button there are millions of people needing it. Get up a collar button and get rich. Wherever there is a need there is a fortune." (Applause.) That very woman invented this snap-button. That woman can now go over the sea every summer in her own yacht, and take her husband with her; and if he were dead she would have enough money left to buy a foreign Count, or Duke or some such thing. (Loud laughter and applause.)

WIT AND HUMOR
BY EDWIN PERCY WHIPPLE

. . Wit marries ideas, lying wide apart, by a sudden jerk of the understanding. . . Wit exists by antipathy; humor by sympathy. Wit laughs at things; humor laughs with them. Wit lashes external appearances; . . . humor glides into the heart of its object, looks lovingly on the intimacies it detects, and represents the whole man. Wit is abrupt, darting, scornful, and tosses its analogies in your face; humor is slow and shy, insinuating its fun into your heart. Wit is negative, analytical, destructive; humor is creative. . . . Wit when earnest, has the earnestness of passion seeking to destroy; humor has the earnestness of affection, and would lift up what is seemingly low into our charity and love. Wit, bright, rapid and blasting as the lightning, flashes, strikes and vanishes in an instant; humor, warm and all-embracing as the sunshine, bathes its object in a genial and abiding light. . . . Old Dr. Fuller's remark, that a Negro is "the image of God cut in ebony" is humorous; Horace Smith's inversion of it that the taskmaster is "the image of the devil cut in ivory" is witty. . . . . .

POPE LEO XIII
BY FRANCIS MARION CRAWFORD

. . Joachim Vincente Pecci, who has been Pope under the title of Leo XIII since 1878, was born in the year 1810. . . He was born in a small mountain town called Carpinato, situated thirty or forty miles to the south of Rome, on the very border of a district which is called Sandal Land—the land where the people wear sandals. There, in that town, is still the residence of the family of the present Pope, and in the old residence are portraits of the Pope's father and mother. . . . He has from his father the upper part of his head and the main features—the bony forehead, the prominent cheekbones, a very aquiline nose and firm jaw. From his mother he has the piercing black eyes that seem to hold you as you get into his presence so that you cannot get away from his look. Then he has a very strong mouth, very white, very thin lips, always set in a peculiar expression, which is firm, not unkind, something like a smile, and yet not altogether gentle. One of the most remarkable characteristics of his appearance is his complexion, which he shares with other members of the family. When the Pope comes toward you in one of those shadowy galleries of the Vatican, or in the dimmer church below, a real radiance seems to proceed from his face. It is absolutely colorless, but yet it is luminously pale. It has often been compared to a face carved out of alabaster, with a strong light within it. . . . . .

THE SCATTERED NATION
BY ZEBULON BAIRD VANCE

. . The Jew is beyond doubt the most remarkable man of this world, past or present. . . . Though dead as a Nation—as we speak of Nations—they yet live. Their ideas fill the world and move the wheels of its progress, even as the sun, when he sinks behind the western hills, yet fills the Heavens with the remnants of his glory. As the destruction of matter in one form is necessary to its resurrection in another, so . . . the perishing of the Jewish nationality was in order to the universal acceptance and the everlasting establishment of Jewish ideas. . . . We affect to despise the Jews, but accept and adore the pure conception of a God which he taught us. . . The God of the Jews is the great governing Mind that directs and guides the whole frame of nature—eternal, infinite, and neither capable of change nor subject to decay. . . . The Jewish people, church and institutions are still left standing, though the stones of the temple remain no longer one upon the other, though its sacrificial fires are forever extinguished, and though the Tribes whose glory it was, wander with weary feet throughout the earth. A few remarks upon their numbers, . . . present status in the world, their probable destiny, and my task will be done.

NAPOLEON BONAPARTE
BY GARRETT PUTNAM SERVISS

. . And this . . . . must stand as a true representation of the Napoleonic era, for these are the thoughts and these the scenes which his name conjures. Let not the bitterest enemy of Napoleon deny to him the name and fame of the greatest maker of war and the greatest winner of victories that the world has ever known! Greater than Cæsar, greater than Hannibal, greater than Alexander. Let him have all the glory; let him be the bright particular star-of-war, the great representative figure in the Valhalla of Mars and then let us rejoice that he belongs to our time, for thus he predicts the daybreak! There is no hour so dark as that which precedes the dawn. We may well believe that history will never frame a second Napoleon. She has done her best in that line, and now she turns to nobler things. Let the century that knew him wrap the tattered flags of war about it and lie down to dreams of slaughter, but let us look forward across that new century, whose sunrise now brightens the hills of coming time, believing that it will usher in the thousand years, the ten thousand years, ah! the endless era of peace universal. (Applause.) . . . .

A Woman's Washington

By The Congressman's Wife

IT HAS always seemed to me that the character of a town bears a strong resemblance to the character of an individual, which may be readily gauged by what it laughs at. If it takes only a straw to tickle the individual, likewise it takes only a straw, sometimes, to set a town all-of-a-smile. The particular straw that is tickling the oldest inhabitants, the cave-dwellers, and the non-official residents of Washington just now is the little word that is passing around among the rich men and women who have newly come here from Gotham, to the effect that this is the first time in the history of the country that things have been properly conducted, socially, at the Capital of the Nation. That with a New York man in the White House, a New York man in the Cabinet, a rich, fashionable contingent from New York in both Houses of Congress, a New York woman as wife of the Ambassador from Great Britain, and last but not least, a New York caterer, late of Sherry's, Washington society, after long years of wandering in the wilderness, has at last acquired that indefinable something, that cachet of greatness, which has brought it, like the Children of Israel, to the borderland of Canaan.

The assumption of Gotham's discovery of the Capital of the Nation and its work of putting it upon the proper social footing has been the theme on many tongues of late, and at one of the exclusive cave-dwellers' receptions recently, where were gathered the elect among the old Washingtonians and the elect among the officials, I found the whole reception fairly chortling over it.

"Why, bless my soul!" said old General C——, with his Order of the Cincinnati in his coat, "these newcomers remind me of the fly that Æsop tells about that rode around on the chariot wheel and cried out to the bystanders: 'What a dust do I raise.'"

"Yes," said Miss Clemmie, who made it a point never to go to any houses save those of old Washingtonians of note, "the pretentiousness of these newcomers always reminds me of a mansard roof on a house. It is always sure to be the emptiest part of the structure. In my young days, when I used to stay so much at the White House with Harriet Lane, Mr. Buchanan often warned us not to be too much carried away by the exalted attention we received. He used to say that pretentiousness and vainglory were to be tolerated only in a nation and never in the individual."

"But," said I, remembering that I was a rich newcomer, albeit from Spruce City, "this invasion of Washington by rich people must of necessity bring new standards and customs. It is scientifically demonstrated that one pebble will affect the entire ocean, and when you come to drop in a whole sack full of glittering nuggets, why——"

"Oh, yes," said General C——, "I am fully aware that the day has gone by in Washington when a man if he possesses a case of Apollinaris is justified in giving a blow-out, but this much-talked-of influence of rich outsiders is overrated, just as is all this talk of the influence of the six American women here in the diplomatic corps. The greatest amount of confidence has been expressed in the influence these American wives of the foreign diplomats would exercise in behalf of their native land. Why, take the gracious wife of the British Ambassador, Lady Herbert herself; who would dream that she was born in New York? She is delightful, but she is no longer of New York. She is no longer American. She is English to the backbone. And Madame Jusserand, the French Ambassador's wife; she is an American, but she never saw her native land till this winter, and she speaks her English with all the pretty manner and accent of the French-born woman. Baroness von Sternberg, of the German Embassy, and Baroness Moncheur, the Belgian Minister's wife, have kept some small part, so far, of their American ideas and manners, just as they are keeping their American beauty; but it is only a question of time when they will merge their identities in those of their adopted countries. Madame Lopez, the wife of the Minister from Salvador, is a San Francisco girl, but she is now a South American, all right. As for Madame Yung Kwai, wife of the Secretary of the Chinese Legation, she was a Springfield girl, and you'd know in a minute that she was born in New England. There's no trace of the Oriental about her. But of this whole bunch of American women there's not one," wound up General C—— with emphasis, "who would not throw her influence in any diplomatic question with the country of her adoption, and against her native land!"

"Then the Kaiser and the Czar need not have had any worry about these American marriages among their representatives? You know the Czar made a great rumpus the other day," said I, "about the recent marriage of one of the Secretaries of the Russian Embassy to the young Washington girl, over which the smart set was so agog."

"Neither the Kaiser nor the Czar need worry. Our girls when they marry foreigners become more foreign than their husbands," said General C—— with asperity.

"This fever for diplomats," said Senator Blank, taking up the conversation, "is catching here in Washington. I don't mean to have any of my girls marrying these foreign chaps. I have had that famous motto of Daniel Webster set in the tiles over the mantel in my library, and I make my boys and girls read it over every day. It says: 'I was born an American, I will live an American, I will die an American.'"

Every one smiled at this. It is a well-understood thing in Washington that there is an undying antagonism between Senators and the diplomatic corps, each regarding the other as an arch enemy. Then Senator Blank, who is one of the most uncompromising of patriots, went on:

"How well Dubois read Washington's farewell address in the Senate on the twenty-second. I was sorry the chamber was not filled. I always make it a point to be in my seat when it is read."

"But Washington," said I, "never paid any attention, himself, to his birthday. In 1790 when he was trying to settle upon a residence in Philadelphia he spent the whole month of February in moving. One entry in his diary reads: 'Moved the large mahogany sideboard into our new domicile to-day.' And his diary for the twenty-second reads: 'Set seriously about removing my furniture to my new house. Two of the gentlemen of the family had their beds taken there, and would sleep there to-night.'"

"And Abraham Lincoln," said Robert, "spent his birthday in 1861 in making his pathetic farewell address to his townspeople in Springfield, before coming to Washington. You remember that farewell address and how almost ominous its portent was?"

"Was its portent any more ominous," asked Senator P——, who had just joined us, "than this little effusion which was picked up to-day on the Senate floor not far from a certain Senator's desk over in Cherokee Strip? It was found just after the sudden collapse of the Statehood bill." And the Senator chuckled as he handed out a little verse which ran:

"'A prominent statesman, named Quay,
Had a great predecessor named Clay,
Whose Omnibus bill
Was as much of a pill
As the one that has just blocked the way.'"

This created a good deal of fun, particularly among those of us who were afraid of the bogie extra session.

"Why, I did not know," said Miss Clemmie, "that Henry Clay ever had an Omnibus bill in Congress."

"Oh, yes," said Senator P——, "you haven't forgotten the famous compromise of 1850? Henry Clay gathered the different things belonging to his compromise into a bill known as the Omnibus bill. It was fairly loaded down with amendments, and, as Morse puts it, 'When the Omnibus bill reached the end of its journey it contained only one passenger—a territorial government for Utah.' I'm going to tell Quay to-morrow that we know now who 'struck Billy Patterson.'"

"It's astonishing," said General C——, "to see Senators doing the Dick Turpin act, and holding up legislation like highwaymen. Now, there's Morgan——"

Both Senator P—— and Senator Blank took this up before General C—— could even finish his sentence.

"Oh, John Tyler Morgan is no highwayman, and don't you forget it. He knows this canal business as no other man living does. He is making the point that the Treaty does not leave the United States untrammeled. There are loopholes in it that will let out the Colombians and make Uncle Sam fork out, and go on forking out——"

"Yes," I interrupted, "and I know for certain that Senator Morgan is not antagonistic to the Panama route. Last spring, on

By GEORGE H. POWELL

America's Leading Expert

IT IS a remarkable fact that the business of advertising writing is rapidly absorbing the attention of thousands of business men throughout the entire country, and as never before.

And they are not viewing the possibilities of advertising from standards of a few years back, either. While advertising is now known to be the mightiest lever of advanced commercialism, yet merchants and manufacturers have also learned from bitter experience that the best results are only attainable when the advertising work is placed in skilful hands.

The day of "anything that attracts" is rapidly passing, and in its stead a new era is dawning. All the discoveries leading to a more perfect knowledge of advertising possibilities are cherished, because every effective plan, kink or original scheme has a value that is expressed in dollars and cents—and to Americans this is everything.

The trained writer of advertising, therefore, is filling the place formerly occupied by the untrained clerk, or proprietor, mayhap, who formerly prided himself on his "ability" to do an hour's turn at advertisement construction "on the side."

Not that these naturally bright workers were totally ignorant, but that their observation lines were too narrow, and their opportunities too few to gain more than the most limited amount of skill.

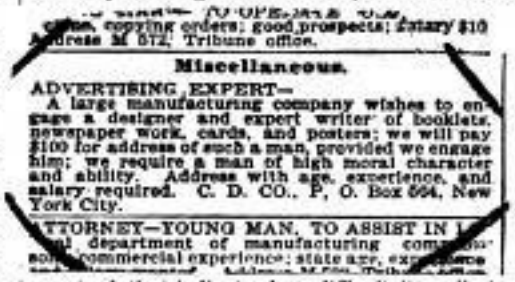
The young man or woman who is thinking of entering the advertising writing field will scarcely be able to wonder that $25 or $50 a week is considered small pay for ad. work, when they realize that to properly attend to the new volume of advertising being done each year more skilled graduates are required than are enrolled as students.

Presuming that every $50,000 spent annually for advertising gives employment to an ad. writer, the next thing to calculate is how many writers will be needed to take care of say $100,000,000 yearly? Only the increase, too.

Then when we come to a realization of the fact that about $700,000,000 is being annually expended in the advertising columns of some 25,000 American periodicals, a little more simple arithmetic will give some idea as to why the business of ad. writing holds out such rare inducements.

In answer to numerous inquiries from POST readers I am going to say something about the advisability of the ambitious man or woman taking up the study of advertising.

Can anybody surely succeed? To this query the answer must always be the same—no. A common school education, backed with vim and a true desire to win success, is necessary, and will almost invariably produce a proficient ad. man or woman. The great stumbling block in all lines of business is, and always will be, lack of stability. More business men are ruined every year through this fault than by any other, and of course the person who is continually jumping about from one thing to another is almost certain to fail. Success is for the steadfast only.



Advertising writing offers marvelous inducements, and the thing for the prospective student to decide is whether he or she is or is not in a business offering meagre advancement. Of course I do not refer to those who are in business where they have an interest, and only wish to acquire skill for improving the present advertising. I refer to those who are free lances and want to make the most of their natural endowments. Clerking, stenography, traveling and the hundred-and-one vocations which we are prone to call "a dog's life," are, of course, far inferior to advertising writing, either from the comparative ease with which an income can be earned, or from the viewpoint of size of income.

I have on my desk as I write these lines many letters from well-known advertisers, who have written to have me recommend students of the Powell System who are capable of filling positions as advertising writers at salaries that are princely from ordinary standards, and this demand never ceases. One of the greatest department stores in Washington wishes a manager at once—one who is worth $50 or more to start with, and I have just the man for the place. He went through my course of mail instruction, and for several months past has filled an ad. writer's position at $25 weekly.

He is steadfast, progressive and a worker. He cannot fail, for he has a grand foundation to stand on—my careful instruction plus his own ambition. The agents advertising Regal Shoes are also soliciting my aid.

The largest manufacturing jewelers in St. Louis want my "brightest" graduate, and as I have many "stars" the vacancy will be supplied, and yet those competent ad. writers will not crowd each other, for the demand is too great.

Another request for a bright student comes from one of Boston's oldest department stores, and without dwelling at too great length I will close by showing herewith a reproduction of a want ad. that indicates how difficult it really is to secure the services of a competent, trained ad. writer. I answered this ad. in a daily paper thinking it a scheme, but was surprised to receive a prompt reply from one of America's best-known advertisers—the largest screen manufacturer of Maine, who had one ad. man and wanted another!

The students' portraits above represent two more who are about to take their places as advertising successes, and what they have to say about the Powell System of advertising instruction is worthy of note. Mr. Hanser resides in Newark, N. J., and Mr. Bottolfson in Winona, Minn.

To all who are interested in earning over $25 a week, as well as to business men who are anxious to save advertising expense while doubling the pulling power of their ads, I shall be pleased to send a copy of my beautiful new Prospectus, the most interesting issued, together with the strongest endorsements. Merely address me George H. Powell, 183 Temple Court, New York, N. Y.

LAKE SHORE ENGINE WORKS, Marquette, Mich.

the very day that the Senate voted for Panama instead of Nicaragua, Senator Morgan's daughters were giving a dinner. When they learned how the vote had gone they decided not to let the subject come up, for they knew that the Nicaragua route had been a cherished dream of their father. When the Senator came in he had scarcely greeted the guests when he said joyfully:

"'Well, the bill has passed.'

"'Yes, father, and we are so sorry,' said Miss Morgan.

"'Sorry!' he ejaculated. 'Well, I'm not, for we've got a canal at last. It's not the route I've fought and bled for, but I wanted a canal, and any will do just so long as it crosses the Isthmus somewhere. It's a curious fact,' continued he, 'that if I'd been impartial between these two great waterways, we'd probably not have reached a vote for either, but by fighting tooth and nail for Nicaragua I've got Panama. Human nature is queer!'"

"Well, it certainly is never more entertaining than in children," said the new Member. "I was up at the White House the other day. I had gone from the Executive Office to the Mansion by invitation of the President, and we encountered the household youngsters together with several others who were there to play with them.

"They were racing all over the lower floor, and finally they began to bounce up and down on the new furniture. The President had to interrupt the informal audience he was holding to say:

"'Children, you must quit that. Those are our venerated Uncle Samuel's new chairs, and he'll be sending us in a bill if we break the springs.'

"'Uncle Sam won't know anything about it,' said the smallest Presidential boy.

"'But this gentleman,' said the President, looking at me slyly, 'is from the House of Representatives, and he may tell on us.'

"This was particularly funny and to the point," went on the new Member, "for only the day before a Representative had introduced a resolution calling on the President for an accounting of expenditures at the White House. You may be sure it lost nothing in my telling of the story when I got back to the Capitol."

"We are going to miss Cortelyou at the Executive Office terribly," said Robert.

"That we are," said Senator Blank. "Cortelyou and young Garfield are like a couple of boys in their enthusiastic zeal for this new Department of Commerce. They are particularly pleased to be at the head of something that never has been in the hands of politicians, and they mean to establish the whole thing on a high plane. One old cut-and-dried party man said to me the other day:

"'These two youngsters with their lofty political notions are going to make some of us old sinners breathe a little hard, I'm afraid. Why, do you know, I was making up a slate of appointments in my State not long since, and of course there were one or two names that were—well—a trifle steep, possibly, but they were names that we're pretty sure all to unite upon, and young Garfield was present. He looked straight through me and asked in that direct way of his:

"'"Has the President seen your slate?"'

"'I was disconcerted, for I knew what he meant, but I put on a bold face and said:

"'"No, the President hasn't seen my slate, and isn't going to see it, either."'"

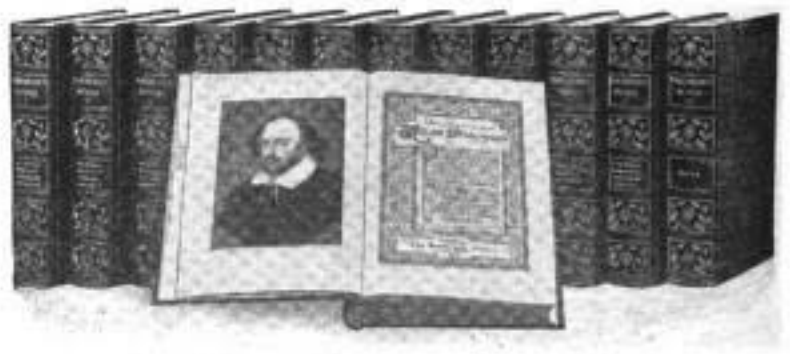
The new Member spoke up.

"When my Colleague, Taylor, of Ohio, heard of Mr. Garfield's appointment as Commissioner of Corporations in this new Department he remarked jocularly:

"'Isn't it rather a violent proceeding on the part of the President to break into the corporations with a jimmy?'

"None of us knew for a minute," continued the new Member, "what he meant, until he explained that everybody in Ohio calls him Jimmy. Senator Hanna even calls him 'little Jimmy Garfield,' although 'little Jimmy' is half again taller than the Honorable Marcus Alonzo himself."

"And speaking of Jimmy," said Robert, trying to fasten upon the new Member a joke that was going the rounds at the Capitol, "Aren't you the very new Member who tackled, the other day, our old Scotch friend Smith, of the Botanic Gardens? They say you had fastened your eyes on some choice plants and cut flowers, and you meant to get around Smith by eulogizing Smith's idol, Bobbie Burns. Quoth you:



"'I always did love "Jimmy" Burns. I think "Jimmy" Burns was one of the greatest poets who ever lived.'

"Quoth he, not stopping his work:

"'Jimmy Burns! Tommy Washington!! Sammy Bonaparte!!! Get out!'"

Read the Best Shakespeare

NOWADAYS no one asks "Shall I read Shakespeare?" That Shakespeare's plays shall be read if one intends to read at all is a matter on which there can be no discussion. You cannot afford to be ignorant of Shakespeare's Works or to possess a poor edition. A set of Shakespeare—the best and most accurate edition—should be the corner-stone of your library. You can buy the best Shakespeare for what you would have to pay for a poor one, and the best edition has the advantage of being in itself a complete Shakespearean Library. The coupon in the lower right-hand corner will bring you a set of the best edition on approval, and three cents a day will keep it.

Sets in 13 Illustrated Volumes. Size of Volumes 8 x 5½ inches

The International Edition

In accuracy, clearness, convenience of arrangement, and in all that goes to constitute an ideal Shakespeare, the International Edition holds first place. This edition reproduces the famous Cambridge text, which has been for forty years the standard text of Shakespeare. To this text have been added Prefaces giving the history of each play; Critical Comments on the plays and the characters, taken from the works of great Shakespearean scholars; Glossaries following each play and defining every difficult word; Explanatory and Critical Notes, which make clear every obscure passage. There are over 200 Illustrations, many of them being rare woodcuts of Shakespeare's time. There are also numerous full-page chromatic plates in colors and photogravures on Japan vellum. Included with the set is a complete Life of Shakespeare, containing the facts actually known about him, by Israel Gollancz, with critical estimates of Shakespeare's genius by Walter Bagehot, Leslie Stephen, and Thomas Spencer Baynes. Shakespeare's Works—everything he wrote—are given complete, including the Sonnets and Poems. A set forms a complete Shakespearean Library.

HALF-PRICE CLUB CLOSES

Through our Shakespeare Club you can obtain a set of this edition at half price and on easy terms of payment, if you order at once. The regular price is $44.00 and $36.00—according to the binding. Our Club price is $22.00 for a set in half-leather binding and $18.00 for the cloth binding—payable at the rate of $1.00 a month. If you ever expect to own a satisfactory edition of Shakespeare, or if you are accumulating a home library, you should not let this opportunity pass. The coupon will bring you a set for examination and if it is not satisfactory you can return it at our expense without costing you a cent. This offer will not appear again, as only a few sets remain, and the Club is closing.

FREE Each subscriber for this edition will receive, free, a complete Index of Shakespeare's Works, by means of which the student can readily find any passage in any of the Plays or Poems. No Concordance of Shakespeare can be bought for less than $6.00, and this volume is worth more to the average reader than a Concordance. None of the other widely advertised editions contains a Topical Index.

IF YOU COULD MAKE $5,000

BY PAYING $6. A MONTH

—$510. IN ALL—WOULD YOU DO IT?

WE PUT the above startling headline at the top of our advertisement for two purposes—one to induce every reader of The Saturday Evening Post to at least read the advertisement through. Second, in the hope that at least half of them will let us tell our story and endeavor to prove that we have an investment in New York real estate which in 10 years will return to you several thousand dollars, perhaps as much as $5,000 for each $500 invested—and this $500 can be paid at the rate of $6 per month. We know we have one of the greatest propositions in real estate ever offered in the history of cities, and our difficulty is not to convince you, but to get the chance of presenting the facts to you.

$500 invested for a child may put him through college; $500 invested for a young married couple will go toward making them independent in their old years; $500 invested by a young man or a young woman will, in our opinion, pay them better than any life insurance they can possibly take out, and this $500 can be invested at $6 a month.

4,000 Investors Bought $3,461,000 Worth of our New York Lots During the Past Year

Nearly three and a half million dollars! that's the forceful story of our real estate sales during the year just ended. We ask you to dwell on these figures long enough to realize—to understand what they really mean. These three and a half million dollars actually represent the confidence which the thousands who have invested in our New York City lots have in us. You, perhaps, have not yet invested—not even investigated our wonderful proposition:—

"$10 Secures a $510 Lot in Greater New York"

COPYRIGHT, 1905, UNDERHILL

Within 35 Minutes of These Skyscrapers, by Trolley, 5c.

This is a high class and strictly honest proposition, or you may be sure The Saturday Evening Post would not permit our announcement to appear. Nor would we have the privilege of referring to twenty odd National Banks, the Commercial Agencies, and over 30,000 customers all over the United States. Doesn't it seem fair to presume that the same reasons which convinced so many thousands of practical thinking men and women everywhere of the undoubted value of our proposition, would convince YOU? Isn't it worth the time at least to send us your name to-day—and learn how you may possibly make $5,000 by paying $10 down and $6 a month until your payments amount to $510?

This may sound extravagant—yet every statement we make is based upon a fact. It is in evidence—it can be verified—it can be SEEN. Naturally we will be accused of being biased in our opinions—of painting New York's future in too rosy colors—but listen!

HERE'S THE OPINION AND ADVICE

OF ONE OF THE

World's Greatest Investors and Financiers, RUSSELL SAGE

(From the New York World of September 28th, 1902.)

"I do not think the future of New York can be depicted in terms any too glowing. The most fanciful writers cannot exaggerate the greatness of its future.

"A man who buys real estate in any of the five boroughs—of course exercising average good judgment—has a fortune before him. Brooklyn is growing at the rate of 75,000 people a year.

"Young man, buy real estate, especially acre property, in the outlying boroughs, and then work hard at your usual avocation. Your real estate purchases will make your old age comfortable." RUSSELL SAGE.

Our property is located in Brooklyn—it is therefore a very significant fact when Mr. Sage says "Brooklyn is growing at the rate of 75,000 people a year." Think of it! That means three-fourths of all of New York's enormous yearly increase of population.

FREE TRIP TO NEW YORK

As a guarantee of good faith, we agree with all persons living East of Chicago to pay you in cash the cost of your railroad fare to New York and return, if you visit our property and find one word of this advertisement a misrepresentation; or in case you buy, we will credit cost of the fare on your purchase; to those living farther away we will pay a proportion equal to round-trip Chicago ticket.

The Kidnaping of Rockervelt

The Passage of a New Comet Across the Railroad Firmament

IT WAS a nasty night with a drizzling rain that was nearly as thick as a fog—a rain that obscured the signals and left the rails so slippery that a quick stop was almost impossible, yet just the sort of night that might make a quick stop imperative if disaster were to be averted.

Red-headed Jimmy Callahan, station-master, telegrapher, ticket agent, and man of all work in the lone shanty known on the railway map as Hitchen's Siding, ignored by all other maps, stood beside the telegraph instrument wondering whether the rain had affected the efficiency of the wires or whether the train dispatcher had gone crazy. Here was Number Sixteen, the freight from the West, coming in, and there were no orders for her. Number Three, known to the outside world as the "Pacific Express," the fastest train on the road, was already forty minutes overdue, tearing westward through the night—somewhere, and Jimmy did not know where. All he knew was that she was trying to make up lost time as well as the greasy metals would allow, and here he stood without orders!

Once more he seized the key and calling the dispatcher's office in Warmington once more demanded "What orders for Sixteen?" Then he went outside and on his own initiative kicked away the iron clutch that released the distant semaphore. The red star of danger glimmered through the drizzle to the east, which might hold the Express if she saw it in time.

Number Sixteen had drawn up to the platform and her conductor came forward, Jimmy running to meet him, shouting:

"Sidetrack your train, Flynn. Sidetrack her on the jump."

"Where's my orders?" demanded the conductor.

"I order you. Get her off the main line at once."

"Your orders! Well, for cold cheek——"

Jimmy lost none of the precious moments in argument, but, turning from the angry conductor, yelled to the engineer:

"Whistle for the switch and kick her back on to the siding. Number Three may be into you any moment."

No youth in Jimmy's position has a right to give a command to an engineer over the head of a conductor; neither should his orders to the conductor be verbal; they must be documentary. Jimmy was shattering fixed rules of the road and he knew it.

The conductor of a perishable goods train thinks himself nearly as important as if he ran an express, so Flynn was rightly indignant at this sudden assumption of unauthorized command by a no-account youth at a no-account station. But a conductor is usually in a comparatively safe place, while the driver of an engine has to take the brunt of a head-on collision, so the grimy Morton at the throttle did not stand on etiquette, but blew the whistle for an open switch and backed his train into the siding. Callahan watched the switchlight turn to safety again, heaved a sigh of relief, then put his stalwart arms to the lever and slowly pulled off the red light to the east and left the main line clear for the through express.

"What's all this sweat about?" cried Flynn. "Where's Number Three?"

"I don't know," replied Callahan quietly.

"You don't know? I'll tell you one thing, my red-headed youngster, if Number Three has lost more time and I'm ordered on to the next siding, you'll lose your job."

"I know it," replied Callahan quietly. Jimmy turned in from the platform to the telegraph room and Flynn followed him. As they advanced the instrument began a wild rataplan, and Callahan paused, raising his hand for silence. Even one like Flynn, who did not understand its language, felt that the machine was making a frantic, agonized appeal.

"Listen to that!" cried Callahan, a note of triumph in his voice.

"What's it saying?" whispered the conductor, awed in spite of himself.

"'Sidetrack Sixteen! Sidetrack Sixteen!! In God's name, sidetrack Sixteen!!!' There's your orders at last, Flynn. It's lucky you didn't wait for them."

The final words were obliterated by a roar as of a descending avalanche and the Express tore past, ripping the night and the silence; fifty miles an hour at the least; the long line of curtained windows in the sleeping-cars shimmering in the station lights like a dimly seen, wavering biograph picture; there and away while you drew your breath. In the stillness that followed the brass instrument kept up its useless, idiotic chatter. A heavy step sounded on the platform and the engineer appeared at the door, his face ghastly in its pallor, the smudges in it giving a heightening effect of contrast.

"Flynn," he gasped, "that was a close call."

The conductor nodded and each man strode forward as if impelled by a single impulse and grasped a hand of the youngster. Callahan laughed nervously, saying:

"They're pretty anxious in the city. I must answer."

Then he went to the instrument and sent the cheekiest message that had ever gone over the wires from a subordinate to a superior.

THE ENGINEER APPEARED AT THE DOOR, HIS FACE GHASTLY IN ITS PALLOR

In the train dispatcher's office at Warmington, one hundred and twenty miles to the east of Hitchen's Siding, the force was hard at work under the electric light. John Manson, Division Superintendent, strolled in, although it was long past his office hours, but he was one of those indefatigable railroad men loath to take his fingers off the pulse of the great organization he controlled, and no employee of the road could be certain of any hour of the night or day when Manson might not be standing unexpectedly beside him. As this silent man surveyed the busy room, listening to the click of the telegraphic sounders which spoke to him as plainly as if human lips were uttering the language of the land, he was startled by a cry from Hammond, the train dispatcher. Hammond sprang like a madman to the sender, and the key, at lightning speed, rattled forth "Sidetrack Sixteen! Sidetrack Sixteen!!!"

Instinctively the Division Superintendent knew what had happened. To the most accurate of men, faithful and exact through years of service, may come an unaccountable momentary lapse of vigilance. The train dispatcher had forgotten Number Sixteen! Instantly the road spread itself out before the mind's eye of the Superintendent. He knew every inch of it. The situation revealed itself to his mathematical brain as a well-known arrangement of men and pawns would display to an expert what could or could not be done on the chessboard. He knew where Number Three would lose further time on the up grades, but now, alas, it was on the level in the flat country where every minute meant a mile. Nevertheless, there was one chance in a thousand that the Express had not yet reached Hitchen's, and his quick mind showed him the right thing to be done.

"Tell him to stop Number Three," he snapped forth.

The dispatcher obeyed. Where disaster is a matter of moments there was little use in awaiting the slow movements of a heavy freight train, when the Express, a demon of destruction, was swooping down on the scene. There was no answer to the frenzied appeal. Every man in the room was on his feet, and each held his breath as if the crash and the shrieks could penetrate across one hundred and twenty miles into that appalled office. Then the sounder began, leisurely and insolent:

"Keep on your shirt. I sidetracked Sixteen on my own hook and set the signal against Three until Sixteen was in. Are you people crazy or merely plain drunk?"

The tension snapped like an overstrained wire. One man went into shriek after shriek of laughter; another laid his head on his desk and sobbed. Hammond staggered into a chair and an assistant held a glass of water to his ashen lips. The Division Superintendent stood like a statue, a deep frown marking his displeasure at the flippant message that had come in upon such a tragic crisis. But a thought of the safety of the trains cleared his brow.

"The man at the siding is that red-headed Callahan, isn't he?"

"Yes, sir."

"Send down a substitute to-morrow and tell Callahan to report to me."

"Yes, sir."

And this is how Jimmy Callahan came to be John Manson's right-hand helper in the Division Superintendent's office in the Grand Union Station of Warmington City.

The Grand Union Station is a noble pile in red brick, rough and cut stone, and terra-cotta, with a massive corner tower that holds aloft a great clock which gives the city Standard time. The tower is the pride of Warmington; a pillar of red cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night, with the hours distinct a mile away. The tower may be taken as a monument to the power and wealth of the Rockervelts, although in larger cities they have still more imposing architecture to uphold their fame.

The Manateau Midland which had its eastern terminus in this immense structure was merely a link in the Rockervelt chain of admirably equipped railways, but as the title, Union, implied, other roads, mostly bankrupt or branch lines of the Midland, had running rights into the Grand Union Station.

T. ACTON BLAIR

For a country youth like Callahan to be transferred at an enhanced salary from a lone pine shanty on the prairie to this palatial edifice in the city was like being translated bodily to Heaven. Now he had his chance, and that was all he asked of Fate. He delighted in railway work. The strident screech of the whistles, the harsh clanking of cars coming together, all the discordant sounds of the station yard, were as orchestral music to him, and he never tired of the symphony. He speedily became the most useful man about the place and was from the first the most popular. He had a habit of dashing here and there bareheaded and to heat or cold was equally indifferent. The clerks called him "The Brand," possibly from the phrase about the brand snatched from the burning, and the yard men called him "The Torch." They said his red head stopped the Pacific Express, and had no idea how closely they were treading on the heels of truth. Jimmy took everything in good part and always laughed loudest at the jokes on himself. There was not a trace of malice in the lad, and he was always ready with a cheery word or a helping hand. He seemed able to do anything, from running an engine to tapping a wire, and was willing in every emergency to work night and day without a grumble till he dropped from fatigue. Silent John Manson watched Jimmy's progress with unspoken approval, and loved him not the less that for all the lad's witty exuberance not a word had ever passed his lips about that sinister mix-up at Hitchen's Siding. Those things are not to be spoken of, and even the General Manager knew nothing of the crisis. The train dispatcher had retired, nerve-broken, and the newspapers never guessed why.

But there was one man who did not like Jimmy, and that was no less important a personage than the General Manager himself. His huge room in the lower part of the tower was as sumptuously furnished as an Eastern palace. T. Acton Blair, General Manager of the Manateau Midland, was supposed to be related to the Rockervelt family, but this was perhaps a fallacy put forth to account for such a palpably incompetent man being placed in so responsible a position. He was a bald-headed, corpulent personage, pompous and ponderous, slow moving and slow speaking, saying perfectly obvious things in a deep, impressive voice as if he were uttering the wisdom of the ages. His subordinate, John Manson, as everybody knew, was responsible for the efficiency of the road, and when he wanted a project carried out he always pretended it was Blair's original idea, so the General Manager got the credit if it was a success, and Manson shouldered the blame if it was not.

One morning as John Manson was about to leave the General Manager's room after the customary daily interview with his chief, the latter said:

"By the way, Manson, who is that florid individual that rushes about these offices at all hours, as if he thought he was running the whole Rockervelt system?"

"I suspect that is James Callahan, one of my assistants, sir."

"I don't like him, Manson. He seems obtrusive."

"I assure you, sir, he is a most capable man."

"Yes, yes, I dare say, but, as I have often told you, the success of our organization is in method, not in haste."

"Quite so, sir."

"That person always gives me the idea that something is wrong; that a fire has broken out, or a man has been run over. I don't like it. His clothes are untidy and seem to have been made for some one else. His hair in disarray gets on one's nerves. He is uncouth, Manson, uncouth. I shouldn't like Mr. Rockervelt to see that we have such an unkempt person on our clerical staff."

"I'll speak to him, sir. I admit his manner does not do him justice."

When Manson next encountered Jimmy alone he spoke with more than his usual severity.

"Callahan, I wish you would pay some attention to your clothes. Get a new business suit and take care of it. Remember you are in the City of Warmington and not at Hitchen's Siding."

"Yes, sir," said Jimmy contritely, looking down with a new dismay at his grease-stained trousers.

"And get your hair cut—short. I wish also you would abandon your habit of running all over the place without a hat."

"I'll do it, sir."

The hair-cut was not such an improvement as might have been expected, and even Manson's stern face almost relaxed into a smile as he saw the result of the barber's shears. Hitherto Jimmy's head had been a flame; now it resembled an explosion. The shortened red bristles stood straight up like those of a time-worn brush broom. And in spite of all determination on his part, Jimmy would forget his hat. The catastrophe came with appalling suddenness. The Pacific Express he had saved, but himself he could not save.

Tearing down the long corridor at breakneck speed Callahan turned a corner and ran bang into the imposing front of the General Manager. That dignified potentate staggered back against the wall gasping, while his glossy silk hat rolled to the floor. Jimmy, brought up as suddenly as if he had collided with a haystack, groaned in terror, snatched the tall hat from the floor, brushed it, and handed it to the speechless magnate.

"I'm very, very sorry, sir," he ventured, but Mr. Acton Blair made no reply. Leaving the culprit standing there he put on his hat and strode majestically to the Division Superintendent's room.

"Manson," he panted, dropping into a chair, "discharge that lunatic at once."

Manson was too straightforward a man to pretend ignorance respecting the person alluded to. His face hardened into an expression of obstinacy that amazed his chief.

"The Rockervelt System is deeply indebted to Mr. Callahan; a debt it can never repay. He saved Number Three last November from what would have been the most disastrous accident of the year."

"Why was I never told of this?"

"For three reasons, sir. First, the fewer people that know of such escapes, the better; second, Hammond, who was responsible, voluntarily resigned on plea of ill health; third, Hammond was your nephew."

Mr. T. Acton Blair rose to his feet with that majesty of bulk which pertains to corpulent men. It was an action which usually overawed a subordinate.

"I think you are making a mistake, sir, regarding our relative positions. I am General Manager of the Manateau Midland, and, as such, have a right to be informed of every important event pertaining to the road."

"Your definition of the situation is correct. Both you and Mr. Rockervelt should have been told of the narrow escape of the Express."

There was a glitter as of steel in the keen eyes of the Superintendent, while the inflated manner of the Manager underwent a visible change like a distended bladder pricked by a pin. Mr. Blair knew well the danger to himself and his vaunted position if the event under discussion came to the knowledge of the great autocrat in New York, so he tried to give his backdown the air of a masterly retreat.

"Well, well, Mr. Manson, I don't know but you were right. The less such things are talked of the better. They have a habit of getting into the papers and undermining public confidence, which should be the endeavor of all of us to avoid. Yes, you did quite right, so we will let it go at that."

"And how about Mr. Callahan?"

"After all, Manson, he is in your department, and you may do as you please. I should rather see him go, but I don't insist upon it. Good-afternoon, Mr. Manson."

The great man took his departure ponderously, leaving Manson somewhat nonplused. As soon as the door to the corridor closed behind Blair the door to Manson's secretary's room, which had been ajar during this conversation, flew open and the impetuous Callahan came rushing in.

"Excuse me, Mr. Manson," he cried, "but I was waiting to see you and I could not help hearing part of what you and Mr. Blair said. I did not intend to listen, but if I had shut the door it would have attracted attention, so I didn't know what to do. I suppose he told you we had a head-on collision round a curve with no signals out except my hair."

The young man tried to carry it off jauntily with a half-nervous laugh, but Manson's face was sober and unresponsive. "It was all my fault and you had warned me before," continued Callahan breathlessly; "now you stood up to the Old Man for me, and made him back water. But I'm not going to have you get into trouble because of a yahoo like me. I've discharged Jimmy Callahan. I'm going in now to Mr. Blair and I'll apologize and resign. I'll tell him you warned me to quit rushing round and I didn't do it. I'm sorry I telescoped him, but not half so sorry as that I disappointed you."

"Nonsense," said Manson severely, "go back to your desk and let this rest for a day or two. I'll see the Manager about it later." He noticed the moisture in the younger man's eyes and the quiver of his nether lip, so he spoke coldly. Emotion has no place in the railway business.

"No, sir; I'd never feel comfortable again. There's lots of work waiting for me and it won't have to wait long. I'm going for it as I went for Mr. Blair's waistcoat. But I want to tell you that—that all the boys know you're a brick who'll stand by them—if they—if they do the square thing."

And as if his disaster had not been caused by his precipitance, Jimmy bolted headlong from the room before Manson could frame a reply.

The Division Superintendent put on his hat and left the room less hurriedly than Jimmy had done. He made his way to that sumptuous edifice known as the University Club. The social organization which it housed had long numbered Manson as a member, but he was a most infrequent visitor. He walked direct to the coziest corner of the large reading-room and there in a luxurious armchair found, as he had expected, the Honorable Duffield Rogers, an aged gentleman with a gray beard on his chin and a humorous twinkle in his eye. Mr. Rogers was a millionaire over and over again, yet he was president of the poorest railway in the State, known as the Burdock Route, whose eastern terminus was in the Grand Union, which Manson had just left. He occupied a largely ornamental position on the Burdock, as he did in the armchair of the club. He was surrounded by a disarray of newspapers, and allowed the one he was holding to fall as he looked up with a smile on seeing Manson approach.

"Hello, Manson. Is the Midland going to pay a dividend that you've got an afternoon off?"

"What do you know about dividends?" asked Manson with a laugh. He seemed a much more jocular person in the club than in the railway office and he was not above giving a sly dig at the Burdock Route, which had never paid a dividend since it was opened.

"Oh, I read about 'em in the papers," replied the Honorable Duffield serenely. "How's that old stick-in-the-mud Blair? I'm going to ask the committee to expel him. He has the cheek to swell around here, in my presence, and pretend he knows something about railroading. I'd stand that from you, but not from T. Acton Blair. He forgets I'm President of a road while he's only a General Manager. I tell him I rank with Rockervelt and not with mere G. M's."

The old millionaire laughed so heartily at his own remarks that some of the habitués of the reading-room looked up sternly at the framed placard above the mantel-shelf which displayed in large black letters the word "Silence." Manson drew up a chair beside the old man and said earnestly:

"I came in to see you on business, Mr. Rogers. There is a young fellow in my office who will develop into one of the best railroad men of his time. I want you to find a place for him on your line."

"Oh, we're not taking on any new men. Just the reverse. We laid off the General Manager and about fifteen lesser officials a month ago and we don't miss 'em in the least. I've been trying to resign for the past year, but they won't let me, because I don't ask any salary."

"This man will be worth double his money, anywhere."

"I am not saying anything against your man except that we don't want him. The Burdock's practically bankrupt; you know that."

JOHN MANSON

"Still, Callahan, the young fellow I'm speaking of, won't want much money and he understands railroading down to the ground."

"If he is so valuable why are you so anxious to get rid of him?" asked the wily President with a smile.

"I'm not. I'd rather part with all the rest of my staff than with Callahan, but Mr. Blair has taken a dislike to him, and ——"

"Enough said," broke in the President of the Burdock. "That dislike coupled with your own preference makes the best recommendation any man could ask. How much are you paying Callahan?"

"Ten dollars a week."

The old man mused for a few moments, then chuckled aloud in great apparent enjoyment.

"I'll give him fifteen," he said. "Will that satisfy him?"

"It will more than satisfy him."

"But I pay the amount on one condition."

"What is that, Mr. Rogers?"

Digitized by Google

"The condition is that he accepts and fills the position of General Manager of the Burdock Route."

"General Manager!" echoed Manson. "I'm talking seriously, Mr. Rogers."

"So am I, Manson, so am I. And don't you see what a good bargain I'm driving? You say Callahan is first class. All right; I know you wouldn't vouch for him unless this was so. Very well. I get a General Manager for fifteen dollars a week; cheapest in the country and doubtless the best. I confess, however, my chief delight in offering him the position is the hope of seeing old Blair's face when he first meets in conference the youth he has dismissed, his equal in rank if not in salary. It will be a study in physiognomy."

If the said John Manson thought that Callahan's native modesty would prevent his accepting the management of the Burdock Route he was much mistaken. When Manson related quietly the result of his interview with the Honorable Duffield Rogers, the youth amazed him by leaping nearly to the ceiling and giving utterance to a whoop more like the war-cry of a red Indian than the exclamation of a red-headed Irishman. Then he blushed the color of his hair and apologized for his excitement, abashed by Manson's disapproving eyes.

"I tell you what it is, Mr. Manson, I'll make the roadbed of the old Burdock as good as you've got the Midland and I'll ——"

"Tut, tut," said Manson in his most unenthusiastic tone; "you can do nothing without money, and the Burdock's got none. Be thankful if you receive your fifteen a week with reasonable regularity. Now, here is a letter to the Honorable Duffield Rogers. Give it to the hall porter at the club and Mr. Rogers will invite you in. You will find the President a humorous man and you have a touch of the same quality yourself, but repress it and treat him with the greatest respect, for humorists get along better with dull people like myself than with each other. Although you are leaving the jurisdiction of Mr. Blair, do not forget what I told you about paying attention to your clothes. You will be meeting important men whom you may have to persuade, and it is better to face them well groomed; a prepossessing appearance counts in business. Prepossession is nine points in the game. Here is the letter, so be off." The Division Superintendent rose and extended his hand. "And now, my boy, God bless you."

The tone of the benediction sounded almost gruff, but there was a perceptible quaver underneath it, and after one firm clasp of the hand the Division Superintendent sat down at his desk with the resolute air of a man determined to get on with his work. As for Callahan, he could not trust his voice, either for thanks or farewell, so he left the room with impetuous abruptness and would have forgotten his hat if he had not happened to hold it in his hand.

To the ordinary man the Burdock Route was a badly kept streak of defective rails, rough as a corduroy road; to Jimmy it was a glorious pathway to Paradise, an air-line of tremendous possibilities. He went up and down its length, not in a private car, but on ordinary locals and freight trains. He became personally acquainted with every section foreman and with nearly every laborer between Warmington and Portandit, the western terminus. He found them, as a usual thing, sullen and inert; he left them jolly and enthusiastic, almost believing in the future of the road.

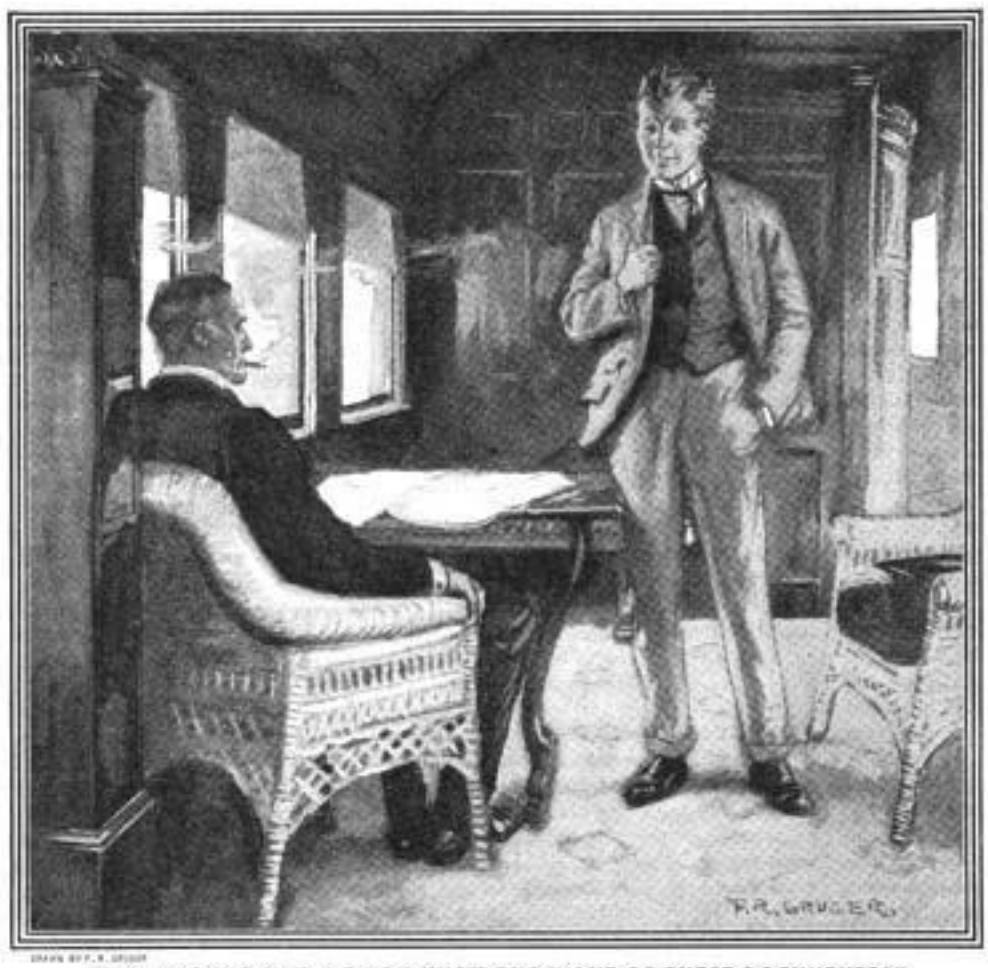
He proved an unerring judge of character: the useless man was laid off, while the competent was encouraged and promoted. He could handle a shovel with the best of them, or drive in a spike without missing a blow. In a year he had the Burdock Route as level as a billiard-table, without extra expenditure of money, and travelers were beginning to note the improvement, so that receipts increased. He induced the Pullman Company to put an up-to-date sleeper on each night train and withdrew the antiquated cars hitherto in use.

But there was one thing Callahan was not able to accomplish. He could not persuade the venerable President of the road to regard it as anything but a huge joke. The Honorable Duffield Rogers absolutely refused to leave his comfortable chair in the club and take a trip over the Burdock. The President delighted in Callahan's company and got him made a member of the club, setting him down as a graduate of the Wahoo University, which was supposed to exist somewhere in the remote West. Rogers was a privileged member and a founder of the club, so the committee did not scrutinize his recommendation too closely.

"It's no use, Jimmy," he said. "Life is hard enough at best without my spending any part of it in a beastly place like Portandit. I hear you have done wonders with the road, but you can't do anything really worth while with a route that has no terminus on the Atlantic. As long as you have to hand over your Eastern traffic to the Rockervelts at Warmington and take what Western freight they care to allow you, you are in the clutch of the Rockervelts and they can freeze you out whenever they like.

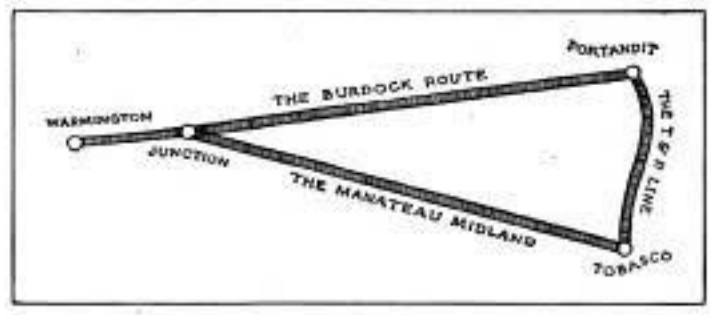
"You may grade, you may ballast your road if you will,
But the shadow of Rockervelt's over you still."

Thus Callahan always received his discouragement from his own chief, and with most persons this would ultimately have dampened enthusiasm, but Jimmy was ever optimistic and a believer in his work. One day he rushed into the club, his hat on the back of his head, a loose end of his collar sticking over his ear and his eyes ablaze with excitement.



"Mr. Rogers, I've solved the problem at last!" he cried. "We'll make the Burdock the greatest line in this country."

He shoved away the heaps of magazines from the reading-room table and spread out a map on its surface. The Honorable Duffield rose slowly to his feet and stood beside the eager young man. A kindly indulgent smile played about the lips of the aged President.



"Now, see here," shouted Callahan (they were alone together in the room and the "Silence" placard made no protest). "There's Beechville on the Burdock Route and here's Collins' Centre on the C. P. & N. Between these two points is sixty-three miles of prairie country as level as a floor. It will be the cheapest bit of road in America; no embankments, no cuttings, no grade at all. Why, just dump the rails down and they'd form a road of themselves! Once the Burdock taps the C. P. & N., there is our route clear through to tidewater independent of the Rockervelt system."

Callahan, his face aglow, looked up at the veteran, but the indulgent smile had taken on a cynical touch. Mr. Rogers placed his hand on Jimmy's shoulder and said slowly:

"If that could have been done it would have been done long since. You could not get your charter. Rockervelt would buy the legislature and we couldn't outbid him."

"NOW, YOUNG MAN, DO YOU KNOW THE VALUE OF THESE DOCUMENTS?"

Callahan's clenched fist came down on the map with a force that made the stout table quiver.

"But I've got the charter," he roared in a voice that made the hall porter outside think there was a row in the reading-room. The Honorable Duffield Rogers sank once more into his armchair and gazed at Jimmy.

"You've got the charter?" he echoed quietly.

"Certainly; and it didn't cost me a cent. The Governor signed it yesterday."

"Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings," murmured the old man, who had years of experience behind him in the bribing of lawmakers. "In Heaven's name, how did you manage it?"

"I went to the capital, got acquainted with the legislators —splendid fellows, all of them—personal friends of mine now —I showed them how such a link would benefit the State, and the bill went through like that!" Jimmy snapped his fingers.

"Well, I'm blessed!" ejaculated the old-time purchaser of franchises.

"Now, Mr. Rogers, you understand financiering and you know all the capitalists. I understand the railway business. You get up the money, I'll build the road, and we'll be into New York with a whoop."

For one brief instant Callahan thought he had conquered. Like an old war-horse at the sound of the bugle, Rogers stiffened his muscles for the fight. The light of battle flamed in his eye as the memory of the conquest of millions returned to him. But presently he leaned back in his chair with a sigh and the light flickered out.

"Ah, Jimmy," he whispered plaintively, "I wish I had met you thirty years ago, but alas, you weren't born then. What a team we should have made! But I'm too old, and, besides, your scheme wouldn't work. I might get up the money and I might not. The very name of the Burdock is a hoodoo. But, even if the money were subscribed and the link built, we should merely be confronted by a railroad war. The Rockervelts would cut rates and the longest purse would win, which means we should go to the wall."

Callahan sat down with his face in his hands, thoroughly discouraged for the first time in his life. He felt a boyish desire to cry and a mannish desire to curse, but did neither. The old gentleman rambled on amiably:

"You are a ten-thousand-dollar man, Jimmy, but your line of progress is on some road with a future. Follow my advice and take your charter to that old thief, Rockervelt himself. There lies your market."

"How can I do that," growled Jimmy from between his fingers, "when I am an employee of the Burdock?"

"Technically, so am I, therefore as your chief I advise you to see Rockervelt."

"All right," cried Callahan, springing to his feet as if his minute of deep despondency had been time thrown away that could not be spared. He shook hands cordially with the President and returned his genial smile.

On the steps of the club he was surprised to meet John Manson, who, he knew, rarely honored that institution with his presence.

"I was just going up to see you, Mr. Manson. I want you to do me a favor. I'm going to New York, and I'd like a letter of introduction to Mr. Rockervelt."

The brow of the Division Superintendent knitted slightly and he did not answer so readily as the other expected.

"Well, you see, Callahan," he said at last, "I am merely a small official and Mr. Rockervelt is an important man who knows his own importance. Etiquette prescribes that I should give you a letter to the General Manager, and he is the proper person to introduce you to Mr. Rockervelt, so you see——"

"Oh, very well," exclaimed Callahan shortly, sorry he had asked. This rebuff, following so closely on the heels of his disappointment, clouded his usual good nature. He was about to go on when Manson detained him, grasping the lapel of his coat.

"Don't be offended, Jimmy, and I'll tell you something no one else knows. I'm going to quit the railway business."

"What!" shouted Callahan, all his old affection for the man surging up within him as he now noted the trouble in his face. Manson quit the railway business! It was as if he had calmly announced his intention to commit suicide.

"That old fool Blair has been making trouble for you," he cried.

THE PRESIDENT

By William Allen White

"IT IS UP TO US TO 'MAKE GOOD'"

THE FRIENDS AND THE ENEMIES HE HAS MADE—THE CURIOUS SPECTACLE OF A SMILING SUPPORT READY WITH THE KNIFE IN THE HAND BEHIND THE BACK

THE core of all wholesome philosophy of this life is found in the doctrine of compensations: things even themselves up. There is no gain without a loss; no loss without a gain. Every one who has studied recent political tendencies at all has seen that the Senate of the United States has been encroaching of late years on the powers of the executive. It may be demonstrated easily that in their several commonwealths United States Senators, through their control of the appointment of local Federal authorities, divide, in a measure, with the President the power of enforcing the Federal statutes in each State. In a crisis, a district attorney or a district marshal might well hesitate between obeying a President and offending the Senator who controls the local patronage. The President might remove the offender; but the Senator also could refuse to appoint the obedient officer, and the President would be practically estopped from rewarding obedience by reappointment. Custom has shattered the constitutional theory that the legislature makes the laws and the executive enforces them. In actual practice the Congress and the President enforce the laws, and in actual practice—and here compensation comes in—the President and Congress make the laws. The Senate in gaining some executive power has given up some legislative power. In taking away the actual appointive power from the President, and leaving him only a veto power over appointments, Congress, and more particularly the Senate, has left a hole in the legislative wall through which the President walks into Congress and takes his place as a lawmaker. If Congress contends for the inalienable right to say exactly what man shall fill any Federal office, the very interest of Congressmen and Senators in executive matters gives the President purchase on the lever which moves them to his ends. If they take high ground and say that they don't care whom the President appoints to any office, the President at once holds the short end of the lever and can move nothing. The partnership in office brokerage compels a partnership in lawmaking. And because the President has several hundred equal legislative partners, and each legislator has but one equal Presidential partner, Congress gets considerably the worst of the bargain. One President can influence more legislation than twenty Congressmen. And the net result of the encroachment of Congress on executive prerogatives has been a strong centralization of power in the executive—with a possibility of weakness in the enforcement of laws, a possibility that has not been of enough importance to be considered even trivial.

This merging of the legislative and executive offices has been going on for over half a century. Indeed it began with the beginning of the nation. But with the growth of the party system of government, during the latter fifty years of the past century, the men who were at the head of a dominant party, in Congress and in the White House and in the Cabinet, have put party interests unconsciously above constitutional restrictions and have worked together so harmoniously that the letter, if not the spirit, of the Constitution has lapsed into desuetude. In these years sometimes Congress has been President, as in the case of Johnson, and sometimes the President has been Congress. At times they have wrangled, and at times they have been frigidly polite and almost constitutionally punctilious, as in Harrison's term. President Roosevelt's relations with Congress are these: for him and his political fortunes the leaders of the Senate and the House have a fathomless indifference. For them the President has an exuberant interest, which enables him to direct many moves on the Congressional checker-board without arousing any enthusiasm for his direction, or organizing serious opposition to it. The real leaders of Congress are the Senate leaders, and many of them are old men, as the world takes men, and there can be little zest in the help that old men give a young stranger to go further up the ladder than they have gone. The President has his good friends in Congress, and even in the Senate, but also he has his enemies. They pair. The office brokerage partnership between Congress and the President is on the basis of established usage, except that this President uses his veto power much more vigorously than some of his predecessors used it, and only clean men are appointed.

The President the People's Attorney

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S place in the legislative machine has been not as an adroit manipulator of the political pie-market, but as an attorney for the people. The President's success has been due not to his deftness in politics. Indeed shortcomings there have been apparent, but they have been inconsequential, for the net result of his winter's work is of vital importance to the nation; and if he succeeded as the people's representative and not as an office broker no one cares much.

President Roosevelt's position as the people's attorney was illustrated admirably by his stand in the coal strike last winter. There is no getting around the fact that his place in the situation was without warrant of written law. He didn't have to do anything in the matter except as his heart and soul saw the law higher than the written law, the law of conscience and common-sense. It was apparent to any one who looked at the coal strike situation seriously, that while the strikers and the operators were wrangling the people were suffering. It is probable that both sides of the strife were violating laws; a fight of any kind is always in violation of some law; otherwise it wouldn't come to blows. And it was as a peace officer, not as an arbitrator, that Roosevelt stepped between the combatants. And as a peace officer his first and primary interest was to stop the fight, so that the suffering people might find relief.

This act indicates Roosevelt's attitude toward the public or the people or the commonwealth, or whatever one may choose to call the force from which government derives its power; it is a peculiar attitude, and certainly extra-constitutional. It is the attitude of a paternal ruler, who puts his sense of personal duty above laws and courts and constitutions. It establishes relations between the people and their ruler outside of laws, beyond forms and traditions, sweeping aside everything but sheer justice and standing before them as between men and man. It was a brave thing, but a dangerous thing to do. If there had been the trace of meanness or of selfishness in this deed Roosevelt would have been ruined by it. As it was he rose. Every great ruler rises thus: Lincoln with his emancipation proclamation, Washington with his farewell address.

Last fall when the biennial elections gave Roosevelt the most unequivocal indorsement an American President ever got, he said to a friend: "This is not the end; it is only important as a promise. It is up to us to 'make good.'" In his message to Congress last December the President proclaimed a legislative program. It included trust legislation; the canal legislation; supplemental Philippine legislation, and Cuban reciprocity. Probably a majority could have been found last December in both branches of Congress against the President's suggestions, but these majorities vanished before spring, and the trust legislation, which was known to have the Administration's sanction, became law. Part of the Philippine legislation was also enacted. The Canal treaty and the Cuban treaty were not ratified at the regular session, and an extra session of the Senate was called to settle the matter. It is possible, too, that an extra session of Congress will be called next September. The President has yielded nothing. The Senate leaders now know that he will fight; also, what is more important for results, that he will compromise on any commercial proposition, and meet his opponents half-way. Sometimes the President takes an advanced position, so that in coming back to compromise he meets his adversary squarely on the ground of exact justice! This is worth considering in making up an estimate of Roosevelt's character.

The strength of Roosevelt's character, as it has been illumined by the fireworks of so many past fights, was seen typically in the fight for trust legislation. There he did exactly what he has done in every important contest he has ever won: made his opponents choose the less of what they regarded as two evils, and thereby do what he regarded as right. The attitude of Wall Street toward the President has been hostile from the day he took the office. Sometimes Wall Street has tried to conceal this attitude. At other times the hostility has been open and vicious. A series of bills relating to trusts and corporations was framed. These bills provided for the appropriation of $500,000 to push prosecutions under the anti-trust laws; for the advancement of anti-trust cases on the Federal dockets; for publicity in the reports of corporations; for the effective prohibition of rebate-giving by railroads. To the President these bills seemed fair. Of course a myriad of other bills, some drastic and ultra socialistic in their tendency, were before the Congress. Nothing could get through Congress without the support of the eight Senate leaders, Messrs. Aldrich, Hanna, Lodge, Hale, Frye, Platt of Connecticut, Allison and Spooner—unless the President should throw his force solidly against theirs. It became apparent to certain Senate leaders, who did not like the Administration trust program, that something would be done against the trusts. They saw that if they did not act with the President in the support of the above-named measures that he would take such help as fortune put in his way and secure such measures as the fire-eaters would give to him. Wall Street grumbled. The Republican party was threatened with political hell-fire; the newspaper organs of those interests which represent the crass brute force of wealth raged. He sparred for position and grinned. Then the Senate leaders came to him, and the bills he desired were enacted. The Republican party "made good" in one of its promises.

But the promise of the election last fall has been fulfilled at some cost. That part of the American Republic called Wall Street—which, by the way, does not mean merely Wall Street and Lower Broadway, but embraces selfish, unpatriotic corporate greed wherever it exists in the country—is now aggressively against Roosevelt. It is casting about for some one to beat him. The gossips say that Whitney is trying to get up enthusiasm for Judge Alton Parker, of New York, on a raw-head-and-bloody-bones, man-eating, anti-trust platform, with a hole cut in it for his feet to reach the rock of conservatism. But Wall Street may learn that it is much easier to fool yourself than to fool others, and seeing that the West will have none of Parker may conclude that Roosevelt is safer than ills we know not of. A most astonishingly candid article from the Wall Street Journal of February 18 indicates that the Roosevelt question is occupying the Wall Street mind. Under the head, "Anything to Beat Roosevelt," the Journal says, among other things:

"'Anything to beat Roosevelt' is clearly the motto of the powerful financial interests in the Street, so far as 1904 is concerned. What is the fault that Wall Street finds with President Roosevelt? Different answers would no doubt be given to this question by different people. Some would say that the President was dangerous because he was impulsive and erratic; some affect to consider him a demagogue because of his attitude on the trust question and on the coal strike; all would agree in saying that he was not to be controlled by anybody. It seems to us that this last is the crux of the whole matter. No particular fault was found with the President previous to his intervention in the Northern Securities case a year ago. His action in that matter opened the eyes of the financial powers, and did it in the rudest possible fashion. They had neither been consulted nor warned beforehand. The blow fell suddenly. Then came the coal strike, and Mr. Roosevelt's intervention as representing the public. A second time they felt the force of his hand.

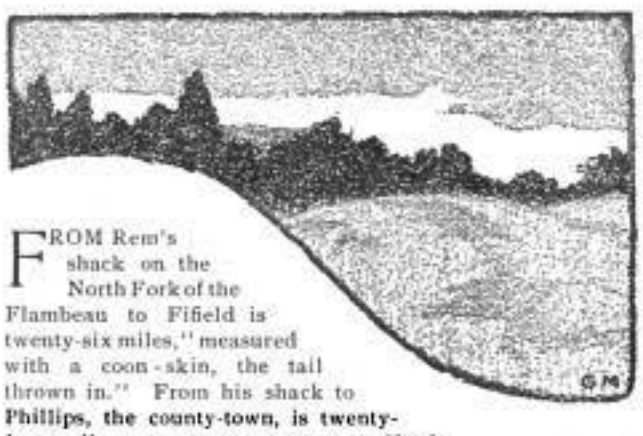
"The situation is undeniably interesting. President Roosevelt has in his administration up to date been supported by the general mass of public opinion in this country. No one in his party is strong enough to stand against him as his equal in the public eye. He has two qualities of a kind that always excite public enthusiasm, namely, absolute honesty and absolute independence. The very fact that his independence has earned for him the whole-souled hostility of Wall Street is not at all unlikely to prove a great element of strength to him in the coming campaign. It is for this reason that we regard the attitude of Wall Street as very unwise at this juncture. . . . How is Mr. Roosevelt, if nominated, to be beaten at the polls? He can only be beaten by the election of a candidate standing for principles such as those embodied in the 'yellow' journalism. A concentration of the forces of socialism, demagoguery and 'high finance' would be necessary for this purpose, and even then it might not be successful; and if it were successful, would the 'high finance' feel quite comfortable in its new surroundings? It is impossible not to feel some sympathy with the 'high finance' in its present position. It has been accustomed for some time to have things more or less to its liking, and it is not accustomed to dealing as a minority interest, so to speak, and where it does not control. President Roosevelt's independence in matters affecting financial interests has been a great surprise and, of course, a bitter disappointment. This, however, while it may be a bad thing for the country, is not necessarily so. It is not universally admitted that Wall Street is the only safe or proper guardian of the interests of the country. All that can be said about it is that it is the most highly organized and probably the most intellectually efficient portion of the public in these matters.

"It seems to us that, as we have already said, Wall Street is between what it considers 'the devil and the deep sea.' It would be very poor policy to unchain the forces of socialism merely to get rid of the present executive because he could not be controlled. Wall Street should remember that of all sections of the body politic none is more dependent upon the law than itself. Mr. Roosevelt has ever stood for rigid execution of the law without fear or favor. Wall Street may want to break the law at times, ... but Wall Street has a great deal more to lose from a general disregard of law than it has to lose from its universal enforcement."

ACHIEVEMENT THE MARK OF HIS GUESTS

Whatever Wall Street may decide to do, there is no doubt about this proposition: James J. Hill, who is a kind of divine vicegerent in the Northwest, is going to fight Roosevelt to the finish. And Hill is of the type which made Katherine the shrew say "The man's a man." Wall Street may be coaxed and badgered and scared. But Hill belongs to a different race—the race of creators. He pushed his railroad through deserts, over mountains, into forests and out again till it reached the ocean. He has big, knotty intellectual biceps, and being a sort of king in his own right in his own country, regards Federal interference with the Northern Pacific and Great Northern merger as an unspeakable insult. He considers he has a blood-bond out to fight Roosevelt, who interfered with the merger; and there will be no surrender. All along the lines of his road, from the lakes to the ocean, if a railroad may influence sentiment, it may transpire next year that there is a feeling against Roosevelt. The people of the country, who are with Roosevelt probably more closely than they have been with any other President, may as well make up their minds to the fact that the coming campaign is going to be fought bitterly against him. No man can do his duty without making enemies, and the people will find that a plain, earnest, brusque man like Roosevelt, who goes at the heart of evil, is going to acquire a set of enemies so elaborate and varied that in the end they may be the chief bulwarks of his defense. These anti-trust laws were not put on the statutes for ornamental nor for purely literary purposes. In a few months their enforcement will begin, and then the real test of Roosevelt's strength will come. Perhaps it might be better said that the real test of the good sense of the American people will come. It is safe to say what Roosevelt will do. But will the people stand with him when he is under fire. Those who do stand may be counted not as loyal friends but as good citizens. The patriotism of the Republican party will be tried in the same crucible. If the party stands by Roosevelt when the trusts and the railroads forsake him and speak falsely against him, it will be a sign that the Republican party has not lost its vigor, and that it is ready for new duties and new honors. The best one can do is to hope. It is much too early to rejoice in the outcome of this fight as a fact accomplished.

Of course, the contests that the President may have with what we call the trusts will be advertised and discussed. And in advertisement and discussion he will have the ultimate advantage. But much of his really important work is not attractive to the public, and in the nature of things can bring him no credit, though it may add substantially to his roster of enemies. Here is a typical case: Judge Willis Vandeventer, who has been an efficient Attorney-General for the Interior Department, and whose handling of the preliminary details to the opening of the lands of the Kiowa and Comanche Indians in Oklahoma and the Indian Territory in the summer of 1901 was universally commended in the West, was promoted recently to a place on the Federal bench as circuit judge. Vandeventer's place in the Interior Department was filled by the promotion of Frank L. Campbell, of Ohio, who has been Assistant Secretary of the Interior since 1899, and has been in the Interior Department over twenty years. His promotion was made without consulting the Senators from Ohio, who under the rules of politics should have recommended the appointment. It was not politically recommended at all. The appointment was a promotion for merit. F. H. Fimple, who was assistant to Vandeventer, and who was familiar with all the details of the land department, was made Assistant Land Commissioner when ex-Governor Richards, the Assistant Land Commissioner, was promoted to the Commissionership. George B. Cortelyou, who was made Secretary of Labor and Commerce, had no political influence back of him; his advancement was clearly a promotion. These are instances which came up only in the month of February. There have been scores of others. The evident aim of the President is to get the work of the Government on the merit system as nearly as possible and to eliminate political influence in the direction and control of appointments. Of course, one of these days the President is going to step on a political corn, and make some political power of the first class very mad. The people will see the anger only, and probably a specious cause and not the real one, and they may take sides with the political power and against the President. So the honest effort of the President to get a dollar's worth of public service for a dollar's worth of public taxes will not find its immediate reward in public approval. But it will win in the long run, and probably win under Roosevelt, for he is one of the few Presidents who have been able to simplify issues, to reduce questions to their lowest terms, and get down to primitive morality—to bring questions before the people on first principles. The politician who fights that kind of a man should beware.



It seems to be accepted by the people and the politicians that Theodore Roosevelt desires a Presidential nomination from his party next year. The people seem to have taken it for granted that the nomination will come without a fight, as indeed it may. But there is only one axiom that never fails in any emergency in public life. It is that nothing is certain in politics till it becomes history; so, though Roosevelt has the probabilities in his favor, much may happen in a year. The things that threaten Roosevelt are little things: the negro problem, an outbreak in the Philippines caused by the economic conditions there that are becoming alarming, factionalism in the States, a scandal in some branch of the Government remote from Presidential inspection, and the intrigues of politicians. The politicians do not like Roosevelt. He and his friends may as well face this, and the people, who admire Roosevelt, should be forewarned. The politicians in the Republican party would leave the President for Hanna in ten days if Hanna would but pass along the word. Or if another Republican should be cast up by the wave of some big event, the professional politicians would swarm over him like flies; then if any one of those little things just noted should become aggravated, Theodore Roosevelt would have to fight for his political life, and that, too, handicapped by the fact that he would only fight fair, whereas his enemies, aided by unlimited financial lubrication from Wall Street, would ride him down ruthlessly with the automobile of defeat. In a big fight—a fight so big that the politicians would risk making it—Theodore Roosevelt would lose the South and much of the East, perhaps even New York; his nomination would have to come from the country west of Cleveland and north of the Mason and Dixon's line. These are things which the people should bear in mind. For the people are with the President, and the people can defeat the politicians. The men who are hurrahing and waving flags and talking most excitedly about the

THE CHRONICLES OF REM

By H. S. Canfield

WANDERINGS OF MR. AARON MURPHY, WHO HAD A "SENSE OF THE NORTH"

FROM Rem's shack on the North Fork of the Flambeau to Fifield is twenty-six miles," measured with a coon-skin, the tail thrown in." From his shack to Phillips, the county-town, is twenty-four miles; same measurement. He is eighteen miles below the slough, where the main tote-road turns off to the Fried Ham Hotel. Rem is a bachelor and sixty years old, with shoulders like Jean Valjean's, Colossus legs, and a nose hooked like Julius Cæsar's. He built his shack with his own hands, unconsciously imitating and improving upon Thoreau, making it of big hemlock logs, chinked with moss and mortar, a roof of split hemlock shingles and a stone chimney. It has stood for a long time and will stand when he shall sleep in the primeval forest that shuts him in on three sides like a wall.

Half a mile below him is a white man who has taken a Chippewa squaw to wife, and the man and the squaw are his only neighbors. Rem does his own cooking, and having the income of a garret poet with the tastes of Lucullus, does it well. No beans and purslane and roast woodchuck for Rem. He rises above the man who had "traveled extensively in Concord." The lean and fat of the deer are his—he has planted a little patch of rutabagas so that the bucks may come to it at night and thereafter be properly entombed—squirrels, ruffed grouse, wild geese, ducks, even beef sometimes. Rem has done many things and knows many things not known of the merchant and student, but most of all he shines in "Canada bouillon." That is made in a pot—ducks, ruffed grouse, salt pork, potatoes and half an onion boiled to a glorious pasty thickness. A wise, strong man will speed far to foregather with a gallon of "Canada bouillon." Rem has been a lumber-jack for more than forty years, and even now works in the woods of winters along with younger men, "falling" trees and making them ready for the spring drive. The Flambeau sings past his door ceaselessly and when the ice locks it murmurs lowly like a faint voice in a dream. In the pool from which he takes his drinking water the muskellunge lies recondite and the wall-eyed pike loafs and the black bass flashes like a meteor. The partridge drums from near-by coverts, the red squirrel scolds, and the hoarse voice of the giant woodpecker, "Hick's partner," foretells rain. Always the wind talks to the sad-hearted pines.

Rem sat in front of his shack in a chair of his own making. He made it of a pork barrel by sawing half through in the middle, splitting out some of the staves and leaving the others sticking up for a back; then he filled the bottom section with straw and old sacks. His only companion, Tom, a big yellow cat, returned from a woods excursion and leaped into his lap. Tom had gone out to fraternize with skunks, of which he was fond, but had changed his mind to hunting and had a feather or two clinging to his chops. Tom liked skunks for the occult reason that his master liked home-grown tobacco. The scent of each was fearful, but alluring. Rem told this tale:

"Murphy came to the camp three miles in from the South Fork when we were putting the tar paper on the sleep-shack. We had got the walls up and a barn built and there were thirty of us. Seventy more were coming in a day or two, for it was a big camp—sawyers, axmen, chainers, drivers, a heap of them. Murphy saw a cant-hook on the ground and he says:

"'What's that?'

"We stopped work to look at a man who didn't know what a cant-hook was. Big Bell, the boss, says:

"'What are you?'

"'I'm a cook,' says Murphy.

"'Bull-cook or cookee?' says Bell. Those are lumber-jack names for head cook and dish-washer.

"'I'm a cook,' says Murphy, 'and a good one, and I've hoofed out here for a job. Forty miles it is, and the divil's cess to the divil that laid out the road.'

"He was a little man with red hair and a red mustache, and he talked in a high voice like a woman's. When a lumber camp needs a cook it hires the first man who says he can cook, and if he can't cook it grabs him by the legs and throws him out and hires another one. We needed a cook, so Bell cocks his eye up at the sun and says:

"'You've got an hour to wrestle with the grub, and we'll find out whether you know the difference between good butter and Ole's imagination,' and that was his name for 'this 'margarine stuff that would poison a dog.'

"Murphy was little, but spry. The tools were ready to his hand. Every lumber-camp has got a range that costs from sixty to a hundred dollars and enough pots and pans to stock a hotel. People who think they haven't don't know lumber camps. And the men have got to have good things to eat or they won't work; fact is, unless they're pampered they can't stand the work. Murphy dumped the kossoo he had his duds in and skinned out of his mackinaw jacket, and he knew his business. A camp cook has got to know his business. He gets seventy-five dollars a month and his board; and rustling three meals a day for a hundred big men is no joke.

"This little chap was the right sort of cook: he sung at his work. When you get a singing cook you've got a good one; same way with a woman they tell me; I've never tried it. When he wasn't singing he was talking, and if he couldn't hold anybody still enough to talk to he'd talk to himself. We found out a good deal about Murphy before dinner was over; found out that his front name was Aaron, and he got that name because he had an Irish father and a Jew mother, and when we asked him his religion he said he was a Baptist. We had a stew for dinner that I remember yet and coffee strong enough to pull the quills out'n a porky.

"That settled Aaron with us. What did we care if he was short-waisted and short-crotched? It wasn't more than a foot from his collar-button to the topside of his overalls, but that made no difference. He'd take a couple o' ducks and four partridges and some salt pork and potatoes and a little fifteen-X flour and make you a Canady bouillon that would stick to your ribs like grim death to a dead nigger; he'd sing five verses of 'Lillibullero,' with a fry-pan in his right hand tossing flapjacks and his left stirring venison stew with dumplings in it. When you get into the woods with a cook like that you want to speak him kind and give him half of your terbacker. Them cooks ain't born every day. That's what the first gang thought of Murphy.

"The second gang come in three days afterward, and 'long about the shank of the day when the boys were getting in from the woods you'd have thought that Murphy was in six places to once. He decked it up this way: It was up to him to give a better supper than he give the night before, and he done it. Murphy was earning five thousand a month, if he wasn't getting it, and we wanted to call him 'Mr.' Murphy.

"I been in many lumber camps, but that one on the Flambeau laid over all the others like a twenty-dollar gold piece over a nickel with a hole in it. None of the men had killed anybody that I know of, but they stopped just short of killing. If there was any fear of man, woman, God or devil in that camp it didn't come through the grain and show on the bark, and it took all that Big Bell could do to hold 'em down. There was Con Davis and Big Napoleon and Fool Thompson and Bull-Moose Johnson and Buck George, and twenty others known along the Wisconse from away above Minocqua to the Mississip, men with heavy jaws and open eyes and hard in the mouth. There's one thing that's not allowed in lumber camps, and that's fighting. A man that fights gets his walking-papers and goes away if it takes a peavy to start him. The company wants work, and a lumber-jack with his fingers chewed up and his ears gone can't work for a while. There's got to be a woodscock, though, just as there's got to be a camp-boss, and them chaps had to find out which one was woodscock. They fought it out away from camp, by the skids or along the logging-roads, and Davis was woodscock.

"It took a month to sift things down, but Davis was woodscock and the last man he made squeal was Big Napoleon, and Big Napoleon hadn't squealed from a week north of Quebec down to Saint Looey. Then everything was all right and the crews made holes in the woods. Davis and Napoleon worked together, both axmen and both sawyers from where the loggers grow, and it was something to see 'em. The sound of the axes was like a woodpecker rapping and when they started to rip the saw in the dust flew. 'Fall!' they'd yell, and a big pine would stagger and sway and come crashing down, and it seemed that almost before the roar of it died away they'd sing 'Fall!' and another would crash. Turn loose a pair of men like that and they'll let daylight into the thickest woods ever growed.

"And all of this time we were loving Murphy. Sometimes I wake up in the night and get to thinking 'bout the beans he cooked in a bean bole, letting 'em simmer and bake and get ripe all night, and in the morning they were like golden nuts and sweet all through. But though we loved Murphy you can't keep lumber-jacks' tongues still and he was an easy man to worry. He thought a heap of himself and would rise to any sort of bait. You take the smartest man that ever lived, take George Washington and put him in camp, and if the boys want to they'll have him crazy in a month. The little man liked the sound of his voice and talked as fast as a six-foot saw spins. He'd talk about Ireland for fifteen minutes, the words coming like logs jerking down a rapid, and then Davis would pick him up by the belt and blow in his ear and drop him in the ashes. Then there'd be a war-dance and some of us would have to hold Murphy head down by the heels till he cooled off. We never knowed that we was hurting his dignity—didn't know that he had any dignity, but he was like all the Irish, believed he was a king's great-grandson.

"I've noticed it often, and it's funny, but what a man knows least about that's the thing he wants you to think he knows most about. Murphy didn't know what a cant-hook was when he broke into camp; he'd found his way there by following a tote-road as wide as a street; it was a trail that a blind man with a wooden leg couldn't have missed; but he would have it that he was a woodsman. He couldn't tell a hemlock from a tamarack, or a tamarack from a pine with the limbs off, but that's what he swore to. His face got as red as his mustache and hair and he jumped up and down like a pea in a hot skillet when we laughed at him. The trouble came one night when Bull-Moose Johnson was trifling with him. Bull-Moose had a heavy head and face and could look more like a fool than any man I ever saw, but he had sense. Murphy says:

"'And for finding yure way troo th' woods 'tis aisy. Ye have only to remimber th' direckshun in which ye lift camp. 'Tis to the north, south, east or wist of ye, that's shure. Thin ye turn an' go to it.'

"'Ay,' says Bull-Moose, 'you're a great man, Murphy. Pity you can't sit on a stool and put your feet on the ground.'

"His size was another thing that hurt Murphy, and when the boys laughed he began to saw his right hand forward and backward across his body like he always did when worked up.

"'Ye'll find some day, ye big fat-head,' he said, 'that though ye can t'row a moose, old Colt has made me twinty pounds the best man. And I can tell ye the p'ints of the compass anywhere, day or night; 'tis no matther.'

"'Ay,' says Johnson, 'and how?'

"'I have a sinse of the north.'

"'You have what?'

"'A sinse of the north; I said it.'

"'Ay, and what do you mean by that?'

"Johnson had a slow, greasy way of saying 'Ay-y-y-y-y!' that would make a man want to hit him.

"'Tis the north I know, anywhere, any time, wid me eyes open or shut. I can feel it, ye fool. 'Tis always wid me, the feelin'. Blindfold me, spin me aroond fifty times and I'll p'int me finger at the north star. 'Twas born thot way I was."

"Johnson looked at him for a full minute. 'Ay-y-y-y-y,' he said, 'you were born a liar, you stud snowbird.'

"The little man stood all drawn together for a moment while we laughed, and he didn't look more than a yard high. Then he leaped at Johnson like a wildcat. The big one was tilted back in his chair with his mouth open, but he was as quick as lightning for all of his size. He raised one foot like a ham, set it in Murphy's stomach, lifted him from the floor and threw him over the table, just a gentle push, not using more than half his strength—but the cook went flying. He fell in a bundle and rolled over and then sat up crying. Strange for him, he didn't say a word. He was just broken-hearted. We didn't laugh then. We thought of all the things he had done for us—he was only a baby among all of them big, rough men, anyhow—a baby with a red head and a red mustache, but a baby just the same; a good little fellow was Murphy, and a cook, sure.

"Con Davis got up and walked over to Johnson and talked some stuff I'm not going to give you; it'd make your hair curl. Then he reached out and shut down on one ear with a hand, like two logs grinding together. He just squeezed and Bull-Moose squatted down in his chair like a hen partridge. He didn't look half as big then.

"Con Davis said: 'Squeal, d——n you!' And the man gave a little whimper like a slapped girl. Big Bell was lying in his bunk and he came over in his stockings. 'Quit or git!' he said. Davis looked at him and took off his grip. 'I'll quit,' he said.

"Next morning Murphy was gone.

"You bet we missed him at breakfast, but the cookee was made cook and we took a young Norwegian with a cough for cookee and got along somehow, but we never got any more Murphy bouillon and Murphy beans, and Bull-Moose was unpopular. We tried him, one after another, out on the tote-road that morning and he squealed three times and made five dog-falls. He could have whipped some of us, but we had him scairt as a buck in February with the timber-wolves on his trail.

"Now, there was two inches of snow on the ground and we tracked Murphy easy enough to the river and across. He had a foot no bigger than a woman's. Then he struck off sharp to the left, skirting Connor's Lake, and we knowed he was making for Griffin's camp thirty miles northeast. When we saw that we didn't care what become of him; felt like he'd deserted us; and when we thought of the jacks at Griffin's getting the grub we got hotter yet. We went back to falling and chaining, and let Murphy slide.

"Three days afterward a chainer from Griffin's showed up and asked for work; he'd been fired for fighting. We says to him:

"'How you like your new cook—ain't he right?'

"He says: 'What new cook?'

"We says: 'Murphy, the red-headed son of a king; ain't he a wonder?'

"He says: 'Don't know no Murphy; got the same old cook up there and he's worse'n smallpox.'

"This was at dinner. We looked at Big Bell and he looked at us. Then he says, pointing his finger: 'Ike Rawson, Rem, Tucker, Reed, Knutson and Jones—you've all got compasses.'

"We slipped into our mackinaws and rolled our blankets. Knutson threw twenty pound of grub into a kossoo and strapped it on. We hiked out of the cook-shack and down to the river without a word; Ike in the lead. He was an old landlooker and a good man in the woods. Murphy was lost.

"Now, you know, that's likely to happen to any of us. There never was a man so wise that he couldn't get balled up in the woods. I've been lost twenty times, but every time I knowed what to do and Murphy didn't. When you're lost the first thing you want to do is to look the fact square between the eyes. 'Twon't do any good to make out that you're not lost. Stop still and say to yourself, 'I'm lost.' Then sit down at the foot of a tree, lean your back against it, take out your pipe, fill it, and smoke it to the bottom. Then think the matter over. Get up and walk ten rods, come back to the tree and smoke another pipe. By that time you'll know what you are and what to do. Take a line and hold it, keeping your eye on a tree straight ahead, going to it and then going to another one. No difference if the line is right or wrong; it will bring you out somewhere. Murphy didn't know that. He hadn't the sense of a sapsucker.

"Maybe you know what being lost means to men that live in the woods. You tell a camp that a man's lost and every one of 'em will want to go hunt him right away. It is to them the most terrible thing that could happen—next to a forest fire. They've seen some awful sights finding lost men. That's why Bell didn't have to tell us anything when he counted us off with his finger.

"It snowed a little the day after Murphy left, just enough to blot out his tracks. The weather wasn't cold, four or five below zero. We followed easy enough to where he'd branched off for Connor's Lake. From there on his course to Griffin's camp would have been straight through the timber. We backed him to hold it for a mile or two—with his sense of the north and no compass. After that he was likely to go anywhere. Two miles beyond the lake we separated, to meet that night at Porcupine Run. It was only five miles farther on, but we wanted to hunt the woods. We hunted in pairs. I went with Knutson and helped him with the kossoo. We ran into the others after dark. They had a fire built, but no Murphy. They were waiting for the grub and had nothing to say. There was another day gone. About midnight I got up to throw on a log and found it was snowing again. Next morning Ike says:

"'How do you make Griffin's from here?'

"I set my compass on a stump to steady it and laid a stick to point the course. He looked at it. 'I make it that,' he said. The others made it that.

"'Well,' he said, 'that's one way we don't want to go.' His reason for it was that Murphy, being lost, would hit any course but the right one.

"'You've seen him walk about camp,' Ike went on. 'How would he travel?'

"We thought a while. I could see him plain, hustling about among the pans. His right shoulder drooped a little; he did most of his work with his right hand; when he looked at anything hard he had a trick of half closing his left eye, showing that he saw better on the other side. 'He'd swing to the right,' I said. The others made it that.

"'Somewhere within three miles of where we are,' Ike said, 'he got off his course. Say he went to the right. Then he hit the South Fork and crossed it. He wouldn't know enough to follow it up or down. We'll try it that way.'

IT WAS AN OLD CAMP TRICK

We broke up and headed east and southeast to cross the South Fork and found nothing. We did all we knew—built fires and shouted and fired our guns—an' got no answer. That made two days gone for us and Murphy five days out from camp. The next day was like the other. We were twenty miles from Bell's on the Flambeau and we knowed that the little cook couldn't have gone much farther. He was walking in a circle if he had any walk left in him, and we thought it funny that we couldn't find his track, for it hadn't snowed since our first night out. We quartered those woods like a bird-dog in a cornfield, but you know what the North Woods are, and you know that we were looking for a needle in a haystack.

"I got an idea that the Irishman had swung even farther to the right after crossing the South Fork and that would take him south. The longer a man stays lost the stronger his body-habit gets, and that's the reason why all of 'em, sooner or later, get to trotting in a circle. I told Ike about this; we'd looked everywhere else and we decided to try that. There was nothing in that section but a big tamarack swamp, but Murphy was likely to bulge right into a swamp in his state of head.

"I felt like a man had thrown a pint of alcohol into me at noon when I came to a little red pile, half buried in snow. It was made by the entrails of a moose-bird. There were no feathers and I knew that an owl or fox had not caught the bird, because then there would have been feathers and no entrails. Murphy had captured the bird and picked it as he stumbled on and then had cleaned it, his old cook-habit holding good, though he was starving. I could see faint prints in the snow, half-filled, and I followed them back for a hundred yards. There I found the pole with which he had killed the bird. It was an old camp trick. Moose-birds are great thieves and the cooks are always at it. They balance a pole on a stump and put a piece of meat or bread on one end of it. The bird lights for the grub and they slam the other end of the pole with a club. That jerks up the end and the shock kills the bird. Murphy had put a piece of his shirt on the end of the pole and the bird had come down to see what it was. It was a tussle between a fool man and a bird just a little bigger fool.

I back-trailed then and could follow for a while. Murphy had wandered about in crazy fashion. He recrossed his own tracks half a dozen times, and every time he made a loop that was as near a circle as a man could have run it with a stake and chain. Then near dark his trail ran into the edge of the swamp. I was a mile from our meeting-place and I gave it up for the night, but I was sure we'd get his body next day.

We hit the swamp in the morning and expected that his trail would circle us out of it in a little while, but it ran in zigzag. The bog was frozen as hard as a rock and we followed the trail by broken marsh grass. Two miles in we found an island, holding maybe forty acres and thick with hemlocks and tamaracks. Fifty feet from the edge of the island was a funny thing—a trail broad almost as a cowpath and running straight. We took it and stuck to it and it brought us back to the starting point. Here was a circle sure enough: it ran clear around the island. We walked it a couple of times and that didn't do any good. Then we found a faint trail leading from it and took that.

Maybe a hundred yards farther on we saw him. It was only a red mustache and a thin nose that stuck out from under his cap-rim. He looked like a bundle of clothes with a wooden man inside of them, leaning against a big tree, and he was making a queer, shrill noise. It made us stop and shiver. Crazy as a buck in running time, he was keening his own death-song. We moved as softly as we could, but he saw us when we were five rods away and, yelling like an Indian, jumped a log and did his best to get away. Ike and I were fast on our feet and we had him before he made fifty yards. Except for the moose-bird he had been nearly eight days without food. He had stuffed snow into his mouth until his lips were cracked open. He had traveled hard and had walked, I should say, three hundred miles, but he wasn't more than thirty miles from the camp at that. He didn't know any of us; didn't know his name was Murphy. We made him a little soup and put it into him; that's all we dared to give him.

"There isn't much more to tell. He never got his senses while with us and we sent him to town with a tote-team. He had one of them accident tickets the hospitals sell to lumberjacks and he got a cot at Ashland. We drove out the logs in April and I saw him in the summer. He'd got well all right, but didn't look the same. He never sung or whistled, and he told me that he had bad dreams."

Money Kings of the World

By W. T. Stead

Baron Shibusawa of Japan

IN THE preceding articles I have sketched in outline the salient features of the careers of the most notable Money Kings of the Modern World. I have now to describe one who, in some respects, is more remarkable than any of those who have preceded him in this series.

Baron Shibusawa, of Japan, although not much of a millionaire—much less a multi-millionaire save in Japanese yen, of which ten go to a pound sterling and two to the American dollar—combines in his own person many of the distinctive characteristics of the monarchs of the financial world. He is neither a king crowned, like Leopold, nor a roi fainéant, like most of the English millionaires. He reminds us a little of the founder of the Rothschild dynasty by his courage, initiative and enterprise; of Cecil Rhodes by his vast dreams of Japanese extension; of Pierpont Morgan by his skill in the promoting and amalgamating of great commercial corporations, and of M. Witte by the astuteness with which he conceals political designs behind the extension of financial facilities. And, over and above all these traits of character common to the greatest of his compeers, the Japanese Baron has distinctions as well marked and as remarkable as the characteristics which distinguish the land of the rising sun from the countries of the western world.

Japan, the island home of the romance and the mystery of the East, has often set the world in amazement since she condescended to enter the lists of modern civilization. But who could have anticipated that out of the ranks of the two-sworded Samurai, who forty years ago guarded the ancient home of a jealous and exclusive feudalism, there would spring a man who, at the beginning of the twentieth century, would be generally recognized as one of the best if not actually the supreme incarnation of financial genius, of business enterprise and of commercial expansion?

Baron Shibusawa the Morgan of the East

IN A RECENT conversation with an eminent American banker I was fortunate enough to secure a rapid sketch of the money kings of the United States. What he said was somewhat on this wise: "We have no kings in the United States, but only a plutocratic aristocracy. It is a modern feudal system. The Republic is portioned out between great interests, which have superseded the district as the unit of sovereignty. In England in the Middle Ages you had your duke who, from his feudal castle, exercised all but regal authority over the whole countryside. He levied tax and toll upon his vassals, he administered justice, raised armies, and ruled and reigned as the earthly providence—or the diabolical scourge—of the countryside. We have the same kind of thing in America, only the basis of the power of plutocratic feudalism is not territorial but financial. There are, for instance, the railway kings. They require nearly 200,000 miles of metaled way. Each of their vast satrapies represents the conglomeration of innumerable smaller lines. Each of these lords of the metaled way makes alliances, levies war, invades territories and reigns with despotic sway over a standing army of hundreds and thousands of able-bodied men. There are Pierpont Morgan and J. J. Hill at the head of one great confederacy. There are the Colossuses, Rockefeller and Vanderbilt, each with his own domain. There are Harriman and Cassatt and Gould and Moore, each with a distinct realm within which his will is law. What is the authority of a Senator or even of a President compared with the sovereignty of these men within their own peculiar domain? Then there are the great banking kings: Stillman and George Baker; the iron kings, of whom the most conspicuous, Andrew Carnegie, has just vacated the throne. Greatest of all is Rockefeller, of the Standard Oil, who taxes the light of the million in order to feed the lamp of learning which he has kindled at Chicago. Havemeyer, of the Sugar Trust, is another who might be named; of minor monarchs there is no end. These men are the rulers of the Republic to-day, or if not of the Republic, at least of so many citizens of the Republic that what they say goes."

Imagine a newly developed country in which, owing to the exceptional circumstances of its late awakening, it was possible for one man to concentrate in his own person all the authority and influence of all the railway kings, of the shipping rings, of the great industrial undertakings, so that he could be described as being at once the Vanderbilt, the Rockefeller, the Pierpont Morgan and the Carnegie of Japan, and you can form some idea of the position of Baron Shibusawa. It is, of course, quite true that his operations are on a smaller scale. The total mileage of all the Japanese railways does not reach one-fiftieth of the mileage of the railways of the United States. There were at the close of the century under four thousand miles of railway in Japan, which would be a mere siding to the gigantic system of the Vanderbilts. But it is all there is of railways in Japan, and in the formation of the private companies which constructed most of these Japanese lines no man was so influential as Shibusawa. On the sea Japan makes a better showing. Long before Pierpont Morgan conceived his great Atlantic combine, Shibusawa had created the great Japanese Mail Steamship Company, the fifth largest steamship company in the world, whose seventy steamers carry the Japanese flag over all the seven seas and earn a good dividend for the stockholders who have invested eleven million dollars on the faith of Shibusawa's financial genius.

In everything relating to the industrial development of modern Japan he has taken and still takes a prominent part. It must sometimes seem to Baron Shibusawa as he passes through the country as if he were the creator of its prosperity. He is connected in one way or another with over one hundred and thirty companies, and is president or director of between thirty and forty of the largest companies in Japan.

The Captain of a Score of Industries

A VISITOR to the Baron's beautiful gardens and house on the outskirts of Tokyo once asked him why he did not endeavor to remove some large paper mills which disfigured the view from his windows, and change the course of the railway track, which passed the foot of the hill on which his house stands. He replied that it would be difficult for him to complain, since he was president both of the mills and of the railway. Of banks the Baron has promoted numbers. Besides the First National Bank there are the Bank of Japan, the Yokohama Specie Bank, the Japan Industrial Bank and the Crédit Mobilier of Japan. Of miscellaneous companies he has started and supported scores for gas making, electric lighting, shipbuilding, weaving, spinning, hemp and rope manufacturing. His companies own collieries, build railways, make bricks and cement, manufacture hats and fertilizer, refine sugar, dredge harbors and manage stud farms.

His career is as interesting as his achievements are prodigious. He is only sixty-two years of age and his activity spans the whole period of the Japanese revival. I met him last summer in London and was much impressed by his youthful vigor and keen intelligence. Yet he was already in his teens when the American Commodore Perry first burst open the door by which Japan had shut herself out from the rest of the world. He was born in 1840 at a place forty-five miles from Tokyo where his family had for generations been engaged in farming pursuits, to which they added the culture of silkworms and the manufacture of indigo. Shibusawa was educated at home, and as a boy he is said to have shown little indication of the future bent of his genius. Like other boys he was noted for a fondness for fiction, a taste which being carefully developed led him to the reading of history and the study of Chinese classics. When he grew toward manhood he practiced fencing, and when he was old enough to swear allegiance to one of the feudal lords at Kyoto he displayed sufficient promise to be allowed to reorganize the military system of the clan to which he belonged, and, what is still more significant, to carry out various financial reforms in its administration. These were the days when Japan was passing through the pangs of her new birth. The power of the Tycoon was tottering to its fall. The star of the Mikado was already visible on the horizon. Young Shibusawa, although keenly sensitive to the spirit of revolution that was in the air, nevertheless entered the service of the Tycoon, and when he was twenty-seven years of age was appointed to accompany the brother of the Tycoon on his mission to Europe. He arrived in Paris on the eve of the fall of the Empire. Napoleon III had still three years to reign before the second Empire crashed at Sedan, and the ascendency of the Tycoon was also near its close.

The Japanese Mission naturally excited immense attention. It was the first, or almost the first, which had been dispatched from the far East to the farthest West. Napoleon did his Oriental visitors the honors of his capital, and the splendor and luxury of Paris intoxicated the young Japanese attaché. He saw with quick and piercing intuition that the old order in his own country was passing away, and expressed his conviction by a sudden and dramatic action, significant of the character of the man. He was a Samurai, one of the warrior class. He was attached to the suite of the Tycoon, and wore the traditional costume of his people. Realizing in a moment that the breach with the past must be complete and irrevocable, he cut off his top knot, discarded the Japanese dress, laid aside his two swords, and arraying himself in the sombre garb of the West European he had his picture taken and sent the photograph home to his family. It came to them like a thunderbolt from the blue. Never had they dreamed, not even in nightmare, that one of their race could be guilty of such apostasy. His kindred lifted up their voices and wailed aloud over the loss of honor, the ineffable disgrace that had overtaken young Shibusawa. The young man paid little heed to their lamentations. He was learning French in Paris, and, after all, he had but anticipated in his own person the revolution which was about to be accomplished by his whole nation.

When he returned to Japan he found the country heaving in the throes of incipient revolution. He continued in the service of the Tycoon, and when his chief surrendered power into the hands of the Mikado, Shibusawa was appointed to a subordinate post in the department of the Treasury. In 1870, when he was thirty years of age, he became Assistant Vice-Minister of Finance. It was an eventful time, one in which men of capacity found ample opportunity for making their mark. In those days Japan was blessed with a rice standard of currency, and the land was flooded with depreciated paper, with a face value of so much rice, which was practically inconvertible. This evil system Shibusawa, with the support of Count Inouye, succeeded in reforming; when he left office the notes were at a premium. Shibusawa was appointed inspector of trade, and it was after observing the operation of trade and commerce that he decided to abandon a political for an industrial career. He says: "I realized that the real force of progress lay in actual business, not in politics, and that the business element was really the most influential for the advancement of the country, so I gave up my political position and devoted my life to business, in which I have continued until to-day. I soon came to the conclusion that the capital of an individual is not enough to accomplish very much, and I then became the means of introducing the company system into Japan. The idea was successful and the Government approved it. Since then I may say that every industry in the country has increased—some twenty times, some ten times, and none less than five times."

Oriental Prejudices Against Trade

THE immediate cause of his resignation, however, was his inability to check what he regarded as the ruinous extravagance of the Mikado's Cabinet. Count Inouye and he had with great difficulty established the currency on a sound basis and had restored the value of the Government paper only to find everything jeopardized by an extravagant ministry.

Americans, to whom nothing appears more natural and obvious than the exchange of a political position for an industrial career, cannot appreciate the courage which was displayed in thus stepping down and out from the official hierarchy into the then despised ranks of the merchant, the trader and the banker. Shibusawa was not deficient in courage. He saw where real power lay, and although it seemed to his people that he was making sacrifice of a promising career he was not afraid to stoop in order to conquer. He conquered, but the struggle was severe, and even now the battle is not wholly won. Only last year on his return from the Western World he told the Tokyo Chamber of Commerce that in Japan the old prejudice still held its ground. He said: "All the countries of Europe and America vie with one another in developing their own respective commercial interests, while the case stands quite different in Japan, where the old feelings of contempt against the trading class still retain their influence to a great measure. Business men may be partly to blame for it, but our society at large must also be held responsible. Unless the standing of business men is raised in Japan her future will be anything but happy and promising. The war, not of soldiers, but of business men, is being constantly fought nowadays all over the world, and the crown of victory will rest with those who are successful in their commercial enterprise. The lamentable condition of our trading class will result in hampering the progress of the country."

He did not allow it to hamper him. His first act when he gained an independent position was to found the First National Bank, an institution which is very much on the lines of the American National Banks. Acting at first as superintendent, he was soon appointed president, a post which he has held ever since. In 1878, on the formation of the Tokyo Chamber of Commerce, he was appointed its president. He still holds this position.

To tell the story of his subsequent achievements would be to write the history of the industrial awakening of Japan. Shibusawa had never much capital of his own to dispose of. But he commanded confidence, and that gave him command of the capital of the people. The joint stock company was the magic wand by which he worked his miracles.

Having decided to adopt business as his career he remained deaf to all entreaties to return to politics. Not even Count Inouye, his former chief, could induce him to accept a post in the administration. The temptation, it must be admitted, was not very great. On accepting office he would have had to resign all his directorships and abandon the control of the great industrial and financial combinations of which he is the life and soul. Notwithstanding the prejudice against the mere banker, the Emperor delighted to do Shibusawa honor. He appointed him a member of the House of Peers, which post he resigned, however, in 1891. He was created a Peer with the title of Baron in 1900. He was the first business man who was ever ennobled in Japan.

Baron Shibusawa has a healthy detestation of militarism. He was, to put it frankly, quite disgusted when President Roosevelt could find nothing better to say to him than to congratulate him upon the naval and military prowess of his countrymen. When he returned to Japan he told his countrymen: "I was warmly received by the prominent men of the world, but on what grounds? The President of the United States praised Japan because of her military prowess and fine arts. Are not Germany, France and England praising Japan to the sky on the same grounds? If the warm reception that I received abroad is based on the feelings that I come from a country known for its military exploits, I must confess that that reception is a death-blow to our cause. Because too much militarism, I am afraid, will sap the very life of a nation." A sound sentiment which does honor to the man.

Yet Baron Shibusawa is no "little Japanese." "No pent-up Utica contracts his powers." He aspires to command the trade of the Pacific, to extend Japanese influence over Korea, and to make Japan one of the greatest countries in the world. He holds the views that the Orient belongs to Japan for commercial purposes. He told Alfred Stead: "I think we can supply the Oriental markets even now better than any other nations can, although the trade is necessarily mostly in the form of exchange of products. The trade of the Oriental countries will come to be regarded as Japan's natural share, and she is already well capable of supplying it." He is no wild dreamer, however, and he is under no delusion as to the possibility of Japan being able to compete "for two or three generations, at least," in European and American markets. Japan's reliance in this international rivalry must not be placed on the cheapness of her labor. Her hope lies in increasing the skill of her workmen and in improving the morality of her people. He told the Tokyo Chamber of Commerce last year some home truths under this head. "In spite of myself, I hesitate to say that Japan has as high morality in commerce as England, America and Germany. As long as the present low state of morality is continued, all our attempts to obtain capital from abroad would be absolutely futile. Laws may be improved, but the barrier of morality is by far the stronger of the two. Let us use every possible means to improve the standard of our business morality."

He is opposed to the latter-day craze of attempting to push business by conquest. But he is keenly alive to the importance of developing binding relations with Korea, which is the natural Hinterland of Japan. His chief work for the Empire at present is his task of commercially developing Korea. He has founded many agencies of his bank in the principal towns; his bank manages to a great extent the finances of the country, and greatest of all his triumphs, his construction of the Chemulpo-Seoul and the Seoul-Fusan railways promises to rival the Russo-Chinese Bank and its railways in results.

Baron Shibusawa also owns gold mines in Korea, which will be worked to great profit when the railway line is in working order. One of the features of the railway line is the provision that at each station of this Korean Railway there must be a hotel fitted up in European fashion.

In his dealings with Korea Baron Shibusawa reminds us of M. Witte and of Mr. Rhodes. Fortunately, he shows no disposition to imitate the impatience which led Mr. Rhodes to launch his country into the ruinous catastrophe of the South African war.

What Shibusawa Thinks of Europe

Baron Shibusawa is keenly alive to the need of introducing capital for the purpose of developing the vast resources of his country. His passionate patriotism never blinds him to the benefits which Japan can reap from a judicious study of foreign nations. He is never so eloquent as when protesting against the old, narrow, exclusive spirit which he regards as scandal. Progressiveness and conservatism are inconsistent. I once asked him what he thought of the Government of Great Britain. "Your conservatism," he replied, "is so strong as to render progress very difficult."

In France he chiefly admired the Paris Chamber of Commerce. He says: "It appeared to me to be by far the best regulated of all the chambers of commerce I had seen. Having been organized under a system of strict legal supervision, it has under its control the Trade Investigation Bureau which is run by the combined efforts of itself and the Government. Reports are regularly drawn up by the Bureau to give accurate information concerning the commercial condition of the world." But France, he thought, notwithstanding her Chamber of Commerce, is the country for artists, not for practical business men. Germany he admired "for the calm, quiet, scientific manner in which with her people science and commerce go hand in hand." Of the English he spoke with enthusiasm for the earnestness and sincerity with which they prosecute all their undertakings. "Their spirit of steadiness and perseverance," he said, "strikes terror even into the hearts of the progressive Americans." In this respect he thinks they set an example to his own countrymen, who are wildly impulsive, but are too easily discouraged when economic conditions are hard. American readers will, however, be most interested in his observations upon the United States. He says: "Commerce and industry in America are progressing by leaps and bounds; America is a great assimilative force. Men of all ranks differing in temperament and training are formed into one body. Each man in America pushes his own interest without taking into consideration the case of others, and yet when any vital question requiring the united action of the whole arises, they all coöperate and work under the principle of America as a nation. America is rich in agricultural products and progressive in industrial enterprises, and knows no bounds to her future development. What I am most concerned about is the fact that the progress of America will not be confined within its own domain, but she will spread her wings of progress to the far East. Japan will have, indeed, a strong rival in America for spinning, weaving, and in paper manufacturing. Moreover, America can furnish money at low rates of interest and can adopt the latest mechanical appliances handled by the most experienced workmen. America can produce things on a large scale, thus reducing the cost of raw materials; everything in Japan is just the opposite—the interest high, the machinery small and imperfect, workmen inexperienced and the productive power insignificant.

"Paradoxical as it may appear, America, which was the first to introduce us to the civilization of the world and which has been our warmest friend, will turn out to be Japan's strongest rival in the field of commerce and industry."

Baron Shibusawa is very sanguine as to the future of his country. He has a level head and is not carried away by the impulsiveness which characterizes so many Japanese. He stood almost alone after the Chinese war when he denounced the reckless investment of capital which followed the payment of the indemnity. The disasters that followed the disregard of his warning will perhaps make his word more potent in a future crisis.

The Baron is a man of great philanthropy and he is perhaps more interested in the Asylum for the Poor in Tokyo and his school for the reformation of bad boys than even in the development of Korea. Certainly when he was in London he was much more interested in Doctor Barnardo's Orphanage than the splendors of the coronation.

The Baron is of medium Japanese height, sturdily built, with a strong face, full of quiet force and determination. A recent writer has thus described him: "His head large and fully rounded, and his broad athletic shoulders of leonine structure and suppleness really constitute the man. His face, which in a photograph does not seem very foreign, is highly characteristic of the best type of Japanese manhood. It is wide and full, and crowned by a broad, liberal, overtopping brow. His eyes are small, but piercingly keen, though soft and expressive in conversation. The Baron meets all men as equals. There is no hauteur or stiffness, and he talks without the palpable reserve so common and so disagreeable in men who have fought their way through difficulties."

Alfred Stead, who spent some time in Japan in 1901 and had frequent opportunities of studying the Baron at home and in his business, has put on record in his interesting and useful volume, Japan, Our New Ally, the following estimate of the regard in which Baron Shibusawa is held by his own countrymen:

"Baron Shibusawa is beloved of every one, rich and poor, great and small, and go where one will it is impossible to hear a bad word about him, or hear tell of an unkind action. Such a reputation is rare, and yet with it Baron Shibusawa is acknowledged as the most powerful influence in economic circles in Japan."

It is well to have to close this series with such a pleasant picture of the well-won popularity of a Money King.

Her Lenten Sacrifice

By S. E. Kiser

Devoutly now she turns her soulful gaze
From worldly things; she ceases for a while
To dazzle at the play; a pious smile
Around her rosebud mouth demurely plays;
She turns from cards and dances, and arrays
Her graceful figure in a modest style;
No gems the whiteness of her neck defile,
No jewels on her slender fingers blaze.

Ah, let the sweet Recording Angel write
A fair account of this fair one below,
Who, having for a space withdrawn from sight,
Sits not impatient with a mask of woe;
By day she reads love stories, and at night
She talks them over with her latest beau.

Author of By Bread Alone

De Interruptin' Woman

I LEFT de countree sooner en usual dat year 'count ef meh hard luck wid de Honoluler Queen, an' I steered back ter de city late in de fall 'stead ef early in de winter. Winter an' summer is sure ter come along jist when yer don't want 'em, de same ez de cops. It seems ter meh, too, which I wish yer could explain, dat cops an' winter jines hands jist fer ter bother hobos an' fer nothin' else.

I went over ter de Star ef Hope ez soon ez de freight car brung meh ter town, but Sam de Scribe ner none ef meh old friends was in yet, an' I was lonesome an' hungry. De night was rainy an' dark an' cold, an' I didn't feel much like huntin' aroun' fer work, but dere was no way out ef it, an' a hungry stomick don't ask no adwice ef yer feelings, anyways. I 'spose a stomick was give us ter keep us movin', same ez four legs was give ter a horse, eh? I walked over north a bit an' picked meh out a corner fer ter stand on an' watch fer pickings, but nothin' come along, not even a cove wid a dime, an' I was gittin' so tired dat I thought ef huntin' meh out a place ter sleep in a alley, when a big, fat lady marched up wid a satchul in her hand, a-puffin' an' a-blowin' like ez ef de satchul was fatter en her.

She gives meh a slip ef paper ter read which says, "Mr. P. G. Martin, 1009 Fernwood Place," an' she axes meh does I know where dat place is. I didn't know, never havin' heard ef it, but I says, "Sure, mum, I knows. Yer walks eight blocks east an' den yer turns two south, an' den——"

"Eight blocks!" hollers she; "dey tole meh it was jist a step er two from here."

"Ef dat's so," I says, "den take two steps an' see ef yer kin see it. I ought ter know, 'cause meh father lived an' died here, an' meh grandfather has a street named ater him, an' meh grandmother——"

"I don't care ter know yer family hist'ry," interrupts she, "but where Fernwood Place is."

"I jist was tellin' yer," I says; "yer walks eight blocks east an'——"

"I can't carry dis big satchul dat far," she interrupts agin, "an'——"

"What's in de satchul?" I axes.

"Dat's none ef yer bizness," she says, "an' it don't make no diff'runce, anyways."

"I jist wanted ter know," says I, "'cause ef it was glass an' it broke I'd be responsuble ter de law."

"I niver heard ef sich a thing," says she, a-lookin' aroun' ter see ef she could find some one else, which she couldn't.

"Stranger here?" I axes.

"What else does yer want ter know?" axes she. An' she takes up de satchul an' turns east, like I told her, which might 'a' been right an' might 'a' been wrong, an' she puffs an' blows, an' den she hollers fer meh ter come along.

"How much will yer charge?" she axes agin.

"Ater eight o'clock we charges ten cents a mile," I says.

"An' how many miles is it?"

"It's three miles goin'," says I, "an' four miles comin' back, 'cause——"

"I niver heard de like," interrupts she, "niver; yer don't need ter take de satchul back, an' de charge is terribul. I'll get a cab; it's cheaper."

"I'll call a cab, mum," says I; "meh Cousin Mike——"

"I don't want nothin' ter do wid yer fam'ly," she cries.

"Yer unreasonuble, mum," says I; "is Mike ter blame ef——"

"Yer kin go," she interrupts agin, her bein' speshul on interruptions; "I wants no more ef yer an' yer impudince. Ef yer don't go I'll call a perlice."

"Let meh call a perlice fer yer, mum; meh Cousin Handy——"

"Ought ter put his fam'ly in jail first," interrupts dis terribul interrupter oncet more.

An' I walks away cursin' mehself fer bein' so foolish an' axin' so much an' losin' sich an easy job, when she hollers out agin:

"Say, how much will yer take ter carry de satchul dere only?"

"Ten cents de whole ways," I says, "an' nothin' fer comin' back."

"Yer changes yer charges mighty quick," says she.

"Well," says I, "widder ladies is half price."

"I ain't no widder lady," she yells.

"But yer's dressed in black," I says.

"Dat's meh own bizness," she hollers; "I didn't want yer fer ter marry meh, but ter carry de satchul. Take de satchul, an' march ahead; I'll foller behint."

"What fer behint?" axes I. "I ain't perticuler; yer kin go ahead ef yer likes. I won't charge no more."

"Hurry on," says she; "yer talks more en ef it was a lawsuit. An' I'm late now, an' ef de lady is out——"

"Ain't yer de lady?" I axes.

"Hurry 'long," says she.

So I hurries on fast ez I could fer a block, her a-blowin' an' a-puffin' behint meh.

"Don't go so quick," she pants; "I can't keep up."

"Yer told meh ter hurry on," I says.

"But not ter run," says she.

So I walks on slower en a muskeeter in winter, an' her gittin' madder en madder, but not darin' ter say a word fer fear I'd run agin, but finally she pipes out:

"I wished I was thru wid yer, I do."

"I wish yer was, mum," says I, "fer it'll be past ten afore I gits home, an' meh wife an' de childrun'll worry. An' I'll have ter stop ter buy bread, an'——"

"Yer fam'ly ain't nothin' ter meh," says she. "Hurry on. But yer needn't run, an' yer needn't creep along like merlasses!"

"Merlasses!" I shouts. "Good, mum; I'm glad yer said it; I almost fergot dat meh wife wanted——"

"Go on!" she screams, "fer de love ef Heaven, go on. Yer kin write meh de hist'ry ef yer fam'ly aterwards."

"But I can't write, mum," I says, startin' ahead meedjum quick. An' I goes on a block er so, an' den I stops ter mop meh brow.

"What's wrong now?" axes she.

"It weighs like iron," I says, "an' I'm goin' ter open it ter see what's inside ef it afore I goes on."

"Don't yer dare!" she hollers. "I niver heard de like ef yer in all meh life. I'll call fer a perlice."

"All right," I laffs; "I was only a-foolin'."

"Well, don't fool no more," she groans; "dis is bizness."

"Awful bizness, too," I says, "a-carryin' a iron satchul eight blocks fer ten cents an' nothin' goin' back."

"I'll give yer fifteen ef yer hurries," sighs she.

"I'll hurry," I says. An' I drops de satchul agin.

"What be yer droppin' it fer now?" she axes.

"Ter change hands," I answers.

"But yer kin be gentle," she says; "yer'll smash everything an'——"

"But yer said dere was no glass in it," I says.

"How kin yer wife an' yer childrun live wid yer?" she says; "I don't——"

"Well," I says, "dey changes orfi, meh wife goin' ter her sister's some weeks, an' de childrun——"

"I ought ter have known better," she groans, "en ter start yer on yer fam'ly hist'ry agin. What a man yer is!"

"Meh wife oncet tole meh Cousin Moses——," I says.

"Go on; fer de luve ef Heaven, go!" she screams, "er I'll carry de satchul mehself."

So I trots on a piece, not wantin' ter lose de job, an' den I stops. "Summer en Christmus, an' winter en Fourth ef July!" I screams.

"What's wrong now?" she axes.

"We're here now," I says, a-readin' de name Fernwood Place on de lamp-post, luck bein' wid meh fer oncet.

"Yer rascul!" she screams. "Yer didn't know where it was an' yer'd 'a' lost meh, yer would."

"I did know where it was, mum," I insists, "only, as yer knows, de world keeps a-turnin' an' a-turnin', an' Fernwood Place is here now an' ter-morrow it'll be where Chinee is, an' the nixt day it'll be in——"

"Go 'long, yer rascul," she says; an' she gives meh de fifteen cents.

"Don't I get anudder nickel?" I says.

"What fer, I'd like ter know?" axes she.

"Fer savin' carfare," I says.

"No cars runs here," she says.

"Dey does," I says, "but I fergot."

"An' yer has de impudince," she hollers, "ter put meh to de trouble an' worry ef walkin' an' den ter ax fer five cents asides?"

"But I saved yer ten," I says, "an' yer kin keep five ef it."

"Yer villian! yer hoodlum! yer rascul!" shouts she; "go 'long, er I'll call de perlice."

"Yer no lady at all," I answers back, "callin' meh all dose names, an' cheatin' meh outen ef meh five cents. An' asides, yer interrupted meh five times, which——"

An' she walks away, not answerin' meh, knowin' she was in de wrong an' meh in de right; an' I watches her goin' inter P. G. Martin's house, meh gittin' madder an' madder dat she called meh de names an' cheated meh outen ef de five cents. An' I waits a while an' den goes to de house an' rings de bell, an' I axes de man what comes to de door:

"Please kin I see meh sister, de fat lady what jist come in wid de satchul?"

An' de man looks at meh sharp an' he says, "Come in," an' he lets meh in de vestibool, an' he sings out:

"Jane, tell de new cook her brother is here ter see her."

An' de lady whose satchul I carries shouts, "Dat's funny; de only brother what I got is in de English Army." An' when she sees meh, she says:

"Yer villian, yer here agin?"

"Ashamed ter recognize yer relatives," I says, "'cause dey's poor."

"Go 'long!" she screams; "I'll have de man call fer de patrol."

"An' arrest yer brother?" I says.

"I niver seen dat hoodlum afore ter-night," says she, "when I——"

"Den yer jist give meh back dat quart bottle ef whisky what I put in yer satchul, fer a presint, afore yer left home," says I.

"THREE MILES GOIN' AN' FOUR MILES COMIN'"

"It's a lie," hollers she, a-gittin' red in de face; "I ain't got no whisky. I never drinks."

"Open her satchul an' see fer yerself, Mr. P. G. Martin," I says.

"How did yer learn meh name?" axes he.

"She tole meh," says I, "when she axed meh ter write her riferences."

"It's a villianermous lie!" howls she.

"I guess yer emptied dat bottle already," says I; "yer needn't mind gittin' it."

"I don't want ter keep no cook in meh house what has sich relatives," says de lady what Mr. P. G. Martin calls Jane.

"Yer pirfectly right, mum," I says. "Asides, as yer kin see fer yerself, she interrupts all de time."

"I don't need ter stay here," says de satchul lady; "dere's other places, plinty ef 'em what I kin go ter. But I wants dat rascul arrested. An' I wish yer'd call a perlice."

"I'll save yer de trouble," I says. "I'll call one mehself. Our cousins Handy an' Will is on dis beat."

"Yer kin go an' git yer satchul," says de lady Jane to de cook lady. "I won't have no cook wid two perlicemen cousins comin' here night an' day."

"It's a lie!" she howls, "a most villianermous lie!"

"Don't git excited," I says, "I'll carry yer satchul back. We kin take de cars dis time."

"Perlice!" yells she.

"I'll go fer Handy an' Will," I says; "Mr. P. G. Martin, I'll be back in a minute." An' I starts away.

An' dat was de last time what ever I seen dat fat interruptin' lady, an' it's de last time what I ever wants ter see her; but I'll bet dat she wishes dat she didn't call meh no villian, no rascul an' no hoodlum, an' dat she didn't cheat a poor man outen ef his hard-earned money.

Say, Mr. Anterpolergist, why don't yer study de science ef wimens 'stead ef de science ef man? Git wimens down ter a science, write a book on her, an' de peepul will stand on deir heads ter buy 'em. I'll trade yer de little Hebrew book on Moses fer de fust copy.

A TALE OF A PIGTAIL

IT WAS de same night, Mr. Anterpolergist, ater I left de interruptin' lady dat I went up ter Sam Lung's Chinee restaurint fer a bowl ef chop-suey ter cheer up meh cold an' lonely heart. I goes dere often 'count ef it's bein' cheap, an' 'count ef de Chineses bein' interestin' 'count ef deir ways, an' 'cause de oder yeagers is often dere. An' de first feller I seen was meh old friend Crutch McAllister. He was ez glad ter see meh ez ef he never knowed meh afore, an' we was new friends fer de fust time, which, I guess, is de best kind ef friends, ater all.

An' Crutch an' meh sits down at de table an' orders a cup ef hot tea an' a bowl ef chop-suey, an' Crutch axes meh, "Mollbuzzer, why is it dat niggers is black, an' us white, an' Chineses yaller?"

"A sailor tole meh, Crutch," says I, "dat in Afrikee de air is black, an' in Chinee, which is middle atween Afrikee an' here, de air is natcherally yaller."

"But why is deir speakin' so diff'runt en our'n?" axes Crutch. "A Chinee can't understand a white man ner us can't understand him."

An' I says, "Crutch, de sailorman tole meh dat we learns our langwidges from animuls, an' animuls bein' diff'runt in diff'runt places de langwidges is diff'runt. In Chinee de animuls is mostly pigs an' rats, which 'counts fer de squeaks in it."

"I guess it's so," says he, thinkin', "but why does Chineses wear deir hair in pigtails?"

"De sailor tole me, Crutch," says I, "dat in Chinee dere ain't no houses like here, an' dey all sleeps on de ground, an' at nights a terribul wind comes along an' dey ties demselves ter trees by deir pigtails so dey won't blow inter de sea, which in Chinee is close ter de land everywheres."

"A feller tole meh oncet, Mollbuzzer," he says, "dat ef yer sticks a pin er a horseshoe nail inter a Chinee it don't hurt him none, 'count ef his skin bein' yaller, but ef yer pulls his pigtail it hurts him more den ef yer kills a white man, which is de reason Chineses don't git deir hair cut."

"I'd like ter try it an' see, Crutch," says I, "fer I don't berlieve it."

"Ner I don't berlieve what de sailor tole yer," says he, which made meh mad, him braggin' he guessed he knew more about Chineses en meh, 'count ef his eatin' more chop-suey, an' so finerly we agrees ter ax a real Chinee an' find out.

Dere was a Chinee kid what worked in de restaurint what was half white an' half Chinee, his mother bein' Amerikin an' his father ownin' de restaurint afore he died. Crutch he calls de kid an' he gives him a cent an' axes which was right. De kid says us was both right, so I gives him a cent, too. Den I axes him why it was Chineses' names has allus a Lung in it, like Hop Lung an' Sam Lung an' Charlie Lung; an' de Chinee kid says dat Lung is de Chinee fer Smith.

Den de kid goes orff an' tells de Chineses in de room what we says, 'cause dey laffs an' laffs an' squeaks, which makes meh an' Crutch mad, seein' ez a Chinee ain't got no right ter laugh at a white man, us bein' white an' dey bein' Chineses.

An' I says ter Crutch, "I'm goin' ter yank de pigtail ef de big feller sittin' on de end ef de table afore I goes out."

"Don't do it," says he; "dey'll kill us ter death ef yer does."

So I said ez I wouldn't 'count ef him bein' afeered, but all de time I sits dere meh fingers itches fer ter grab de Chinese's pigtail.

An' I says ter Crutch, "I got ter do it, Crutch; I got ter do it."

"Don't do no sich thing," he begs, a-turnin' pale, an' he gits up ter leave de place, when he sees de big Chinee arguin' wid de kid an' callin' him names an' de kid callin' him names back agin, like kids will, an' de big Chinee hits de kid a hit on de ear, an' de kid goes away a-cryin' an' a-sayin' somethin' ter hisself.

An' Crutch he bends over an' says ter meh, "Maybe, Mollbuzzer, yer could git de kid ter pull de Chinese's pigtail fer ter git even."

"Maybe I could," says I; an' I calls de kid agin, an' I gives him a cent an' axes him what fer de big Chinee hit him.

"He's a uncle ef mine," says de kid, "an' he hits meh all de time jist fer nothin'. He hit meh ter-night 'cause bizness was bad an' he hitted meh last night 'cause bizness was good, I guess. An' I ain't a-goin' ter stand it no longer; I'm goin' ter run away."

"Dat's right," I says; "meh an' dis gent here'll help yer ter git away."

"How kin yer do it?" axes dat kid, him bein' Chinee an' Amerikin an' bein' twicet ez smart ez eny other kid.

"I'll throw yer out ef de winder," I says, "an' dis gent'll stand dere an' ketch yer."

"Not much," says de kid, an' he goes away, de Chinee uncle a-callin' him; but ater a while he comes back agin, an' I says ter de kid, "I'll tell yer how yer kin git away from here easy. Yer pulls de big Chinese's pigtail, an' meh an' him——"

"Not much, I don't," says de kid, turnin' white.

"I'll do it, den," I says, "an' yer kin run out ef de winder an' climb down de fire-escape."

"Yer kin pull it first an' den we'll see aterwards," says de kid.

So I goes ter de winder an' flings it wide open an' yells at de top ef meh lungs, an' all de Chineses 'cept de big feller, what was too fat an' too lazy, runs to de winder ter see what is wrong, an' I runs back an' pulls dat fat Chinese's pigtail wid all meh might an' meh main, an' he screamed out like a parrot in a fire.

"Who's right now, Crutch!" I yells out, "who's right now!"

An' de other Chineses runs back from de winder ter see what wint wrong wid de fat Chinee, an' de kid crawls along fer de fire-escape, an' Crutch yells out, "Go it, kid Chinee, go it; I got meh money on de Amerikin part ef yer!"

An' den Mr. Crutch he climbed down de fire-escape ater de kid like ez ef he wanted ter ketch him an' bring him back, an' de Chineses, which ain't fools even ef deir skin is yaller, seen what was up an' dey lightnings out ef door an' winders ater de kid.

An' I seen it was time fer meh ter be a-movin', too, but like a fool I stops ter give de fat feller's pigtail one more jerk an' he yells holy fire an' Jerusalem, an' two Chineses runs back an' grabs meh, an' afore I knows what happened de whole room was filled wid Chineses what come up from Chineetown ter see what de trouble was. I seen all dose Chineses an' I said meh prayers.

"What fer does yer pull his pigtail?" axes one Chinee dat speaks English.

"'Count ef him helpin' de kid ter git away," I says.

An' de Chinee translated what I said ter de other Chineses, an' dey jabbers an' yells at de fat Chinee, an' he yells an' jabbers back agin till I seen dere was trouble atween 'em an' dat luck had put meh on de right track ez I learned aterwards; for de fat Chinee an' de others had a fuss in de Chinee restaurint bizness an' de fat feller said he was goin' ter take de kid away; fer why I don't know, ner never learned. An' what's de use ef learnin', anyways, ef yer don't care?

An' dey jabbers more an' de fat Chinee whines an' jabbers back agin, an' a dozen ef 'em grabs hold ef meh, an' I thought dey was a-goin' ter turn meh inter a bowl ef chop-suey when a cop come along—which was one ef de first times in meh life dat I was glad ter see a cop.

"Now, you, what's up?" he axes ef de Chinee what speaks English.

"Dis feller here," he says, "pulled Sam Lung's pigtail, an' his pardner runned orff wid our Chinee kid."

"Why fer did yer come in here an' pull dis Chinee gent's pigtail an' raise a disturbince?" axes de cop.

"Well," I says, "I pulled his pigtail fer two reasons, de first bein' 'count ef a dispute twixt meh pardner an' meh dat ef yer pulls a Chinese's pigtail he turns green, an' I wanted ter see how a green Chinee looks; an' de second reason bein' dat de fat Chinee give meh pardner a dollar fer ter open de winder an' ter let de kid run away."

"Does yer expict meh ter berlieve dat?" axes de cop.

"I'll pull his pigtail an' yer kin see fer yersilf dat he turns green," I says, reachin' out fer de fat feller's hair, an' he yells an' squeaks, an' de cop gives meh a crack wid de club.

"I don't want no more ef yer nonsinse," he says. "Where did dat Chinee kid go?"

"Down de fire-escape," I says.

"An' where did yer pardner go?" he axes.

"He runned ater de kid ter bring him back," I says.

"Don't tell meh none ef yer lies," says de cop, rappin' meh wid de club; "tell meh where de kid an' yer pardner wint!"

"Here dey is right now," I says, hearin' de Chineses yellin' an' squeakin' on de stairs, an' Crutch McAllister a-howlin' an' a-yowlin'. "I tole yer he runned away fer ter bring de kid back."

An' dose Chineses comes in de restaurint shovin' an' draggin' Crutch in, an' he looked most awful tired ef life, but he keeps up his nerve an' he yells out ter de fat Chinee:

"Set up de chop-suey an' de hot tea; I brung yer Chinee kid back."

An' de cop he laughs an' de Chineses dey grunts an' dey squeaks, an' sure enuff a big Chinee feller wid a long pigtail has de little Chinee kid by de arm; an' I feels sorry ter see de kid cryin' an' lookin' so white an' skeered, an' I knowed he would git it most awful when us an' de cop was gone.

"EF YER PULLS HIS PIGTAIL IT HURTS HIM MORE DEN EF YER KILLS A WHITE MAN"

The Passing of the "Freak Feature"

THE Sunday newspaper has been so widely discussed during the past decade by vain and empty-headed persons who hope to see their utterances in print, that it is doubtful if even the most intelligent of our philosophers really comprehend the importance of the part that it plays in modern life. It is not, as those orators who hope to have their words reported declare, "the great Sunday sermon for the people," nor is it the vehicle of higher thought and the disseminator of useful and uplifting knowledge that it is represented to be in the advertising columns of the Saturday issue. It is, however, an instrument of extraordinary power in awakening a taste for reading and a thirst for knowledge in the minds of a class that in other countries read nothing at all and have no desire for self-betterment. In fact, the enormous sales of certain recent works of fiction can be traced directly to the influence of the Sunday newspaper, which has created an entirely new race of readers and book-buyers.

But the time has come when the Sunday newspaper must lift itself from the rut of sensation in which it has been traveling these many years past and accommodate itself to the growth of the very taste which it completely satisfied when it was as yet in its elementary form. Let it not forget the awful fate which has overtaken that other institution from which it has copied so many of its most striking features and which is now almost obsolete, the dime museum. This form of entertainment came into existence about the time that the Sunday newspaper began to acquire a hold on the popular American fancy, and both began with genuine "freak features," as they are termed. The one regaled its earlier patrons with such freaks of Nature as an elastic-skinned man who wore his outer cuticle loosely like a bathrobe; a double human being and dwarfs of the smallest conceivable dimensions. The other appealed for circulation on the strength of such edifying contributions as What the Newark Hack-Drivers are Doing this Week, with portraits of the leading hackmen, and The Care of Little Children, by Jesse Pomeroy. So long as their freak features were genuine, both institutions flourished, but in the course of time, thanks to the systematic pot-hunting of dime museum managers and Sunday editors, all the freaks in the country were used up and there were no more elastic-skinned men, and not a criminal of note who had not written himself out in an effort to keep pace with the morbid public appetite.

A veritable famine in freaks ensued and for a time the public hunger was partially appeased by fake freaks, such as mermaids of domestic manufacture, conventions of ugly young women who ate doughnuts and sawed wood, and tribes of Indian maidens who engaged in walking contests. At the same time the "great Sunday sermons for the people" were preached from such texts as The Man with the Sorest Ears in Troy, The New Cotillon Leader Who has Taken Society by Storm, and Heiresses to Countless Millions Who Wear False Teeth. From the moment of the introduction of these fakes the decline of the dime museum began and continued until but one of those once popular places of amusement remained in New York, which had formerly supported fully a dozen. The Sunday newspaper, however, has continued to thrive, but its future is already a matter of grave doubt to many of those whose dollars are invested in Park Row. At the present day the anxiety shown by these men is plainly indicated by the fact that there is no better paid position in a newspaper office than that of Sunday editor and none which changes hands more frequently, or leaves its incumbent in such pitiful nervous and mental collapse. As for the Sunday newspaper itself, its every issue is consumed as thoughtfully and criticised as freely as the salad in a German boarding-house, which is made by each of the boarders in turn.

The consensus of expert opinion points to a Sunday newspaper of the immediate future which shall be less "freaky" in character and of a higher literary and artistic merit. There are even optimists who believe that the time is at hand when a comic supplement with its worn-out jokes, bad drawings and glaring colors will cease to charm. This is too much to be hoped for, but the chances are that a reformed and greatly improved Sunday newspaper is one of the agreeable possibilities of the not too distant future.

Twenty Years of Navy Building

ON THE third of March, 1883, the New Navy was born. On that day Congress authorized the construction of the first steel-armored ships that ever sailed under the American flag—the small cruisers Chicago, Boston and Atlanta, and the dispatch boat Dolphin. On March 3, 1903, just twenty years later to a day, the New Navy, already grown to giant stature, was reënforced by a provision for five new battleships, aggregating seventy-four thousand tons, and some small craft. This single addition surpassed in tonnage and fighting power all the vessels authorized down to the time when Secretary Whitney turned the Navy Department over to Secretary Tracy, six years after the reconstruction of the fleet began. It was almost or quite equal in actual strength to the entire Navy in service at the beginning of the war with Spain, and it would have overmatched the combined fleets that wiped out Montojo at Manila and Cervera at Santiago. With the exception of the great program of 1900, this is the most extensive addition ever made to the regular American Navy in a single year.

The German scarecrow has been conspicuously in evidence for some time and has done good service in stirring up public interest and scaring Congress into making liberal naval appropriations, but the fact may as well be recognized that it is only stuffed with straw. The American Navy is stronger to-day than the German Navy, and at the present rate of growth it will become increasingly stronger year by year. The Kaiser's building plan is imposing—almost terrifying—taken in a lump, but its annual installments are modest compared with ours. The German provision for this year is two battleships of something over 14,000 tons each and one armored cruiser, against our five battleships, three of 16,000 and two of 13,000 tons apiece.

Not only is our Navy ahead of Germany's, and gaining, but with the new construction authorized we shall be stronger in first-class battleships—the solid, fighting power of a fleet—than either France or Russia. In other words, we shall have in about four years, if not sooner, the second fighting navy in the world. It will be incomparably more powerful than the British Navy was ten years ago, at which time the strength of England at sea had already reached a standard which few Americans expected us ever to attain. What the creation of such a force might mean in international politics may be realized from the fact that with our fleet against her England would have difficulty in meeting one of the great naval powers of Europe, while with us on her side she could hopefully face them all.

The three 16,000-ton battleships authorized by the new law—improved Louisianas—will doubtless be the most formidable vessels afloat. Even the two smaller ships of 13,000 tons each will be more powerful than the Oregon, the Kearsarge, the new Maine, or anything else we have now in service or shall have in service within the next two years. They will be worthy members of a fleet of twenty-four first-class battleships that cannot be matched by any other twenty-four ships in any navy of the world—bar none.

Why We Keep Lent

WE ARE now near the end of Lent, which in America has become, oddly enough, the most popular of religious observances. There are very few of the Protestant churches which do not now keep the solemn fast, at least during Holy Week, in some fashion.

This is explained every year in the newspapers with plenty of cheap humor.

"It is fashionable to be pious for a month in spring. People who give dinners or dances in Lent lose caste. Women retire to the winter resorts, not to fast and pray, but to repair their tattered wardrobes, worn out in the winter's balls. Housekeepers rejoice to be done with entertaining for six weeks in hopes that they can clear off the butchers' and bakers' bills"; and so it goes.

Such jokes are popular and are easy to make. No doubt there is a good deal of truth in them. Even the armies of the Crusaders had their Black Guard—gangs of thieves and cut-throats who marched with them under the banners of the Cross.

But we suspect that Lent has grown in favor with Americans simply because there is no idea so popular among us as that of self-sacrifice. We are not wholly given over to making money.

Two or three years ago the sons of millionaires rushed to Santiago to fight as privates to "give Cuba a chance," and in the Civil War the men of the whole nation offered their lives for an idea.

There is something in the proposal that we shall stop business and amusement and go apart alone to face God which appeals to every rational man. He takes stock of his goods. Why not of himself?

He knows that he needs to go apart and meet the truth about himself squarely. What is the use of the fight he is making for a bigger income? Of the hours, days, years of work which is wearing out body and soul for—what? Or, is he not working enough? What are the books worth that he reads? The dawdling days—the talk which goes for nothing—this companion or that—what are they worth? What is he worth? Some day in an instant a black curtain will drop across his path and no man will see him again.

Who is behind the curtain?

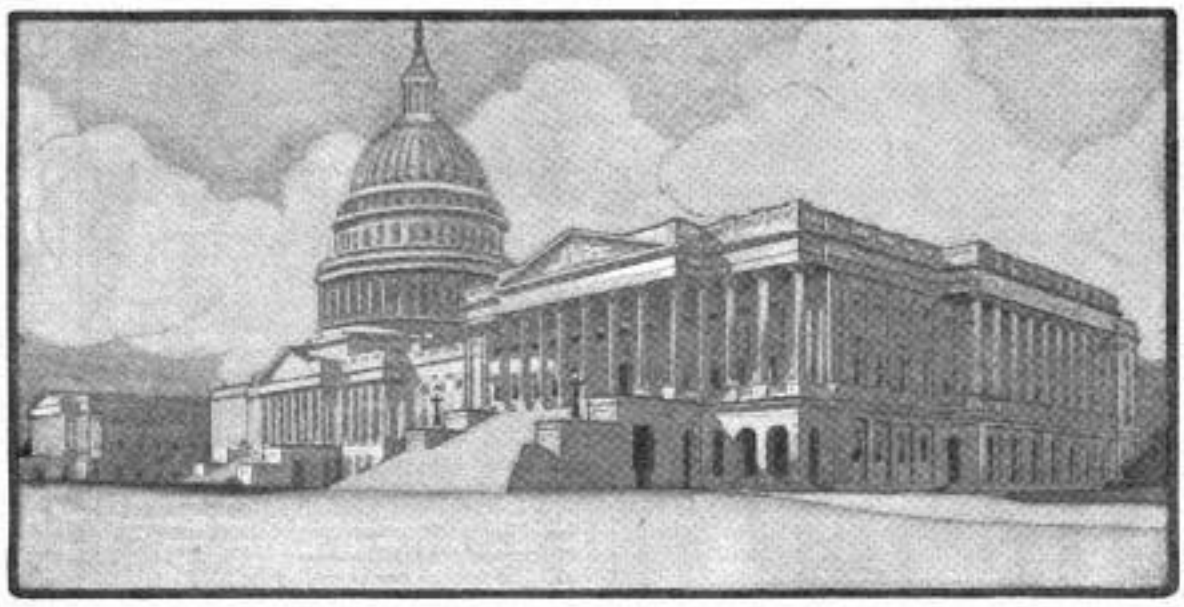
It is the business of a sane man to take time to face these things. It does not matter whether it be in February or in August, an hour every day or a month in the year.

Science as a Pastime

ONE who does not understand at least the rudiments of botany does not know what "the country" means. And there are comparatively few, even among the well educated, even among those who have studied botany, who do understand. Why? Because "practical" botany is not taught; because teachers of it and their scholars, as a rule, look on it, go through it as if it were as remote from the concerns of daily life and thought as is differential calculus. Botany is treated like a grand, lofty, learned person, one to be admired and respected, but never trifled with. As a matter of fact, botany is a plain, common, every-day person, as indifferent about the company it keeps as a pair of shoes is about the station of its wearer. Only within the last few years—ten at most—has anything appreciable been done to strip botany of its unfit classical cloth of gold and garb it in the working clothes of the masses to whom it belongs. As yet, the very mention of it causes alarm—and the upsurging of the latent impulse to yawn.

President Eliot, of Harvard, is now urging that it be taken out of the high-schools and colleges and put down to the primary grades—among the other "observation" studies. There can be no dispute as to the soundness of this position. For, next to reading, is there any other branch of knowledge which can so readily give so much pleasure to so many? He must be unimaginative indeed who does not see in the country, in the day-by-day progress of the annual melodrama of the birth, life and death of summer, a wonderful and powerful play, crowded with startling incident. But unless he understands at least a little of the language of Nature, he is like a man watching a play given by a company of "star" players in a foreign tongue.

There are some defects in education that are all but irreparable. A lack of knowledge of the rudiments of science is, happily, not one of these. And the laziest man or woman can overcome the deficiency with less exertion than is required in learning a new game of cards or a new stitch in that kind of needlework which is affected solely because it is useless. The day will come when, thanks to the efforts of men of genius applying themselves to the enormously important work of writing textbooks, the fallacy that "learning" is a task will give place to the truth that "learning" is a pastime.



The prejudice against "learning" is well founded. So-called learned men are responsible for it. So many of them are so dull and they write so dully that the average person says, naturally enough, "Heaven forbid that I should do anything to make myself that sort of bore." But if one will put aside his prejudice long enough to look into the thing he will find that the sciences hate the "learned" deadly-dull, dry-as-dust society in which they are compelled to spend most of their time, and that they long for the company of people with lightness of mind and with a disposition to laugh on the smallest possible provocation.

Science is not a task-master, laden with instruments of torture. It is a universal playmate, laden with toys and games that fascinate young and old alike. Some day we shall develop a race of writers and teachers who will show us this instead of hiding it from us. Meanwhile we shall have to put ourselves to the trouble of finding it out for ourselves.

Spring is at hand—is here for thousands of our Southern readers. It is the time for botany's magical spectacles that will prove to you that fairies do dance in the grass and that dryads do haunt the trees.

MEN AND MEASURES

By Charles Emory Smith

THE GENERAL INDIGNATION AGAINST THE LAST SESSION'S PROLONGED FILIBUSTER IS REFLECTED IN CONGRESS AND MAY BE EXPECTED TO PRODUCE RESULTS

THE long interval before Congress meets again gives ample opportunity for a deliberate consideration of the processes of legislation. The question is emphasized by the parliamentary block of the closing days in both Houses. The resort to filibustering has reached a point where not merely the principle of majority rule but capability of action is involved. Formerly it was a question of concerted obstruction by an organized party minority or faction. Now it has advanced a stage and become a matter of individual "hold-up."

Generally the last week of a session is distinguished by an indiscriminate rush of measures of all sorts to get through. But the last week of the recent session was marked by a blockade, not altogether pacific, to prevent any measures from passing. Chains were stretched across the channel. Old hulks were sunk on the line of advance. Concealed torpedoes and hidden mines menaced every approach. In the House there was sheer mechanical obstruction. The Reed rules, refined and sublimated to the last degree by his disciples and successors, checkmated any intellectual operation. No power of forbidden speech, no dexterity of impossible strategy, could avail to bar the way. There was simply the dull, monotonous resource of interminable and wearisome roll-calls. In the Senate, with its unlimited monologues, sometimes misnamed debate, its discourteous "courtesy," and its lawless law of unconsenting unanimous consent, it was simply necessary for a single Senator to pile his desk with irrelevant books and an inexhaustible box of troches, to stand on his pins and wag his tongue, in order to stop all legislation.

It was a study in the art of how not to do it, and in the existing system the negative is far easier than the affirmative. The obstruction developed a new impulse. Heretofore the motive has been to defeat a measure for the sake of defeating it, because there was a distinct object in defeating it. It is true that at the close of the Fifty-sixth Congress the versatile "Tom" Carter, of Montana, with his fecund humor and his volatile imagination, talked the River and Harbor bill to death, not because he disliked the River and Harbor bill, but because he had been balked on his scheme of irrigation. He was fertile enough himself, but his country was arid, and so he halted the dredging on the coast because he couldn't get dredging on the mountains.

But that was an isolated case until the last days of the late session blossomed with obstruction for the sake of obstruction or of retaliation. The filibustering in the House was not directed to the defeat of any particular measure. There was no bill pending which anybody had any object in beating. But the minority notified the majority that if they unseated Mr. Butler, of St. Louis, every possible hindrance would be interposed in the way of legislation for the remainder of the session. It was probably ill-judged in the majority to insist on unseating him at that late period. He had only seven more days to serve at the worst. The inaction which ran through nearly two years would not have been disastrous if continued another week. But whether wise or unwise, the majority exercised the right of the majority in purging the roll, and though the minority could not prevent that act they limited all business for the rest of the session to the small volume that could be enacted with the excruciating delay of an incessant roll-call. It was the substitution of a local freight train for the lightning express.

In the Senate, obstruction could not only block and curtail general legislation but it could defeat any particular measure. It was employed decorously but procrastinatingly through the whole session against the Statehood bill. Here was a keen fight and a distinct purpose. But it was equally employed at the end against the Philippine Tariff bill and the Aldrich Financial bill. Nobody really objected to either. Both were public measures without any politics. The first was needed for the commercial relief of the Philippines and the second for the currency relief of the United States. Not only did they involve no partisan issue but the general professions of the minority bound it to their support. Yet notice was served that both were to be strangled simply because the Statehood bill had been hung up. Thus in the development of parliamentary methods the point has been reached where the menace of choking meritorious and unobjectionable measures has become a weapon of warfare over controverted propositions, and nobody can resist a vicious scheme without incurring the risk of provoking a retaliatory crusade against the most needful and vital legislation. So the law of personal courtesy is fast degenerating into the lawlessness of public filibustering, and the rule of unanimous consent becomes the misrule of the individual "hold-up."

This enthronement of the individual obstructor reached its culmination when Senator Morgan opened the flood-gates of his inexhaustible vocabulary against the Panama Canal Treaty and compelled an extra session, and when Senator Tillman set his jaws against two great appropriation bills unless his particular appropriation was conceded. The one had a measure to defeat and the other a scheme to carry. Both adopted substantially the same method. Senator Morgan announced that he would talk the treaty to death so far as the regular session was concerned. Senator Tillman announced that he would talk the appropriation bills to death unless Congress yielded to his demand. Both accomplished their ends. Morgan forced an extra session; Tillman forced a surrender. Morgan held the Senate by the throat, and Tillman made Congress stand and deliver. In neither case was there any accomplice. The legislative marauder stood alone. The chivalry of unanimous consent had become the tyranny of the individual autocrat.

"Uncle Joe's" Protest to the Senate

"JOE," CANNON is not endowed with the graces of oratory. He will not be a Chesterfield in the chair, as he is not a Clay on the floor. But if the sword of his attack does not glitter in its polished steel and carry a hilt of diamonds, it cleaves and crushes in its pungent force. His vigorous denunciation of the imbecility of the rule of unanimous consent and of its letter of marque for the legislative privateer touched the Senate on the raw. When the Senate is challenged the Senate stands together. There was a chorus of cachination in answer to Mr. Cannon. But there was at the same time a manifest consciousness that his caustic criticism expressed a widespread and rapidly growing feeling of the helplessness of the Senate under the present perversion of its liberal rules, and of the contempt to which it will sink unless it rescues itself from this submission to irregular and defiant individual control.

The offspring of that consciousness was Senator Allison's resolution directing the Committee on Rules to review the rules for the purpose of determining whether any changes are necessary, and especially whether any limit should be imposed on debate. Such a movement on the part of such a Senator is significant. Mr. Allison is cautious and conservative by nature. He embodies the average spirit and sentiment of the Senate. Sound, experienced and conscientious, with the highest sense of public obligation, if all Senators were like him there would scarcely be need of rules at all beyond an order of business. His proposed inquiry suggests the need of some reform without indicating its scope and extent. This impression is confirmed by the simultaneous renewal of the proposition of Senator Platt, of Connecticut, providing that when any measure has been under consideration the concurrence of three-fifths of those present may fix a limit to the debate and determine when a vote shall be taken.

Mr. Platt is one of the wisest and sanest members of the Senate. He fulfills the ideal of the old Roman Senator in the best days of Roman glory. His shining sense, patriotism and sobriety make him a model Senator. He is responsive to enlightened public sentiment without being swayed by public clamor. He believes in power of legislative action without loss of deliberation. The feeling he everywhere inspires is that which the President one day voiced when, in reference to this high-minded statesman he said: "There is the true, unselfish patriot." Senator Platt would probably go further in the direction of parliamentary reform than most of his associates. Even the moderate cloture he proposes can hardly be expected. With all the manifest abuses which have excited opprobrium the Senate will still be reluctant to give up the source of individual power. If it could guard against the abuses without curtailing personal opportunity it would gladly do so. But the difficulty of eliminating the one without restricting the other will present a constant perplexity.

The House carries the extermination of talk too far. It has ceased to be an arena of debate. The notable speech is a rare accident. Outside of the ruling group the opportunity of speaking is a favor, and the highest incentive of most of the prepared efforts is the dubious privilege of a tardy and unwitnessed burial in the mausoleum of the "Record." The genuine, illuminating discussion is almost a thing of the past. The rules have reduced debate to a skeleton without flesh and blood, and have crushed all the life and spirit even out of filibustering. It has been narrowed down to the mechanical process of the continuous roll-call, and when the roll-call takes three-quarters of an hour it will be seen how little business can be done in a day. The one remaining step for the suppression of obstruction is a device for a record vote without the delay of a roll-call, and if the House can work out such a method as is used in some parliamentary bodies in Europe and at the same time allow a little more latitude in debate, it will become even less of a filibustering and more of a deliberative body.

It cannot be desired that the Senate shall come to the summary methods of the House. There should be one branch in which there can be full freedom of legitimate discussion. The objection to the extinction of debate is so great that it leads to a liberty which sinks to the most unbridled license. This tendency is aided by the impulse of the Senator to preserve a freedom which enhances individual power and which may sometimes serve his own particular purpose. He is willing to tolerate for others what may on some occasion be useful for himself. After all, it is considerably a question of whose ox is gored. Hosts of people were willing to see obstruction of the Statehood bill who were shocked at the impassable barriers erected against the Aldrich bill. Thousands quietly chuckled over Carter's "thus far and no farther" to the River and Harbor log-rolling who were indignant at Morgan's dam against the Panama Canal.

Indeed, until recently there has been fair ground for the claim that no vital and indispensable bill has been defeated in the Senate by filibustering and that when the majority were in thorough earnest for a measure they have found a way of passing it. It is true the Force bill was beaten in the Fifty-first Congress by obstruction, but some of the majority were half-hearted, and it is now generally regarded as fortunate that the bill failed. In the extra session of the Fifty-second Congress, which President Cleveland called in order to secure the repeal of the silver purchase clause of the Sherman law, there was prolonged factious opposition which baffled action for weeks, but it finally melted away before the resolute and uncompromising determination to accomplish the repeal. The rule of unlimited debate and unanimous consent has been tolerated and excused partly because it has been regarded as not an unmixed evil. It has probably in the long run defeated more bad than good measures, and if the balance were struck on the record up to the last session it might be found on the credit side.

But the recent carnival of obstruction has enforced the necessity of reform. The lord of misrule has played pranks that were never heard of before. It has now become a question whether the law of courtesy shall be so elastic that a single Senator can hold up the entire Congress for his own individual purpose, and whether the perverse obstruction of needful measures shall have free course to be played as a means of intimidating any objection to dangerous schemes. Heretofore the rule has been the defense of the minority; now it is the weapon of the individual. It is plain that the time has come when the Senate must protect itself against the whim of the filibuster or the menace of the bushranger. A legislative body which is impotent to carry out its own will becomes an object of contempt, and when it is compelled to yield to a single solitary guerilla it is little less than grotesque.

It is not to be expected that the Senate will adopt the general principle of cloture. We may safely assume that the ancient privileges will not give way to any such radical innovation. But it is likely that the rules will be amended so as to put a check upon obstruction during the closing days of the session, and especially to protect the appropriation bills for the maintenance of the Government from the danger of defeat through any individual caprice. The broader reform which would enable the majority to determine when legitimate debate on any matter under consideration had been exhausted and when it should be brought to vote will be more difficult to accomplish, and need not be looked for at present. But even the more limited rectification which will cut off the flagrant abuses recently witnessed will be a decided advance, and with the awakened perception of its necessity the proverbial inertia of the Senate will not long resist it.

Even with the difficulties of obstruction the session made a notable record. When both the legislative and executive branches of Government are considered, the three months mark large progress in the development of American policy. Perhaps the concurrent significance of all the steps was not fully measured as they were taken. The creation of the General Staff and the Militia Reorganization bill prepare the way for making the Army far more available and effective for an emergency than ever before. For the first time the machinery is provided for quick movement, for large operations and for intelligent prevision and planning. At the same time, without public avowal, without discussion and with only the perception which moves with silent purpose, the vote is taken which means that our Navy is to be the third in the world. And with all this the Monroe Doctrine is vitalized as never before.

Put these three facts together and see the improved position in which three months have placed the country. Through the Venezuela complication our Government has come to a more distinct assertion and a more definite grasp of the great dominant law of this continent. Europe has given it a more tangible recognition, and South America has seen that it is a substantial reality and not a mere sentiment. To American assertion and European acknowledgment and South American concurrence add the staff organization and militia expansion of the Army and the future potentiality of the Navy, and reflect on the doubled influence and power of the Republic. These correlated facts are the assurance at once of dominance and peace.

So much for the outward look as it has been affected by the winter's developments. The inward look has also been materially advanced. The session began with the universal expectation that there would be much talk and no action about trusts. It ended with little talk and all the action that had been planned. The creation of the Department of Commerce with the machinery of inquiry, the expedition of pending suits and the accountability of corporations and not of individual officers for discriminating rates arm the President with the necessary initial power. There were many smaller measures. But in the wide survey, and in the perspective of the future, these large coherent acts, wrought out by the executive and legislative branches together, will make the winter memorable in our national evolution.

THE PRESIDENT

By William Allen White

impregnable position of Theodore Roosevelt in the fight of nineteen-four are the men who would desert him at the drop of a hat.

One sees that in Washington continually. It is impossible to spend a day in the corridors of the Capitol without hearing some one say: "You know, of course, that I am for Roosevelt, but——" And there it goes. Congress is full of men who are "for Roosevelt, but——," and their chief joy is found in sneering at the reconstructed White House. Gaines, of Tennessee, gave them some comfort in his speech attacking the President's integrity and asking what became of all the money that was supposed to be spent on the improvements. His sneer at the President's social diversions, which are paid for, of course, out of the Presidential salary, tickled the ribs of the "for Roosevelt, but" fellows and they chuckle over it every time they get a chance. But, as a matter of fact, Roosevelt's social entertainments are particularly to his credit. If he chose he might save his salary. He is a comparatively poor man, and he has a large family. When he goes out of office he will have to support himself. A matter of a hundred thousand dollars saved from his salary would be a pleasant help. But instead of saving part of his salary President Roosevelt is using it all; he is doing so, not from a desire to spend, for instinctively he is a frugal man. Probably he believes that the salary of $50,000 a year is given to him to maintain the dignity of his office, and not that he may be able to leave that office well-to-do. The entertainments that the President and Mrs. Roosevelt give are many, but they are simple and not extravagant. They are in nowise exclusive. Any socially presentable man or woman in the United States, who comes to Washington introduced to the President as to any other American gentleman, may receive this White House hospitality. The musicals which Mrs. Roosevelt has given this winter have cost considerable money, but the number of the guests—that is, the entire simple democracy of these affairs, and not their lavishness—has made them expensive. The President and Mrs. Roosevelt have given many dinners—many more than the arbitrary rules of Washington official society require—but these dinners have been notable for their dignified simplicity of fare, and for the distinction of the guests, not merely in official circles but in every walk of life, and from every part of the land. Wealth has not been the distinguishing mark of these guests; the one characteristic which has marked all, who were not there perfunctorily, has been achievement. It is the man or woman who has done things that attracts President Roosevelt as it attracted Roosevelt the man before he came to the White House.

In no other way than in a purely social way may the President of this country get at the sentiment of the people. And in no other way than in a social way may the people of the country know the real heart of their executive. Naturally but a small per cent. of the people may reach the President in person, but if this per cent. is well chosen it will reflect the people of the home communities and carry back to these communities the truth about the head of the nation. More than this, it carries from the White House as the White House is managed to-day an abiding sense of sincerity in social relations and of democratic good taste in entertainment that cannot but have a strong educative effect. If the President cares to spend his own salary in these ways and for ends that are not required of him except by his conscience, his enemies who scoff at him for these things must have little else to pick at; but, on the other hand, when a man is thirsty for trouble he never has to walk far to a spring.

And the enemies of the President, the few of them who are bitter, in Washington, have a "ho! every one that thirsteth" institution which not only quenches lips that are parched by envious burning hearts, but which also douses cold water in the faces of those who are known to admire the President. It has been whispered about that dinners have been arranged several times this winter at which only one strong Roosevelt man will be present. There he hears such abuse, such vilification, such slander and jeering at the President that if he is a weak man he joins the mob; if he is a strong man he is astounded, and if strong and politic he is set to thinking. There can be no doubt but that there is a systematic, persistent effort among Washington politicians of a certain ilk to discredit the President with the strong, sincere men in Congress who are attached to him personally and politically, and also there can be no doubt that the animus behind this intrigue will take the fight against Roosevelt to the people, if the intriguers ever dare to do so. It is not to Roosevelt's discredit that these parasites bother him. Lincoln, who was straightforward, brave and wise, above politics, was afflicted with the same kind of itch!

In the coming eighteen months the American people may be put to a test; there cannot be the slightest doubt that there is at the head of this nation a man schooled to practical wisdom in practical life; brave and efficiently brave, as he is wise; earnest, direct, shamhating yet passionately patient in great crises, and above all a man erect, bowing to no master, abject only to his conscience. This is a man after the fashion that the people have created in their heart as an ideal for thirty years—and found him only in their hopes. Such a man is as sure to cross the purposes of men who live by devious ways as a merciless fire is sure to burn tinder. No diplomacy, no tact, no kindness of heart, no Christian charity can save him from giving offense to those who live in darkness, and if he should put peace, even party peace or peace in the nation, above duty, he would sink to the mediocre level of a skillful politician. The test will come to the American people when the rupture comes openly, if it should come thus, between Roosevelt and the politicians. Their excuse for the break will not be the real cause of it. Indeed they will probably assume the air of shocked honesty. If the people choose sanely then it will be because whatever the evidence against him, whatever the circumstances in which the duplicity of politicians may entangle him, the people know above everything, and in the face of everything, that Theodore Roosevelt is true.

Some New Fruits

ON THE reclaimed flats of the Potomac near Washington the Government is making experiments with a variety of vegetables unfamiliar to people in this country, most of which have been fetched from far-away lands by our agricultural explorers. Their possibilities are being investigated, and most of them are likely to become of economic importance in the United States.

One of these vegetables is the so-called "Chinese watermelon," which looks somewhat like a muskmelon, but has a hairy outside. Its flavor resembles that of the squash, with more than a suggestion of the cucumber, and it is said to be valuable for sweet pickles and preserves. Another novelty of Oriental origin is the "crosne," from Japan, which, while somewhat like salsify, is more delicate and better in point of flavor. Its little tubers are sometimes fried, but more commonly are made into pickles and salads. This valuable plant is easily cultivated, and its yield to the acre rivals that of the potato.

A new Japanese fruit which looks like a small yellow pear, though in reality more closely related to the apple, is the product of a dwarfish bushlike tree. It can be grown only in the far South, or else in California, which is likewise true of the "maritzgula," an African fruit resembling a glossy red cherry of extraordinary size. The maritzgula grows on a thorny bush, which is fairly loaded down when the crop is ripe.

Another valuable, and hitherto unfamiliar, plant is the "rosella," which is a shrub much resembling in appearance the cotton plant, and with blossoms like those of the cotton. The calyxes of the flowers, after the petals have dropped, are gathered and stewed. Jelly and jam are made from them.

Oddities & Novelties of Every-Day Science

HORSE-SENSE IN HORSE-FOOD—Nature is still ahead of us in scientific engine construction.

HORSE-DIET is the newest subject taken up for investigation by Government scientists, and some of the facts ascertained are likely to surprise those persons who think they are best informed.

Prof. C. Ford Langworthy, who is an eminent authority on dietetics in general, has had charge of this investigation, and in a bulletin of the Department of Agriculture he states that only thirty-four per cent. of the food consumed by a horse is converted into mechanical work. The remaining sixty-six per cent. is used in running the quadrupedal engine—to keep the heart going, for breathing, in the processes of digestion, for chewing, and to supply waste blood and tissue.

Experiments show that twenty per cent. of the energy contained in a horse's allowance of oats is expended in chewing and digesting the grain. Ten per cent. more may easily be consumed in fighting flies in the stall—an economical hint which ought to be useful to stable-keepers who care little for the comfort of their equine boarders; and too low a temperature in the stable may easily cause such a waste of energy as to require two pounds or more of additional oats per diem to compensate for the loss.

Nevertheless, a horse which converts thirty-four per cent. of its food into mechanical work is a far more economical machine than the best steam engine, which renders less than twenty per cent. of its fuel available in the shape of energy. In other words, the animal is a far more efficient piece of mechanism than the apparatus of steel, with its wheels, piston-rods and boiler. We may surpass Nature some day in the construction of an engine—very likely we shall—but up to the present time she is away ahead of us.

Professor Langworthy finds that the average horse produces in a minute enough energy to lift one pound 22,000 feet, or about four miles. In a working-day of eight hours the animal, if the energy it evolves were applied in that way, would be able to raise a pound weight 2000 miles—or, to put it otherwise, could lift a short ton one mile into the air.

The amount of food required by a horse seems, oddly enough, to be proportionate to the surface area of the animal, and not to its weight. A horse weighing 1200 pounds will drink somewhat over 100 pounds (fifty quarts) of water a day at moderate work. It will require two and one-fifth pounds of protein (muscle-forming stuff) per diem, and in the same period will use up 32,000 small "calories" or heat units. A calory is the amount of heat required to raise the temperature of one cubic centimetre of water from zero to one degree centigrade. One hundred pounds of oats contain 9½ pounds of protein and 122,400 calories. The same weight of hay contains 11¼ pounds of protein and 69,850 calories.

Eleven pounds of oats and ten pounds of hay make an ideal daily ration for a 1200-pound horse at moderate labor. Oats give the animal mettle and spirit. Beans are most appropriate for horses which are required to perform long-continued, sudden or severe labor. The opinion prevails in England that in the hunting field it is always possible to recognize bean-fed horses by their great endurance, and in that country the leading stables make much use of beans as rations.

In the assembling of his data Professor Langworthy has obtained reports from cab companies, packing concerns, department stores, fire companies, and other employers of horses in large numbers, not only in this country but abroad also. The greatest of the Paris cab companies, it appears, has succeeded, through experiments in scientific feeding, in saving $200,000 per annum—a result accomplished largely through the use of Indian corn, which, though not so rich as oats in the stuff that goes to make muscle and blood (protein), is an admirable fuel for running the equine machine.

The

earns unqualified appreciation on Fashion's avenue, because, on the boulevard, it is the beautiful finish, the graceful lines, the tasteful trimmings and general smart appearance of the car, that count. But leave the boulevard and take to the highways, ascend mountain inclines, plough through heavy sand roads, or do any manner of what is ordinarily called hard riding and then you realize to the full what an immense advantage it is to be carried along by the force of a strong, sound and practical motor.

It means something to have the benefits of Winton experience in your automobile equipment. It means that you have the best results of long experience successfully tried out—the ripest fruits from practical and scientific knowledge in automobile building and designing. You are at no time inconvenienced by undemonstrated theories. Price of the new 20 horse-power Winton Touring Car, complete with full brass side lamps, horn, tools, etc., $2,500.

Visit any of our branch or agency depots in all leading cities and the limit of Winton excellence will be demonstrated.

MONEY TO COOKS

$7500.00 Donated, to be Divided Among Family Cooks

The sum of $7500.00 will be distributed between now and midsummer among family cooks, in 735 prizes ranging from $200.00 to $5.00.

This is done to stimulate better cooking in the family kitchen. The contest is open to paid cooks (drop the name "hired girl;" call them cooks if they deserve it) or to the mistress of the household if she does the cooking. The rules for contest are plain and simple. Each of the 735 winners of money prizes will also receive an engraved certificate of merit or diploma as a cook. The diplomas bear the big gilt seal and signature of the most famous food company in the world, The Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., of Battle Creek, Mich., the well known makers of Postum Coffee and Grape-Nuts. Write them and address Cookery Dept. No. 419 for full particulars.

This remarkable contest among cooks to win the money prizes and diplomas will give thousands of families better and more delicious meals, as well as cleaner kitchens and a general improvement in the culinary department, for the cooks must show marked skill and betterment in service to win. Great sums of money devoted to such enterprises always result in putting humanity further along on the road to civilization, health, comfort and happiness.
